Justice Peckham's dictum, just quoted, is claimed by both appellants and appellees in this case as favoring their respective contentions, but, rightly understood, it would seem beyond peradventure to favor the appellees. The case of Müller v. Horton, 152 Mass. 540, 10 L. R. A. 116, affords an apt illustration of Mr. Justice Peckham's meaning. This was tort for the summary killing of a horse that had been adjudged by the commissioners on contagious diseases among domestic animals, under Stat. 1887, chap. 252, had the contagious disease known as "glanders" or "farcy" and for the killing of which an order had been issued by them, with no provision for compensation to the owner. The defendants admitted the killing, but justified that they did it in obedience to the order. The court below ruled the act to be constitutional, found that the horse killed was not afflicted with glanders or any contagious disease, and found for the defendants, i. e., that the justification was sufficient. The whole of the supreme judicial court assumed the statute to be constitutional, a difference arising only as to whether, if the horse did not have the glanders, as a matter of fact, the killing was justifiable under the order. The court stood four to three, the majority deciding that the killing was not justified, and the minority that it was justified, under the order. Holmes, J., in giving the opinion of the majority of the court, said, inter alia: "The language of the material part of § 13 of the act of 1887 is: 'In all cases of farcy or glanders the commissioners, having condemned the animal infected therewith, shall cause such animal to be killed without an appraisal, but may pay the owner or any other person an equitable sum for the killing and burial thereof.' Taken literally, these words only give the commissioners jurisdiction and power to condemn a horse that really has the glanders. The question is whether they go further by implication, so that if a horse which has not the disease is condemned by the commissioners, their order will protect the man who kills it in a subsequent suit by the owner for compensation. . . . When, as here, the horse not only is not to be paid for, but may be condemned without appeal and killed without giving the owner a sance exists in the private drains of such company, but the corporation has not properly flushed, cleaned, and trapped the sewer pursuant to the provisions of the local act, the escape of such sulphurated hydrogenic gas from the sewer is a nuisance within the meaning of the statute arising from the acts of the chemical company, and therefore the public authorities can make complaint, although they themselves may have contributed to the existence of the nuisance. St. Helena Chemical Co. v. St. Helena, L. R. 1 Exch. Div. 196, 45 L. J. M. C. N. S. 160, 34 L. T. N. 8, 387.

But where the nuisance is artificially created by emptying the sewage of dwelling houses through a private drain upon private land, the board of health has no right to extend such private drain through the land of the proprietors to a brook on their land, and to clean out the brook in order that it may be used to carry off the sewage, as such a nuisance may be dealt with by the board of health under chap. 80, §§ 18, 25, Mass. Pub. Stat., or the proper authorities may lay a public sewer with which the board may require the buildings on the private way to be connected, the nuisance not being within the provisions of Mass. Stat. chap. 80, § 28: Huse v. Amesbury Bd. of Health, 163 Mass. 240. See also New York Health Department v. Lator, 38 Hun, 542, and Queen v. Osler, 22 U. C. Q. B. 324.

e. Persons and things infected with disease.

A municipal corporation has power to declare a wreck which has become dangerous to the health of the inhabitants to be a nuisance, and to order its removal. Lewis v. Dodge, 17 How. Pr. 229, 237.

In an Anonymous Case, 3 Atk. 760, it is said that it was not settled that a house for the reception of inoculative patients was a public nuisance.

And in Haag v. Vanderburgh County Comrs. 60 Ind. 511, 28 Am. Rep. 654, a pest-house for the treatment of small-pox patients was held to be within the definition of a nuisance as contained in § 623, 2 Ind. Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 258. In this case, however, the action was of a private nature, and showed special damage.

And a city ordinance directing the removal of persons affected with contagious disease without the city limits is a valid exercise of the police power, and authorized by the provisions of a charter, the continuance of such a person within the city limits being detrimental to the health and safety of the public, the city acting under legislative authority in passing such ordinance, relating to health and preventing nuisances. Aaron v. Broiles, 64 Tex. 316, 53 Am. Rep. 764.

The power conferred upon a common council to make and publish ordinances for the purpose of abating and removing nuisances is a mere grant of authority to adopt general rules and regulations respecting the removal of nuisances, and does not authorize the passing of an ordinance directing the removal of sick persons suffering from an infectious or contagious disease, as the mere fact that a person is sick of such disease either in his own house or in a public hotel does not constitute a nuisance. Boom v. Utica, 2 Barb. 104, 109, 110.

In Seavey v. Preble, 64 Me. 120, the court upheld the action of the authorities in tearing the paper from the walls of a house in which there had been smallpox patients, the same being necessary for the preservation of the public health.

Hospitals and homes for the sick are far from being nuisances per se. Beasones v. Indianapolis, 71 Ind. 189, 195.

In a case where the city ordinance prohibited the erection of a private hospital within the corporate limits, and the defendant was expelled by the municipal authorities from the premises which he had rented for the purposes of such hospital, the court upheld the proceedings taken by the authorities under such ordinance. Milne v. Davidson, 5 Mart. N. S. 586, 16 Am. Dec. 189, 191.

The authority of the municipal authorities to make a regulation prohibiting the erection of private hospitals within the corporate limits under the provisions of the charter which gives them full power and authority to make and pass such by-laws as they deem necessary to maintain the cleanliness and salubrity of the city cannot be tested by the principles of the common law in relation to nuisances, no such guide being given to the authorities by their charter and no such limits being inferred from the motives inducing such a grant of power, the police of cities requiring many regulations growing out of their situation, and many things which would not amount to nuisances at common law might be hurtful in a city. Milne v. Davidson, 5 Mart. N. S. 586, 16 Am. Dec. 189, 191.

General laws giving the city power to make and enforce ordinances to erect and establish market houses and market places, engine houses, houses of refuge, pest-houses and hospitals do not embrace the power to enable them to license or regulate the erection of private hospitals, and therefore an hearing, or even notice, the grounds are very strong for believing that the statute means no more than it says, and is intended to authorize the killing of actually infected horses only. . . . Section 18 of the act of 1867 by implication declares horses with the glanders to be nuisances, and we assume, in favor of the defendant, that it may do so constitutionally, and may authorize them to be killed without compensation to the owners. But the statute does not declare all horses to be nuisances, and the question is whether, if the owner of the horse denies that his horse falls within the class declared to be so, the legislature can make the ex parte decision of a board like this conclusive upon him. That question is answered by the decision in Fisher v. McGirr, 1 Gray, 1, 61 Am. Dec. 881. It is decided there that the owner has a right to be heard; and, further, that only a trial by jury satisfies the provision of article 12 of the Declaration of Rights, that no subject shall be deprived of his property but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land. . . . Of course there cannot be a trial by jury before killing an animal supposed to have a contagious disease, and we assume that the legislature may authorize its destruction in such emergencies without a hearing beforehand. But it does not follow that it can throw the loss on the owner without a hearing. If he cannot be heard beforehand, he may be heard afterwards. The statute may provide for paying him in case it should appear that his property was not what the legislature has declared to be a nuisance, and may give him his hearing in that way. If he does not do so, the statute may leave those who act under it to proceed at their peril, and the owner gets his hearing in an action against them."

There are many other cases which might be cited in reference to the non-necessity of notice before the passage of the order, but the foregoing are sufficient to satisfy us that no such notice is required. When the appellant is sued for the penalty, she will have her day in court, and a trial by jury, if she desires; and proof will have to be adduced to show that she had an unauthorized privy vault upon her premises ordinance respecting such hospitals is void, private hospitals not being within the meaning of such ordinances, hospitals not being nuisances per se or prima facie such. Bessones v. Indianapolis, 71 Ind. 189, 195.

A board of health of a city, under its power to abate and prevent nuisances, cannot remove citizens from their homes and close up their houses without either the sanction of the law or the justification of their act by great public necessity demanding such action, by reason of there being no other way to avert the threatening peril, especially where there is no existence or allegations of existence of a pestilential disease; and in such a case their power is limited to the removal of the alleged nuisance or cause thereof. Eddy v. Board of Health, 10 Phila. 94.

In Newark & S. O. Horse Car R. Co. v. Hunt, 50 N. J. L. 308, the plaintiff claimed damages against the defendants for killing certain horses belonging to him, the defendants justifying their action under the provisions of the supplement to an act establishing a state board of health and preventing the spreading of glanders in horses, and making horses afflicted with that disease common nuisances, and authorizing the destruction of the same. The court upheld the constitutionality of the acts as being within the police power, even though they authorized the summary abatement of such nuisances, the act leaving the question of justification in the killing of such animals open to proof.

Under § 13 of the Massachusetts act of 1867, authorizing the summary killing of animals having the farcy or glanders, and which by implication declares horses with the glanders to be nuisances, all horses are not declared to be nuisances. Miller v. Horton, 152 Mass. 540, 548, 10 L. R. A. 116.

1. With respect to offensive and unwholesome smells.

Anything offensive to the sense of smell or hearing, erected or carried on in a public place where the people dwell or pass or have a right to pass, to their annoyance, is a nuisance at common law. Blackney v. State, 8 Ind. 494.

Dead, decaying, and putrid animal or vegetable matter is a nuisance per se. Rogers v. Barker, 31 Barb. 447, 452.

So, vessels, clothes, and goods charged with the effluvia and infection of persons fatally diseased are nuisances per se. Rogers v. Barker, 31 Barb. 447, 452.

It has been stated that the public have a right to pass over a public highway without being discomforted by any offensive smells, and such smells may constitute a public nuisance. Com. v. Rush, 11 Lanc. L. Rev. 97.

In order to constitute a nuisance it is not necessary that the smell should be unwholesome, it is enough if it renders the enjoyment of life and property uncomfortable. Reg. v. White, 1 Burr. 837; Richards' Case, 6 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 61.

An ordinance, the object of which is to protect the inhabitants and travelers in a close and populous neighborhood from nuisance by reason of offensive and unwholesome smells, is valid. Com. v. Patch, 97 Mass. 221.

An instruction to the jury that the court declares the law to be that, if the premises complained of were kept in as cleanly a manner as they could be kept in the reasonable prosecution of the defendant's business then the defendant was not guilty, was rightly refused, inasmuch as such an instruction would compel the toleration, in the midst of private residences, and in the most populous districts, of trades or avocations necessarily noxious and highly offensive to the neighborhood and the public, and was therefore rightly refused. State v. Boll, 59 Mo. 321, 323.

The use of a cremator in a village for the destruction of garbage in a manner which emits stenches therefrom and substantially damages the surrounding premises is an unauthorized proceeding and will be abated by the public authorities. Kobbe v. New Brighton, 20 Misc. 477.

Where the odors and gases from a fat-rendering establishment produce headache, nausea, vomiting, and compel citizens to close their doors and windows both by day and night, and interfere with them in the enjoyment of their meals and of sleep, such an establishment is a nuisance which it is the duty of the board of health to abate. State, Board of Health, v. Lederer, 52 N. J. Eq. 676.

In a similar case it is stated that although the simple odor arising from a properly conducted fat-rendering establishment may not be detrimental to the public health, yet when such smells not only compel citizens to retire from their porches and close their doors and windows both by day and night and thereby deprive them of a constant supply of fresh wholesome air, and also to obtain a recovery against her. So, if an alleged privy vault upon her premises is filled up and destroyed, under alleged authority of said chapter 777 as amended by chapter 1407, she can bring suit against the persons doing the act for the supposed trespass, and when they attempt to justify under the statute she will have her day in court, and a trial by jury, if she desires, and the defendants will have to show that the alleged privy vault was actually a privy vault, and that it was unauthorized under the statute. Of course, if the thing declared by statute to be a nuisance, or the thing regulated or repressed under an exercise of the police power, is not a nuisance in fact, or within the province of the exercise of the police power, then the court will declare the statute unconstitutional, for the power is not to be used under the mere allegation, color, or pretense of being a proper exercise of the police power, when in truth it is not. But the legislature, as we have already seen, is to a great extent the proper judge of the necessity for the exercise of this restraining power. In addition to cases already quoted from, see Watertown v. Mayo, 109 Mass. 315, 319, 12 Am. Rep. 694; and Train v. Boston Disinfecting Co., 144 Mass. 528, 580, 59 Am. Rep. 113, in which latter case Devens, J., says: "But there can be no doubt of the right of the legislature to pronounce, under its police power, certain things or certain acts nuisances in themselves."

The appellant urges, as a ground for adjudging the act in question unconstitutional, that she cannot be heard upon the question whether the privy vault upon her premises is a nuisance or not, irrespective of the legislative determination thereof. We have already seen that the legislature can pronounce under its police power that certain things are nuisances per se, and privy vaults, under the conditions provided for in said chapter 777, as amended by chapter 1407, are embraced in such things. The legislature is authorized under its police power to determine and enact that places used for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors are nuisances, and persons prosecuting thereunder can show that the place causes nausea and sickness of the stomach, retching and vomiting, and oblige them to forego their meals, there may then be strong proof of hazard or peril, or danger to the health of those so affected, which will warrant the abatement of such a nuisance by the public authorities, the New Jersey act which authorizes the boards of health to abate nuisances hazardous to public health not being confined to cases of cholera, smallpox, or yellow fever, or the plague, the intention being to submit to the board the power of determining whether or not every such nuisance might in any reasonable event tend to the inviting, generating, fostering, or promoting of disease. State, Hamilton Twp. Bd. of Health, v. Neidt (N. J.), 19 Atl. 318.

So, noxious or offensive smells emanating from any trade or business in a town or populous neighborhood, or near to a public road or highway, to the annoyance of the neighborhood, or the persons traveling such road, are a nuisance abatable by the public authorities, and it is sufficient if they are offensive to the senses. State v. Luce, 9 Houst. (Del.) 396; State v. Wetherell, 5 Harr. (Del.) 487; Ashbrook v. Com. 1 Bush, 139, 89 Am. Dec. 616, 619; Belcher v. Farrar, 8 Allen, 325, 327; Taunton v. Taylor, 116 Mass. 254, 261; State v. Mott, 61 Md. 297, 48 Am. Rep. 105, 107; Chicago v. Rumpf, 45 Ill. 90, 32 Am. Dec. 194, 203.

In Coe v. Schultz, 47 Barb. 64, a metropolitan board of health ordered the manufacturing of superphosphate of lime within the metropolis sanitary district to be discontinued until the mode of conducting such manufactures should be altered so that no odors or fumes could escape into the external air. It was held that although such an order might deprive the owner of such business of his property, yet he would not be so deprived without due process of law provided the business was a public nuisance the board having a right to suppress a nuisance, by reason of its power to protect the life and health of the inhabitants from nuisances.

But the mere fact that they emit a disagreeable odor is not sufficient to warrant the imposition of a penalty by such authorities under their power to remove and prevent nuisances, where the business is in itself lawful. Lippman v. South Bend, 84 Ind. 278, 279.

And where the resolutions of the board of health were not acted upon for some months after they were passed, for the reason that the board feared that the removal at the time when the resolution was passed would greatly increase the poisonous effluvia and so aggravate the malady which then prevailed in the town, the board were held justified in waiting until the cooler weather prevailed before carrying out such resolutions in order to prevent the repetition of the malady the following summer. Raymond v. Fish, 51 Conn. 80, 103, 50 Am. Rep. 8.

It is not necessary to constitute an offense under § 114 of the English public health act of 1875, that the effluvia should arise from a business, if it amounts to a nuisance and is also injurious to health. Malton Local Bd. of Health v. Malton Farmers' Manure & Trading Co. L. R. 4 Exch. Div. 302, 49 L. J. M. C. N. S. 90, 44 J. P. 155.

An offense is committed under § 91 of the English public health act of 1875, where the accumulation or deposit, which is a nuisance or injurious to health, emits offensive smells which interfere with the personal comfort of persons living in the neighborhood but does not cause injury to health. Bishop Auckland Local Board v. Bishop Auckland Iron & S. Co. L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 138, 52 L. J. M. C. N. S. 88, 48 L. T. N. S. 223, 31 Week. Rep. 238, 47 J. P. 389.

complained of is not used for the sale of intoxicating liquors, but they are not permitted to show that, although the place is used for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, yet that it is not a nuisance. That was determined by the legislature when it passed the act, as to the propriety of the passage of which the persons prosecuted doubtless had no notice or hearing; neither are such persons entitled to be heard whether proceedings shall be commenced against them. So the legislature has made a statute as to certain classes of privy vaults, and the appellant can have an opportunity of being heard whether her privy vault is of that class; but she will not be heard as to whether her privy vault would not have been a nuisance if the act had not been passed, because she was not heard upon the question whether the legislature should pass such a law, nor whether the board of aldermen should have initiated proceedings against her by giving her a preliminary notice or order.

of Health v. Boyton, 52 L. T. N. S. 90, 48 J. P. 582; People v. Detroit White Lead Works, 82 Mich. 471, 9 L. R. A. 782.

As to odors arising from the keeping of animals, see infra, §.

g. Water and watercourses.

The fouling of water after the right to foul it has ceased, by reason of an act giving a city authority to use the same for public purpose, amounts to a public nuisance. Martin v. Gleason, 139 Mass. 183; Morton v. Moore, 15 Gray, 573, 576; Brookline v. Mackintosh, 138 Mass. 215, 225.

Supplying the citizens and others visiting a city with unwholesome and poisonous water constitutes a nuisance; so held in Stein v. State, 37 Ala. 123, 131, the court stating that the poisoning of the water consumed by an entire community and by all who might go that way certainly possessed the quality of injuries to the community requisite to constitute a nuisance.

In State v. Taylor, 29 Ind. 517, the defendant was charged with polluting a stream of water near a public highway used by persons in the vicinity and travelers along the road in such a manner as to render it unfit for use and indecent, so as to obstruct the free use of the water by citizens. The court held that "the charge was sufficient under the definition of a nuisance as contained in Ind. Stat. (2 Gavin & H.) § 623, p. 288, which defined a nuisance as whatever is injurious to health or indecent or offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of property so as essentially to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property," and that such a nuisance affecting the public was punishable as such, the court relying upon Sloan v. State, 8 Ind. 312.

If the act of a defendant in fouling the stream has made it necessary for the city to resort to extraordinary means for preserving the purity of the water of a pond or reservoir such means cannot justify the continuance of the illegal fouling, the mere fact that the city has thus far been able, by means of such special works, to prevent the natural result of its acts, being no defense. Martin v. Gleason, 139 Mass. 183.

In Martin v. Gleason, 139 Mass. 183, an action by the mayor of a city for an injunction to restrain the defendant from discharging sewage into a certain brook was upheld under the Massachusetts statutes.

A city has a right to be protected against the necessity of maintaining works for the preservation of the purity of water used for public purposes. Martin v. Gleason, 139 Mass. 183.

The appellants contend that privy vaults have never been declared by statute nuisances per se. We do not understand that a formal declaration that a thing is a nuisance, ipse iuris, is necessary to bring it within the exercise of the police power, or to constitute it a nuisance. A formal declaration that a thing is a nuisance does not necessarily make it so, as we have already seen; and not formally declaring it to be a nuisance does not technically keep it from being one, if it is treated as such in the statute. Thus we have seen that Mr. Justice Holmes, in Miller v. Horton, 152 Mass. 540, 10 L. R. A. 116, said, "Section 13 of the act of 1887, by implication, declares horses with the glanders to be nuisances," and yet reference to that section shows that such horses were not called nuisances, but only treated as such; nor is the word "nuisance" anywhere to be found in the whole act. Chapter 777, as amended by chapter 1407, distinctly declares at the end of the act that its pro-

An incorporated city has the power to abate a nuisance, whereby a certain creek is polluted by means of filth and other refuse matter being deposited therein from a private sewer, and this without regard to trespass upon the city's property or that of any person by the nuisance complained of. Belton v. Central Hotel Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 33 S. W. 297.

In Belton v. Baylor Female College (Tex. Civ. App.) 33 S. W. 680, the court followed its decision in the above case of Belton v. Central Hotel Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 33 S. W. 297, the nuisances complained of in the two cases being of the same character.

In State, Board of Health, v. Bergen County Chosen Freeholders, 46 N. J.; Eq. 173, wherein the defendants were charged with creating and maintaining, in and about the courthouse and jail and other public county buildings, a nuisance within the limits of the municipality which was hazardous to the public health, and set forth in detail the particulars of the alleged nuisances, which were, inter alia, the use of the river as a sewer, thereby rendering it foul, noxious, and hazardous to the public health, it was held that the authorities must show that the acts complained of amounted to a public as distinguished from a private nuisance, the mere fact that it had a tendency in that direction not being sufficient to justify the court in granting the injunction prayed for.

Where deposits in a mill-pond by a railroad company for the purpose of filling up certain portions of it without supplying culverts or other means of drainage are claimed by the city to be a nuisance which the board of health may proceed to remove, the order of such board under the Massachusetts General Statutes for the removal of such nuisance is sufficient notice of its nature and locality, and for the purposes of abating such nuisance the city is justified in entering upon such land and digging a trench for the purpose of removing or preventing the nuisance. Salem v. Eastern R. Co. 96 Mass. 431, 433, 96 Am. Dec. 650.

The action of a city for the abatement of a nuisance, under chap. 189, N. Y. Laws 1893, caused by the pollution of a stream which at a certain point was used for drinking and domestic purposes, after notice to abate the same, is legal and a valid exercise of legislative power. Keller v. New York, 6 Misc. 518, 621, wherein the plaintiff's action to restrain the city from summary abatement of the nuisance was dismissed.

So, a city ordinance prohibiting boating, sailing, and fishing upon a lake, passed for the purpose of protecting and preserving the water of the lake visions were made "in the interest of the public health of the city," and that is all-sufficient, coupled with the nature of its provisions. Neither do we see that the provision of the statute in question referring to the filling up and destroying privy vaults, etc., notwithstanding the pendency of an appeal, was in any way in contravention of the Constitution. We have already referred to various authorities that summary action under the police power without being heard, without previous jury trial, and without compensation, might be constitutional. Under our system an appeal is allowed from any order of a town council, but, as the law stood in August, 1895, it was at least sixty-five days from the date of the passage of the order before it could be called in the appellate court for assignment even (jud. act, 183), and so, to avoid all question as to the effect of an appeal from an order under said chapters 777 and 1407 under the general provisions as to such appeals, it was plainly declared that such an appeal should not prevent summary proceedings under said chapters. The appeal was not affected by the abatement of the nuisance any more than trial by jury was affected by such abatement, although the prosecution of the appeal, like the trial by jury, followed the abatement. The appellants seem to draw a distinction between the privy vaults mentioned in said chapters 777 and 1407 on the one hand, and the cesspools and other arrangements for the reception of drainage on the other, that is not altogether apparent to us, but, inasmuch as such distinction is sought to be drawn, and as a privy vault is alone involved in this suit, our decision is limited to the constitutionality of the statute in question so far only as it refers to privy vaults mentioned therein. In conclusion we are of the opinion that chapter 777 of April 25, 1899, as amended by chapter 1407 of March 1, 1895, so far as it relates to privy vaults, being the only portion called in question in this case, is not in violation of the Constitution.

and preventing a nuisance, and for the benefit of the public health, will be enforced, although the use of the waters of the lake for boating, sailing, and fishing is not of itself injurious nor a nuisance, but as a necessary incident to or concomitant with such use, a considerable quantity of impure, objectionable, decayed, and decomposing matter, filth, and various excreta of the human body being deposited in the lake, thereby constituting it a nuisance. Dunham v. New Britain, 55 Conn. 573, 383, a similar case to the above.

The ordinance of a common council acting pursuant to power given to it by the legislature prohibiting under penalty, inter alia, boating, sailing, and fishing on a lake the water from which was used by the public for private as well as other purposes, was upheld as a means of preventing a nuisance, although the use of the waters of the lake for such purposes was not of itself injurious nor a nuisance, but might become so by reason of impure and objectionable and decayed and decomposing matter being deposited in the lake, the germs of infection and contagious diseases being thereby deposited at or near the entrance of the supply pipes, thereby communicating disease to those using the water for domestic purposes. Dunham v. New Britain, 55 Conn. 573, 383.

Under § 27, Pa. act Jan. 29, 1818, it is the duty of the board of health to cause all offensive or putrid substances, and all nuisances which may have a tendency in their opinion to endanger the health of the citizens, to be removed from the streets, lanes, alleys, highways, walks, docks, or any other part or parts of the city, and the expenses attending such removal are recoverable by the board in case due notice to remove has been given and neglected; and the claim of the board of health in removing a nuisance from a pond of stagnant water was held recoverable in the district court, even though such claim was less than $100. Kennedy v. Philadelphia Bd. of Health, 2 Pa. 366.

In Com. v. Reed, 84 Pa. 278, 281, 75 Am. Dec. 661, it was alleged that the president and directors of the Erie canal created a nuisance in keeping up and maintaining, by damming the southern end of a certain swamp, a certain pond and reservoir as a part of their canal, by means of which several hundred acres of land were overflowed and the water of the pond and reservoir became stagnant, putrid, and noxious, occasioning unwholesome damps and smells corrupting and infecting the air, thereby creating a nuisance to the citizens, and the defendants contended that the alleged nuisance was created, constructed, and erected by authority and in pursuance of the laws of the commonwealth. The court stated that works of internal improvement erected at the expense and by the officers of the state for the benefit of the citizens at large could never be regarded by the law as nuisances, the sovereign authority having expressly intended them to advance the prosperity of the community.

Under a charter conferring power, inter alia, to suppress all nuisances a city has power to pass an ordinance preventing the use of unwholesome well water in the making of bread, and to cause all wells upon the premises to be filled up. State v. Schlemmer, 42 La. Ann. 1166, 10 L. R. A. 135.

If the filling up of a ditch is the only means of accomplishing the abatement of a nuisance by the public authorities under the provisions of their ordinance passed pursuant to their charter, supposing the ditch to be a public nuisance, the powers of police under proper legislative sanction are sufficient to authorize it to be done, and any invasion of private interests by a reasonable exercise of the power must be submitted to by the owner as damnum absque injuria. State, Rodwell v. Newark, 34 N. J. L. 264, 267.

A city government has the right to fill up a creek or watercourse adjoining houses belonging to a party and in the occupation of a tenant for years, in order to abate a nuisance injurious to the health of the inhabitants, so long as they do not unlawfully interfere with private property, such a measure being a health regulation subject to which every citizen holds his property. Baker v. Boston, 12 Pick. 184, 22 Am. Dec. 421, 423.

An ordinance providing that every owner, occupant, or lessee of any stone quarry or premises theretofore used for quarrying stone therefrom within the city should cause the same to be filled with earth even with the surface of the ground before any excavation was made, or should cause the water therein to be drained therefrom and said quarries or excavations kept dry and the water prevented from accumulating or standing therein under certain penalty for each offense, to be sued for and recovered from the owner, occupant, or lessee thereof severally and respectively, was held to be a valid exercise of the powers conferred by the charter as a means of preserving the public health and preventing nuisances. Rochester v. Simpson, 134 N. Y. 414, Reversing 57 Hun. 86.

Where the nuisance consisted in large quantities of stagnant water standing in an open drain in a certain location, and notice was given by the board of health under the Massachusetts Statutes of 1868, chap. 160, and the board of health subsequently

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Town of DARLINGTON, Rept.,

v.

J. J. WARD, Appt.

(48 S. C. 570.)

1. An ordinance cannot be held invalid because it is unreasonable, when the power to pass ordinances on the subject is conferred by a constitutional statute.

2. An ordinance making it unlawful to keep any hog within the corporate limits of a town cannot be held void for unreasonableness under statutes giving power to define nuisances and to regulate and control the keeping of animals in the town.

abated the nuisance but it was not shown whether the drain was a public or private one, although there was evidence that it appeared to be a water-course it was held that it was too late upon petition for certiorari to object to the proceedings by the board. Grace v. Newton Bd. of Health, 135 Mass. 490, 497.

A city ordinance directing wells dug by the owners of property on their respective parcels of land and in the sidewalks, and furnished with pumps by them, especially where the water in such wells is found to contain six or more grains of chlorine to a gallon of water to be filled up, is a sanitary measure valid as a means of securing the general health of the inhabitants, and the prevention and abatement of nuisances, which power is vested in them under 2 Mo. Rev. Stat. p. 1555. Ferrenbach v. Turner, 86 Mo. 418, 419.

And under an ordinance, passed pursuant to an amendment to a city charter, directing the filling up of an old ditch to abate a public nuisance, authorizing the city council to direct the digging down, draining, filling up, or fencing of lots, etc., in all cases where the same is necessary to prevent or abate a nuisance, when the nuisance consists and results from the condition in which the bed of the stream is kept, and not from the fact that the bed of the stream is there situated, the action of the city should be directed to the condition in which the ditch is kept, and the abatement of that condition, rather than in filling it up and depriving the owners of its use, as the defeating of the use of such ditch for the legitimate purpose of draining and receiving waste water is an unreasonable and unnecessary invasion of private rights,—especially where the nuisance complained of can be remedied by the less severe method of compelling a proper outlet or drainage for the ditch. State, Rodwell, v. Newark, 34 N. J. L. 284, 287.

And it has been said that when the preservation of the public health is thought to require such acts, as the filling in of land or raising its grade over a considerable extent of territory or the covering of land with water, or the removal of dams and streams in order to allow better drainage, or to prevent the accumulation of offensive materials, it is usual to pass statutes giving the requisite authority and making due provision for the protection of the property of individuals, for the reason that the general power vested in boards of health and in city governments is not adequate to deal with such cases if it is impossible to come to an agreement with the owners of property to be affected. Cavanagh v. Boston, 139 Mass. 426, 433, 434, 52 Am. Rep. 716.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Darlington County dismissing an appeal from the mayor's judgment convicting him of violating a city ordinance forbidding the keeping of hogs within the corporate limits. Affirmed.

The judgment of the court below by BUCHANAN, J., was as follows:

"This case comes up on the appeal from the decision of the mayor fining the appellant for the violation of an ordinance forbidding the keeping of hogs within the corporation limits. Soon after the decision I made and filed a short memorandum of my reasons for the judgment rendered, but, owing to the scarcity of time and the absence of authorities at the moment, I have thought a more extended view of my reasons may not be amiss when the importance of the powers conferred by

A resolution of a city council requiring lotowners to fill and drain their lots in such a manner as may be necessary to remove therefrom all stagnant water is a valid exercise of the police power as a sanitary measure for preserving the health of the inhabitants, and is therefore constitutional, and will extend, not merely to the removal of such water as may be upon the lots at the time, but also to the subsequent gathering of stagnant waters. Bliss v. Kraus, 16 Ohio St. 54.

Neither a dam thrown across a stream of water nor a collection of water in a reservoir created thereby is a nuisance per se, but, on the contrary, they are sources of mechanical power, and tend to the diffusion of health, strength, and comfort to large numbers of people, and the water collected therein cannot in itself become detrimental or dangerous to the health of the population in the vicinity without other things combined, such as the presence of decayed and decaying vegetation, and its exposure in shallow basins to the evaporations of the summer heats, and therefore the question of nuisance or no nuisance depends upon the presence or absence of such extraneous facts and circumstances. Rogers v. Barker, 81 Barb. 447, 452.

The owner of premises may lawfully erect a mill dam on a river not navigable; and in such a case the dam will not per se be a nuisance, but whenever such dam is erected, managed, or carried on in such places or in such a manner as to become prejudicial to the health or comfort of others it becomes a public nuisance. State v. Close, 35 Iowa, 370, 573.

The resolution of a board of health which contemplates and intends nothing short of a total destruction of the property, such as a mill dam thrown across a stream without compensation to the owner, without notice of the proceedings by which it is devoted to destruction, without judgment of any judicial tribunal, and without due process of law, is invalid for the reason that the fact that such dam was injurious to others must be first established by the usual and customary proceedings, summary proceedings only being valid in cases of great and imminent emergencies, the mere fact of the boards declaring it to be a dangerous nuisance and detrimental to the health of the inhabitants being too vague and indefinite. Rogers v. Barker, 81 Barb. 447, 452.

In order to support a charge of creating a public nuisance in damming up and stagnating the water of a creek, it must be alleged and proved that the obstruction placed thereon produced a stagnation of the waters thereof in or near to a public highway or some other place in which the public the recent act is remembered. The ordinance in question reads: 'That on and after December 31st, proximo, it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to keep any hog or hogs on any premises within the corporate limits of the town, and any person or persons so doing shall be punished by a fine of not less than $10 or by imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, or both, at the discretion of the said board of health.' No question, as I understand, was made as to the latter part of the ordinance, the purpose being merely to test whether the town council have the power to pass an ordinance, forbidding the keeping of hogs within the corporate limits and punishable with fine. The appellant was fined $20 for a violation of the ordinance. I have therefore confined myself simply to the points made which presuppose the proper passage and sufficient phraseology of the ordinance in question.

"The grounds of appeal raised before me have such special interest, and a general conclusion that the stagnation of the waters does injury to the people of the commonwealth will not cure the want of such special averment. Com. v. Webb, 6 Rand. (Va.) 726, 729.

A pond in a city is a public nuisance where foul and malarial exhalations arise from the stagnant water, and from the sides and bed as the water is drawn off, and are intensified by the accumulation of filth which no police vigilance can keep out of the stream, and which the dam retains and holds. Yonkers Bd. of Health v. Copcutt, 140 N. Y. 12, 23 L. R. A. 485.

And the fact that a dam is made when the water of a stream is clean and pure will not prevent its abatement as a nuisance made by the growth of the city, and the consequent pollution of the water which has become an inevitable menace to the public health. Yonkers Bd. of Health v. Copcutt, 140 N. Y. 12, 23 L. R. A. 485.

An arrangement between a town and a person, under which an original dam was built, a bond being given to clear the town from any damage from the flowing of the water, and that the dam should never interfere with the town road, does not prevent the town from suing for damages occasioned by the dam interfering with the road and constituting a nuisance, neither will it prevent the town from recovering the damage done by the rebuilding of the dam to a greater height. Grace v. Newton Bd. of Health, 135 Mass. 490, 497.

And under the power contained in Minn. Spec. Laws 1881, chap. 38, under which a village was incorporated with authority, by ordinance, resolutions, or by laws, to remove and abate any nuisances injurious to the public health, and to do all acts and make all regulations necessary and expedient for the preservation of health and the suppression of disease, the 5th section of the 4th chapter of the act providing that the powers conferred upon the common council to provide for the abatement of any nuisance should not bar or hinder suits, prosecutions, or proceedings in any court of law, the common council may pass an ordinance prohibiting or abating a nuisance, such as opening the gates and sluices of a dam in the hot summer months and drawing the water from the pond, thereby converting the land into marshes and swamps, and causing the vegetable matter therein to decay and become decomposed in the hot sun filling the air with malaria, and causing sickness and death, and may enjoin such nuisance by proceedings in equity. Pine City v. Munch, 42 Minn. 342, 6 L. R. A. 763.

are as follows: (1) That the ordinance by virtue of which the defendant has been fined is unconstitutional and void inasmuch as it takes from the citizens valuable rights in property without compensation. (2) That the said ordinance is without authority in law, and illegal. (3) That the said ordinance transcends the powers granted to the town council of Darlington and the mayor of the town, and is ultra vires and illegal. (4) That if the keeping of a hog by Mr. Ward was an offense, §§ 960-969, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes provide a way of dealing with the same, and that the said provision is exclusive of any other way of dealing with the said offense. (5) That the said ordinance is inconsistent with the laws of the state as laid down in §§ 960-969 of the Revised Statutes, and so is without authority of law and void. (6) That it is apparent that the keeping of the hog by Mr. Ward was not a nuisance, and it did not affect the health of the town.

the New York act empowering boards of health to make regulations in their discretion concerning, inter alia, the suppression and removal of nuisances, and all such other regulations as they deem necessary and proper for the preservation of the public health, the power has only reference to nuisances which may be the subject of regulation, and therefore the damming of a river is not in itself a nuisance; and the resolution of the board, declaring the same a dangerous nuisance, detrimental to the health of the neighborhood, and requiring the same to be removed within three days, is too indefinite and uncertain to authorize its removal, their statement not showing what the nuisance is, whether it is the dam itself or the waters collected above it. Rogers v. Barker, 81 Barb. 447.

So, municipalities have no power, upon the ground that it is a nuisance, as endangering the public health, to take proceedings without a trial or notice to the owner of a mill who, by virtue of a power vested in him under the act of the legislature, constructed a dam across a certain stream and conveyed the water from such dam to his mill by means of a race or ditch. Clark v. Syracuse, 13 Barb. 32.

In Americus v. Mitchell, 79 Ga. 807, 809, the question as to whether a mill pond was a nuisance or not was not determined, as before trial the mill-dam was swept away by a flood, the court stating that the Almighty had already abated the nuisance. In that case, however, the court passed upon the power of the city authorities, under their charter and ordinances, to define or determine whether a particular matter was a nuisance or not, and to abate it summarily if found to be one.

In People, New York C. & H. R. R. Co., v. Seneca Falls Bd. of Health, 58 Hun. 585, it was held that the proceedings of a board of health acting under chap. 270, N. Y. Laws 1836, as amended by Laws 1888, chap. 309, in requiring the company to make certain openings in its embankment so as to allow the water of a certain lake to flow freely through the same, was irregular when made without notice, the duties of the board in respect to inquiring into and determining whether or not a nuisance existed being quasi judicial in their nature.

b. Burial of the dead.

A cemetery is not a nuisance per se without proof of special circumstances making it such. Musgrove v. Catholic Church of St. Louis, 10 La. Ann. 431; Bergin v. Anderson, 28 Ind. 79, 81; Lake View v. Letz, 44 Ill. 81, 88; Lake View v. Rose Hill

"Every citizen holds his property subject to the proper exercise of the police power, either by the legislature directly or by public corporations to which the state legislature may delegate it. Laws and ordinances relating to the comfort, health, convenience, good order, and general welfare of the inhabitants are comprehensively styled 'police laws or regulations.' And it is well settled that laws and regulations of this character, though they may disturb the enjoyment of individual rights, are not unconstitutional. They do not appropriate private property for public use, but simply its proper use and enjoyment. Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 146 et seq., cited and approved in Summerville v. Pressley, 38 S. C. 62, 8 L. R. A. 854. It is perfectly clear if such an authority is given the town, that the exercise of such power would be unconstitutional.

"This leads us to a consideration of the second ground of appeal, which involves the consideration of exceptions 3 and 5. Was the town without authority to make and pass such an ordinance? It is to be observed that the power sought to be exercised is a very common police power,—a power exercised for the health and comfort of a town. In addition to the powers given specifically to the town of Darlington by its charter and amendment, the powers conferred by §§ 960-969 of the Revised Statutes and the supplemental act of 1894 are invoked. Section 961 of the Revised Statutes gives local boards ample powers, among others, 'to define and declare what shall be nuisances to health in lots and streets,' etc., 'and to regulate and control the keeping or slaughter of all kinds of cattle, sheep, goats, and swine or other animals in any city or town or part thereof.' Again it says: 'And to prohibit and remove any nuisance or offensive matter in any public highway, road, street, or other place, public or private, in such city or town, and to cause the removal of the same at the expense of the owner thereof, if he decline to move it after notice.' Section 962 provides that such board of health shall notify the municipal authorities, who shall remove the same at Cemetery Co. 70 Ill. 191, 195, 22 Am. Rep. 71; Dunn v. Austin, 77 Tex. 139, 144.

Burial places are indispensable and concern the public health, and are not the subject of absolute prohibition by legislative action. Lake View v. Rose Hill Cemetery Co. 70 Ill. 191, 195, 196, 22 Am. Rep. 71.

As a place of interment of the dead is not necessarily a nuisance the question must depend upon the position and extent of the grounds, and especially upon the manner in which the burials are effected. Ellison v. Washington Comrs. 5 Jones, Eq. 57, 75 Am. Dec. 430; Dunn v. Austin, 77 Tex. 139, 144.

In Barnes v. Hathorn, 54 Me. 124, 138, it is said that a man may have a legal right to build a tomb on his own land, and such an act is not in itself and inherently a nuisance unless it becomes so from its locality and other extraneous facts.

The use of grounds for a cemetery either public or private is not unlawful, and when so used no nuisance is created, unless, from the manner of the use, the atmosphere surrounding other property is rendered unwholesome or offensive, or unless water in wells, springs, or reservoirs is injured by poisonous matter exhaled or otherwise thrown out, or unless the soil or other property through such use becomes impregnated with unwholesome or obnoxious matter from which injury results. Dunn v. Austin, 77 Tex. 139, 146.

Nor is the naked averment in proceedings for an injunction to restrain their establishment in proceedings by a town council, without the statement of sufficient reasons to render them so, sufficient to authorize proceedings for their abatement or suppression as such. Begeln v. Anderson, 28 Ind. 79, 81.

A power to prohibit the establishment of cemeteries, except by the authority of the trustees of the village or town, cannot be considered as falling within the power to abate and remove nuisances vested in them by the act of incorporation. Lake View v. Letz, 44 Ill. 81, 83.

Yet the powers given to municipalities "to make regulations to secure the general health of the inhabitants and prevent and remove nuisances" is sufficient to authorize the prohibition of burials and the discontinuance of graveyards in the populous districts of cities. Campbell v. Kansas, 102 Mo. 325, 350, 10 L. R. A. 593.

But a cemetery may be so placed as to be injurious to the public health, and may therefore be a nuisance. Lake View v. Letz, 44 Ill. 81, 85; Begeln v. Anderson, 28 Ind. 79, 81.

The right of burial of the dead is not an absolute right of property but a privilege or license to be enjoyed so long as the place continues to be used as a burial ground subject to municipal regulation and control, and legally revocable whenever the public necessity requires it. Page v. Symonds, 63 N. H. 17, 12, 56 Am. Rep. 481.

The burial of the dead may be performed in such a manner as to be most injurious in its consequences to the people in the vicinity, and therefore laws may be passed to regulate the interment of the dead in order to prevent injury to the health of the community; and although a company formed for that purpose may be exercising franchises conferred by the state it is still within the legislative control. Lake View v. Rose Hill Cemetery Co. 70 Ill. 191, 196, 22 Am. Rep. 71.

In Concordia Cemetery Assn. v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co. 121 Ill. 199, 212, it was stated that the matter of burials was a proper subject of municipal regulation, although in that case the proceedings had no relation to the maintenance of a burial ground as a nuisance.

In Com. v. Fahey, 5 Cush. 408, the court upheld an ordinance of the city of Boston relating to burial grounds and the burial of the dead as being within the provisions of Mass. Stat. 1849, chap. 211, § 7, as being regulations relating to health.

And the regulation of cemeteries and burial grounds was looked upon as being within the exercise of the police power for the security of public health and safety, in Woodlawn Cemetery v. Everett, 118 Mass. 354, although in that case the main question of the court was a question of taxation of such grounds, and also the constitutionality of Mass. Stat. 1855, chap. 257, regarding the burial of the dead.

Under a charter giving the city power to make any and all regulations necessary to secure, protect, preserve, and restore the general health, and to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases and also to regulate the police of the city, and impose fines and forfeitures for a breach of such ordinances, the city has power to pass an ordinance regulating the burial of the dead. Graves v. Bloomington, 17 Ill. App. 476.

In St. Peter's Episcopal Church v. Washington, 109 N. C. 21, the court, without passing upon the validity of the ordinance, refused an injunction to restrain the city from enforcing the provisions the expense of the owner where necessary. Section 8 of the act of January 5, 1895 (21 Stat. at L. 820), after reciting other powers, says: 'And by abating and removing all nuisances which they shall deem prejudicial to the public health.' Again: 'And make all such other regulations as they shall deem necessary for the preservation of the public health.' Section 8 of this act provides for the making of the rules and regulations necessary for the carrying of the powers granted into effect, and when approved as an ordinance such regulations shall have the same force and effect as other ordinances of the town. It then recited significantly: 'And all penalties for the violation thereof, as well as expenses necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the same, shall be recoverable for the use of the town or city in the same manner as penalties for the violation of their city ordinances subject to the like limitations as to the amount thereof.' Certainly the powers given in both the Revised Statutes and the act of 1895 are amply sufficient to prohibit the keeping of anything that may be injurious to the health or comfort of the town. Could more power be given? If the act of 1895 is considered as supplementing the power given in the Revised Statutes, the powers are ample, and both abatement, fine, or imprisonment may be given in the sentence, unless such fine or imprisonment be for a higher sum or longer term than is justified by the charter of the town. If the act of 1895 repeals all prior legislation upon the subject, yet such act contains enough to empower the passing of such ordinance upon such subject.

"This brings us to a consideration of the sixth exception. What is the effect of the ordinance which was passed by the town council upon the recommendation of the board of health as required by 8 of the act of 1895? In this connection it is to be observed that, while such ordinance prohibits the keeping of a hog within the corporate limits, it does not in so many words call it a nuisance, although it treats such matter in the same manner as if it had been denominated a of a city ordinance relating to the interment of the dead within the city limits, and the removal of dead bodies from such limits, even though it was alleged that such ordinance was void, leaving the parties to their remedy at law.

So, an ordinance may prohibit the future interment of the dead in an established burial ground as well as the removal of dead bodies therefrom, the same being within the police power of the state, for the reason that, although a burial ground in the infancy of a town may be outside of the limits thereof, yet its continuance as a place of interment upon the growth of the town may be a nuisance to the city. Humphreys v. Front Street M. E. Church, South, 100 N. C. 132, 138.

And an ordinance prohibiting the burial of the dead in any burial ground situated in a particular portion of the city was upheld as not conflicting with the Constitution and as being for the benefit of the public health and a proper exercise of the power vested in municipal bodies. New York v. Slack, 3 Wheel. Crim. Cas. 237. In this case, however, it did not appear that the act was specially declared a nuisance.

So, the trustees of a village or town under the act of incorporation may have a right to pass an ordinance regulating or restraining the use of any specific cemetery within its limits on the ground that its use will be injurious to public health and therefore a nuisance, and such an official determination on the part of the town authorities will be entitled to the respect that such municipal action always receives in courts of justice. Lake View v. Letz, 44 Ill. 81, 83.

In People, Oak Hill Cemetery Assn., v. Pratt, 129 N. Y. 68, 72, although it did not appear that the act constituted a nuisance, the court upheld the power of a common council to pass an ordinance prohibiting the burial of the dead in a cemetery within the city limits except in certain cemeteries named therein as being within the powers of a charter giving power to "make, modify, and repeal such ordinances, by-laws, and regulations as it shall deem reasonable within the said city" specifically mentioning those "to regulate the burial of the dead," such an ordinance being a police regulation.

In Charleston v. Wentworth Street Baptist Church, 4 Strobb. L. 305, an ordinance prohibiting the establishment of new burial grounds within the city limits was upheld as being within the power given to municipalities for the protection of the public security, welfare, and convenience. In 38 L. R. A.

this case also the act was not specifically declared a nuisance.

It has been stated that the removal of the dead is not a matter of public indifference, but affects the public health, and its regulation is strictly within the police powers of the state. Re Wong Yung Quy, 6 Sawy. 442, 447.

The right of the legislature to authorize the removal of the remains of the dead from cemeteries may be said to be well settled, and may be delegated to municipalities, being a police power necessary to public health and comfort. Craig v. First Presby. Church, 88 Pa. 42, 51, 32 Am. Rep. 417. To the same effect, Kincaid's Appeal, 66 Pa. 411, 420.

And the surviving relatives of the dead being entitled to their bodies as property, with a right to dispose of the same, cannot be permitted to create a nuisance, and therefore they may be required by city or town ordinance, especially in cases where the population is dense, to conform to certain rules and regulations in respect to the burial of the dead. Bogert v. Indianapolis, 13 Ind. 131.

Again, a municipal corporation, granting lands for the purpose of interment with a covenant for quiet enjoyment, will not be estopped by reason of such covenant from passing an ordinance or by-law, under the provisions of their charter, for the suppression of such interment as a nuisance, or for the public benefit and safety. Coats v. New York, 7 Cow. 585. To the same effect, Stuyvesant v. New York, 7 Cow. 588.

Therefore an ordinance passed pursuant to a state statute authorizing the corporation of a city to make various by-laws as deemed necessary and proper, for regulating, or, if they find it necessary, preventing, the interment of the dead within the city, which prohibits such interment within certain parts of a city under a penalty, is valid and operative as to such interments, the act being constitutional, not impairing the obligation of any contract, or taking private property for public use without compensation; such acts standing on the ground of an authority to make police regulations in respect to nuisances, even as against parties who have a right under grants of their title to land held in trust for the sole purpose of interment, some of which have been held and used for that purpose for more than a century, and to which certain fees are incident, interring bodies in the part of the city to which such by-laws related. Coats v. New York, 7 Cow. 585.

The supervisors, assessors, and commissioners of

'nuisance.' In this connection it bears a resemblance to the ordinance of the town council of Summerville for a violation of which Judge Pressley was fined. Assuming for the present that the town council had the power to pass the ordinance, no question can be made whether a 'nuisance' has been committed nor whether the restrictions complained of were necessary to accomplish the purpose in view. It was their exclusive right to judge what was 'necessary and requisite' to preserve the health of the town. Summerville v. Pressley, 38 S. C. 61, 8 L. R. A. 854. Again in the same case it was contended that the citizen 'was not bound to conform to the restrictions as to the amount to be cultivated for general agricultural purposes, without allegation and proof that such cultivation was negligent or of such a character as to create a nuisance. As it seems to us, this view ignores entirely the existence of the ordinance.' Summerville v. Pressley, 38 S. C. 61, 8 L. R. A. 854. So, here, that the hog is properly or cleanly kept is beyond the question. It may be now so kept, and may not be so kept in the future, or it may be so kept in the future. I can very well understand that, however well and cleanly kept a hog may be, the smell, the noise, indecent exhibitions, etc., may necessitate such an ordinance. This may be emphasized by reason of the levelness of the territory, the probability of smell being circumscribed or confined, or other circumstances showing a prepared and fertilized hotbed for the rapid growth and development of contagion upon its sudden arrival. The legislature having granted the power, the exercise of it, according to the decisions of the courts of this state, is left to the discretion of the municipal corporation, which discretion cannot be controlled highways of an incorporated town, having powers for the purposes of municipal government to abate and remove nuisances, and punish the authors thereof by penalties, fines, and imprisonment, and to authorize and direct the summary abatement thereof, have no power to pass an ordinance forbidding the establishment of a cemetery, inasmuch as the preventive powers so vested in them can only be exercised in reference to those things which are nuisances in themselves, a cemetery not necessarily being in itself a nuisance. Lake View v. Letz, 44 Ill. 81, 88.

An act conferring upon the common council the power to establish cemeteries or burial places within or without the city, and to provide for the sanctity of the dead, and to prohibit interments except in cemeteries heretofore established by law, does not authorize the common council to prohibit the establishment of cemeteries or burial grounds by others without the corporate limits, nor does it give the city any jurisdiction or control over them so as to enable them to restrain the same as nuisances. Begein v. Anderson, 28 Ind. 79, 81.

So, where authority is conferred by special act of the legislature to purchase ground for the erection of a cemetery by a municipality, such cemetery not being a nuisance of itself, a municipal corporation has no power to abate the same upon the ground that it is or would become a nuisance and detrimental to the health of the city, the mere fact that it depreciates the value of surrounding property not affecting the case. New Orleans v. Church of St. Louis, 11 La. Ann. 244.

The provisions of Mass. Stat. 1832, chap. 150, establishing a board of health for a particular district, and regulating the burial of the dead, are invalid upon the ground that they invade the right of property under the guise of a police regulation for the preservation of health and the suppression of nuisances, such not being the manifest intent and purpose of the regulation. Austin v. Murray, 16 Pick. 121, 123.

In the English case of Reg. v. Price, L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 247, 53 L. J. M. C. N. S. 51, 33 Week. Rep. 45, note, 15 Cox, C. C. 389, tried at the Cardiff assizes in the Queen's bench division in the high court of justices in February, 1884, it was held that a person who burns instead of burying a dead body does not commit a criminal act unless he does so in such a manner as to amount to a public nuisance at common law. From this case it would seem that the mere act of burning instead of burying a dead body is not a public nuisance in itself.

1. Dead animals.

A dead hog or steer or sheep is not per se a nuisance. 83 L. R. A.

sance. River Rendering Co. v. Behr, 77 Mo. 98, 46 Am. Rep. 6.

So a dead hog is not per se a nuisance, even though it died of suffocation, and is not necessarily dangerous to public health. Underwood v. Green, 42 N. Y. 140, 142.

While a dead animal is not per se a nuisance, it may become so in a city; and under its charter a city may pass such ordinances as are necessary to prevent it from becoming a nuisance; but the city must in such legislation have a proper regard to the rights of the owner of such property. River Rendering Co. v. Behr, 77 Mo. 98, 46 Am. Rep. 6.

And until a dead animal does become a nuisance due regard must be had to the property rights of the owner. Schoen v. Atlanta, 97 Ga. 697, 33 L. R. A. 804.

But since it may become a nuisance of a very offensive and dangerous character unless some disposition is promptly made of it which will prevent its becoming so, municipal authorities need not wait until it has actually reached that stage before undertaking to deal with it as a nuisance. Schoen v. Atlanta, 97 Ga. 697, 33 L. R. A. 804.

Under §221, ¶227, Ill. Crim. Code (Starr & C.), p. 815, it is a public nuisance to cause or suffer the carcass of any dead animal or any other filth or noisome substance to be collected, deposited, or to remain in any place to the prejudice of others. Seacord v. People, 121 Ill. 623, 628.

Where the evidence showed that the effluvia emanating from the carcasses of dead animals and the filth there accumulated were so offensive as to render uncomfortable physically every one of the persons mentioned and others within the range of its effects, it was held a finding that the degree of discomfort produced by the noisome odors therefrom constituted it a public nuisance was correct. Seacord v. People, 121 Ill. 623, 629, 632.

In determining whether a nuisance which consists in causing or suffering the carcasses of dead animals, etc., to be collected, deposited, or to remain in any place to the prejudice of another, which establishments are prima facie nuisances, are really nuisances in fact, the location, whether convenient or otherwise, as well as the management and effect produced on the neighborhood, must be considered. Seacord v. People, 121 Ill. 623, 628.

And an ordinance of a city relating to the removal of the bodies of dead animals in such a way as not to become a public nuisance will be upheld. Alpers v. Brown, 60 Cal. 447.

A city has power to provide by ordinance for the removal of all dead animals, not slain for human food, from within the city limits, in such a manner as not to become nuisances, and therefore by the courts, unless the exercise of the power violates some constitutional provision. Kennedy v. Sowden, 1 McMull. L. 326; Crosby v. Warren, 1 Rich. L. 385; Charleston v. Wentworth Street Baptist Church, 4 Strobb. L. 810; State, Copes, v. Charleston, 10 Rich. L. 502; Sumnerville v. Pressley, 33 S. C. 61, 8 L. R. A. 854. The two former cases grew out of ordinances prohibiting the running at large of hogs, etc. The first is valuable as showing an attempt to prove that the judgment of the town council was erroneous, and that 'hogs were the best of scavengers, and do their duty better than all the marshals the town ever had.' Kennedy v. Sowden, 1 McMull. L. 325. Surely if hogs running at large are injurious to the health of the town, the confinement of a hog in a town lot in summer time can be considered injurious, actual, or imminent.

"We have seen that such an ordinance did an ordinance providing for the removal of such animals by a person designated by the authorities in cases where the owner neglects to remove the same within a specified time will be upheld as constitutional. National Fertilizer Co. v. Lambert, 48 Fed. Rep. 458, 462.

Yet the death of a domestic animal does not determine the owner's property, and while he may be required to make such use or disposition of the carcass as will prevent a nuisance, stench, or other inconvenience to the neighborhood the municipal authorities cannot arbitrarily deprive him of his property by giving it to another. River Rendering Co. v. Behr, 77 Mo. 98, 46 Am. Rep. 6.

A city has power by ordinance lawfully to prescribe that unless the owner of a dead animal, even though its carcass may be of some value, shall remove it, or cause it to be removed, beyond the city limits within a specified reasonable time, and to a specified reasonable distance, the municipal authorities may deal with such carcasses as a nuisance per se, and as such take charge of it and make such disposition thereof as will best conserve the public health. Schoen v. Atlanta, 97 Ga. 697, 33 L. R. A. 804.

Such authorities, however, have no right to prescribe that, after such removal beyond the limits within the time allowed, it shall be deposited at such place only as they shall designate, and therefore when the owner has, within the prescribed time, removed such carcass to a sufficient distance to prevent its becoming a nuisance, the municipal authorities have no further jurisdiction. Schoen v. Atlanta, 97 Ga. 697, 33 L. R. A. 804.

An ordinance of the city of Buffalo declaring the rendering of dead animals a nuisance and dangerous to the public health, and ordering the same to be immediately suppressed and prohibited within the city, which ordinance was duly published and a copy served upon the plaintiff, confers upon the board power to suppress the nuisance. Cushing v. Buffalo Bd. of Health, 13 N. Y. S. R. 783.

In River Rendering Co. v. Behr, 77 Mo. 98, 46 Am. Rep. 6, a city ordinance providing for the removal of the carcasses of dead animals from the streets of a city, giving to one person the right to make such removal and to convert the carcasses of all animals found dead in the city not slain for the purposes of food to his own use, which ordinance completely bars the owner's right to dispose of such animals, even before they become a nuisance, is unconstitutional and invalid for the reason that although the general assembly may confer upon the municipal authorities the power to abate nuisances and to declare what shall be deemed nuisances, yet such power cannot be so absolute as to be beyond the recognition of the courts to determine not transcend the powers granted; that their exercise was constitutional. Is the remedy laid down by the Revised Statutes (abatement and removal) exclusive? It is plain to be seen that the act of 1895 gives the council power to inflict all penalties for the violation thereof, as well as expenses necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the same shall be recoverable for the use of the town or city in the same manner as penalties for the violation of the town or city ordinances, subject to the like limitation as to the amount thereof. If it were needed to show that the words 'penalties for the violation thereof' could include fines, we have only to look at our own case of Crosby v. Warren, 1 Rich. L. 386, 387. I conclude, therefore, from the law and evidence admitted that the appeal shall be dismissed. Let this report be inserted in the case on appeal, in lieu of the memorandum heretofore written."

whether it has been reasonably exercised in a given case or not, there being no right or necessity to take from a man his property and give it to another until such property is in such condition that it is, or is so used that it is likely to become, a nuisance, and until it has become a nuisance an opportunity should be given to the owner to change the use, or make such disposition of his property as will prevent the danger.

So, under an ordinance relating to the removal from any public place of any garbage or dead animal, making it unlawful for any other person than the contractor under the city ordinance to remove and dispose of dead animals, the property itself, which is the carcass of a dead animal, not being a nuisance, the owner thereof cannot be prevented from obtaining its value, and cannot be denied the right of making any disposition of it, as under police regulations the property of one man cannot be given to another, although a city may, as a sanitary measure, after giving a proper opportunity to dispose of such animals, authorize another to take them away and appropriate them to his own use, such measure being necessary in warm climates in order to prevent nuisances injurious to health; but although this may be so, yet the necessity of such ordinances will not justify a common council in so declaring all dead animals not killed for human food nuisances immediately after death. State v. Morris, 47 La. Ann. 1690.

And proceedings taken under the provisions of the ordinance regulating the abatement of nuisances are not justifiable, where the animals seized by the public authorities and disposed of under the city ordinance died from suffocation in transportation on the railroad, there being no evidence that they are offensive or dangerous in any way to the public health, or that the owner has abandoned or is unwilling to take proper care of them,—especially where they are taken away before the owner has an opportunity to take care of or remove such animals, and there is no evidence to show that there is any intention to make an improper use of them. Underwood v. Green, 42 N. Y. 140, 142.

Again, a city ordinance giving power to the city inspector to cause all putrid and unsound beef, pork, fish, hides, or skins, all dead animals and every putrid, offensive, unsound, or unwholesome substance found in any street or other place in the city, to be forthwith removed and disposed of by removal beyond the city, or otherwise, so as most effectually to secure the public health, in so far as it relates to dead animals, cannot be literally construed so as to give power to remove, with impunity, dead animals provided for food, the words, "dead animals," as used therein, when read in connection with the terms used and the object of the

The grounds of appeal were as follows:

"(1) Because the ordinance in question was not a reasonable or proper exercise of the police power vested in the board of health and the town council, and, inasmuch as it deprived the citizens of a valuable right in property without justification in police power and without compensation, is unconstitutional and void, and his honor, the circuit judge, should have so held, and he erred in holding to the contrary. (2) Because the keeping of his hog by the appellant was, as appears from the facts agreed on, not a nuisance detrimental to health and the requirement that he remove and keep it beyond the town limits without compensation, for the right so taken away was unjustifiable and unconstitutional, and the circuit judge should have so held, and he erred in not so holding. (3) Because his honor, the circuit judge, erred in holding the ordinance in question constitutional, authorized by the powers vested in the board of health and the town council of the town of Darlington by the statutory law of the state and a reasonable exercise of the police power to preserve the health of the town; that, if an unreasonable exercise of the police power, its reasonableness could not be questioned by the court; and in dismissing the appeal. (4) Because the circuit judge erred in holding that the board of health of the town of Darlington at the date of the passage of the ordinance in question was authorized by law 'to define and declare what shall be nuisances to health in lots, streets, etc., . . . and to prohibit and remove any nuisance or offensive matter in any public highway, road, street, or other place, public or private,' etc. (5) Because the act of 1895, declaring the powers and the duties of boards of health, repeals all acts inconsistent therewith ordinance, meaning such as are nuisances or dangerous or deleterious to public health. Underwood v. Green, 42 N. Y. 142.

A city has power under § 15, art. 3, of the Nebraska Constitution, to contract for the removal therefrom of dead animals, garbage, and other noxious and unwholesome matter for the prevention and abatement of nuisances. Smiley v. MacDonald, 42 Neb. 5, 27 L. R. A. 540, 545.

If a city has contracted for the removal of the bodies of dead animals from the city, it may recall such contract in toto in order to prevent a nuisance arising from such carcasses; and so, if it becomes necessary to make new regulations for the removal of such carcasses for the purpose of preventing a nuisance, the city has a right to require such new regulations to be carried out, provided they are not inconsistent with the party's essential rights under the contract. Louisville v. Wible, 84 Ky. 220, 226.

And the court will refuse an injunction to restrain one, acting under a contract made with the city, from removing animals which have died of disease, as, under § 62 of the Ohio Laws of 1852, cities of the first class have power to legislate and make all needful regulations to promote public health, prevent disease, and abate nuisances, it being within the power of the city council under such act to enact ordinances prohibiting dead animals from being carried through the streets without a permit, and also to contract with persons for the removal of such animals. Morgan v. Cincinnati, 12 Ohio L. J. 41.

A contract known as the dead-animal contract, which relates to the removal of dead animals not slain for human food, and provides for their being disposed of in such a manner as not to become a nuisance, is one within the competency of the municipality to make, as it is within the power of such body to provide for the health of its inhabitants, by causing the removal from the city limits of all dead animals not slain for human food. The California Constitution providing that any county, city, or township may make and enforce, within its limits, all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with the general laws, the consolidation act of 1863 giving power to the board of supervisors to authorize a summary abatement of nuisances, and to make regulations for the preservation of the public health and the prevention of contagious diseases, and to provide by regulations for the prevention and summary removal of all nuisances and obstructions in the streets, alleys, highways, and public grounds of the city and county. Alpers v. San Francisco, 32 Fed. Rep. 503.

3. The keeping of animals.

The principal case of DARLINGTON v. WARD, in holding an ordinance prohibiting in toto the keeping of any hog in the town, valid and reasonable as within the powers conferred by the South Carolina statute, is perhaps the strongest case that has yet been decided upon the question of municipal control over nuisances of this character. In the numerous cases discussed below, none will be found upholding such a stringent ordinance as the one in question in that case, but, on the other hand, cases will be found wherein such ordinances have been held void as too broad and sweeping in their provisions, and as being ultra vires in their general restrictions because they are not confined or restricted to such cases as are nuisances. See McKnight v. Toronto, 3 Ont. Rep. 224; Ex parte O'Leary, 65 Miss. 80. Other cases dealing with such animals as nuisances have clearly dealt with them as such, or the ordinances passed thereon have been mere regulations and partial restrictions on the keeping of such animals. This would seem to be the full extent to which the courts have previously gone, and it may be questioned whether such an ordinance as the one under discussion in the principal case is not too broad and sweeping a restriction upon the rights of the individual and of the public, as contended by the dissenting opinions of the chief justice and one of his associates.

Municipal corporations may legislate upon the restriction of the keeping of unlimited herds of swine and cows in a thickly populated district, and the keeping of such animals may be an occupation, and within certain limits may be detrimental to health and dangerous to the public safety, so as to amount to a nuisance. Re Linehan, 72 Cal. 114, 116.

Hogs may or may not be a nuisance, and any ordinance dealing therewith must be framed according to the fact that they are nuisances in fact. Ex parte O'Leary, 65 Miss. 80.

It has been held that a hog pen in a city is a nuisance. Com. v. Van Sickle, Brightly (Pa.) 69, 73; Atty. Gen. v. Steward, 20 N. J. Eq. 415, 420.

The stench from a hogpen, in order to be a nuisance, must be offensive to a person of ordinary sensitiveness. Burlingt. n v. Stockwell (Kan. App.) 47 Pac. 968.

Where droves of live hogs were kept on certain premises in such numbers and for such length of time that the smell or stench arising from them proved an unquestionable nuisance the court or-

or contrary thereto, and provides a special mode for dealing with and removing nuisances detrimental to health, and this mode is exclusive of all others, and the circuit judge should have so held, and he erred in holding to the contrary. (6) Because the police power vested in the board of health and the town council, except in the case of actual nuisance, is a power to regulate, and not to destroy, and the ordinance in question is in excess of this power and so illegal and void, and it was error in the circuit judge not to have so held. (7) Because the circuit judge should have held that the ordinance in question was invalid, for the reason that it is not within the scope of the powers conferred by the legislature; has no substantial relation to the police, and ought to be subserved, and tends in no degree to accomplish that end; is unreasonable and oppressive; declares that to be a nuisance which manifestly is not a nuisance; and invades the rights of the citizen protected by the general laws of the state without express authority so to do; and he erred in not so holding."

Messrs. Boyd & Brown for appellant.

Messrs. Woods & Macfarlan for respondent.

Jones, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

I think the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed. I am unable to agree to the proposition so broadly stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice Pope as one sustained by authority and sound reason, viz., that in order that the police power may be used by either the legislature or a municipal corporation there must appear affirmatively that its use is reasonable. The police power being confined to dered the same to be abated. Babcock v. New Jersey Stock Yard Co. 20 N. J. Eq. 256.

A piggery in which swine are kept in such numbers that their natural odors fill the air thereabouts and make the occupation of the neighboring houses and passage over the adjacent highways disagreeable or worse is a nuisance. Com. v. Perry, 139 Mass. 198; Com. v. Kidder, 107 Mass. 188, 192; Reg. v. Wigr. 2 Salk. 460, 2 Ld. Raym. 1168.

In State v. Payson, 37 Me. 361, the defendant was found guilty of a nuisance in keeping swine in a pen near the public highway so as to create noisome and offensive smells.

People locating their piggeries near a public road must take the necessary care to keep them in such a cleanly state as not to annoy the passengers along the road. Com. v. Hutz, Brightly (Pa.) 75, note.

And if it is shown that the stench from hogpens is a public nuisance, the fact that such pens are kept as clean as they can be under the circumstances affords no defense. Burlington v. Stockwell (Kan. App.) 47 Pac. 968.

The keeping of a hogpen may be a nuisance, and as such a violation of criminal law; one which was punishable as a nuisance at the common law, and which is punishable under the Kansas statute. So held in Re Bolts, 80 Kan. 758, in which case the city charter authorized the city council to make regulations to secure the general health of the city and to prevent and remove nuisances.

So, an ordinance declaring hogpens to be a nuisance, and providing for their removal, is a valid exercise of police power. St. Louis v. Stern, 8 Mo. App. 48, 55.

And if a person violates an ordinance which provides the rules or regulations of the board of health as to the keeping of hogs, by keeping one hog not for the purposes of commerce, he creates a nuisance, because of the rule or regulation of the board of health, such ordinance being reasonable and valid, even though it makes the offense a misdemeanor, and although the pen being clean there is no nuisance by reason of filth. State, Cedar Rapids v. Holcomb, 68 Iowa, 107, 56 Am. Rep. 852.

Where the defendant was charged with unlawfully and injuriously making, erecting, setting up, continuing, and using a certain inclosure, pen, or lot of ground in which cattle and hogs were confined, fed, matured, and retained, and the excrements, decayed food, and other filth retained upon and within such inclosure, which employment or use of an inclosure occasioned noxious exhalations, offensive, unwholesome smells, so that the air was then and there greatly corrupted and infested thereby, and other annoyances becoming and being dangerous to the health, comfort, and property of the people residing in the immediate neighborhood, and that the same was dangerous to health and comfort as being a common and public nuisance, it was held that the same was a nuisance under § 4409 of Iowa Rev. Stat. as well as at common law. State v. Kaster, 35 Iowa, 221.

So, where the defendant was charged with keeping within the city sundry pens wherein he confined horses, mules, cattle, sheep, and hogs, and by reason of their filth and excrement unhealthy and pernicious smells were occasioned, and the air was greatly corrupted and infested, he was held guilty of creating a nuisance, even though such business had been carried on by him for thirty years, and when first created was entirely outside of the city limits. Ashbrook v. Com. 1 Bush, 139, 89 Am. Dec. 618.

Under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 26, §§ 2, 5, in default of appointment of a board of health, the city council constitutes such board, and has power to make such regulations as it judges necessary for the public health and safety, respecting nuisances, sources of filth, and causes of sickness, and under such power a by-law, passed by such council, prohibiting the keeping of swine within particular districts of a city, is reasonable and valid, the keeping of swine not being a trade within the meaning of §§ 52, 60, of chapter 26 of such statutes. Com. v. Patch, 97 Mass. 221.

A city ordinance prohibiting the keeping of swine within certain parts of a city is a reasonable exercise of the power vested in municipal corporations, being for the protection of the inhabitants and travelers from offensive and unwholesome smells and for the prevention of nuisances, the city council, in default of the appointment of any other, constituting the board of health, and as such has the power to make necessary regulations respecting nuisances, sources of filth, and causes of sickness. Com. v. Patch, 97 Mass. 221, 223, 224.

And under § 52, chap. 26, Mass. Gen. Stat., the board of health has power from time to time to assign certain places for the exercising of any trade or employment which is a nuisance or hurtful to the inhabitants, or dangerous to the public health, or the exercise of which is attended by noisome and injurious odors, or is otherwise injurious to their estates, and may prohibit the exercise of the same in places not so assigned, and may also forbid the exercise of such trade or employment within the limits of the town, or in any particular locality thereof.

And the regulation of the Massachusetts board of health in 1881, with regard to the keeping of swine, is within the above section of the statute, the keeping of swine within a prohibited district legislation for the public health, the public morals, and the public safety, whether a particular regulation falls within the scope of the police power is necessarily a judicial question, but, falling within this scope, whether the regulation is reasonable is not a judicial question. It is sometimes asserted by courts that a police regulation may be declared void because it is unreasonable, but this view is not sound, in my judgment. Courts "cannot run a race of opinions upon points of right, reason, and expediency with the lawmaking power." No act of a legislature can be declared void or unconstitutional unless it conflicts with some provision of the Constitution. Nor can any ordinance of any municipal corporation within the power conferred by the legislature, and not in conflict with the laws and Constitution of the state, be impeached in a court for unreasonableness. A critical examination of cases holding police regulations void, because unreasonable, will disclose that the attempted police regulation violated some constitutional guaranty. The right asserted by some courts to declare a municipal ordinance invalid because unreasonable is limited to ordinances passed under the implied or incidental powers of the municipality. In such cases I think the true thing is that such ordinances may be declared invalid only when they are so clearly unreasonable, oppressive, or violative of common right as to justify a court in concluding that the legislature did not intend to grant such power in the charter. In the last analysis it is a question of legislative intent, and not a question of reasonableness. But, whatever may be the rule in reference to the implied power of a municipality, I think it is clear that when the legislature, having power to authorize, does empower a municipal corporation to pass such ordinances on a specified subject, as they deem necessary to promote the particular being an employment within the terms of such statute which may be abated as a nuisance. Com. v. Young, 135 Mass. 523.

And an order and notice containing a sufficient direction to the defendant under Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 80, §§ 18-22, to abate a nuisance consisting in the keeping of hogs within forty-eight hours from the service of the notice, is good and is not rendered invalid by the addition of the further direction to remove the hogs, and therefore the authorities are justified in compelling the removal of the nuisance as being injurious to health and a source of filth. Com. v. Alden, 143 Mass. 118.

So, the board of health have authority to forbid the exercise of the employment of keeping swine in a town although the order is qualified by the words "without a permit in writing first obtained from the board of health," under Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 80, § 84. Quincy v. Kennard, 151 Mass. 563.

In Pierce v. Bartrum, 1 Cowp. 299, a city ordinance providing, inter alia, that no butcher should keep swine within the walls of the city, nor any stinking filth, garbage, or annoyance within his house, outhouse, or backside, was upheld as not in restraint of trade, but as a regulation made in confirmation of the charter, and therefore reasonable.

A by-law made by a town council, under the provisions of § 90 of the English municipal corporation act, 5 & 6 Wm. IV. chap. 78, which prohibits the keeping of pigs or swine within the borough from the 1st of May to the 31st of October inclusive is invalid as being against the keeping of pigs generally, the court stating that by-laws of that kind always have the qualification "so as to be a nuisance." Everett v. Grapea, 3 L. T. N. S. 659.

Under the English public health act of 1875, § 47, it is an offense to keep swine so as to be a nuisance within the common-law meaning of the term, and it is not necessary that there should be injury to health. Banbury Urban Sanitary Authority v. Page, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 97, 51 L. J. M. C. N. S. 21, 45 L. T. N. S. 759, 30 Week. Rep. 415, 46 J. P. 184.

In Chelsea v. King, 34 L. J. M. C. N. S. 9, 17 C. B. N. S. 623, 10 Jur. N. S. 1150, 11 L. T. N. S. 419, 13 Week. Rep. 157, it was held that § 68 of the English statute, Geo. III. chap. 29, for the suppression of nuisances in keeping of pigs within 40 yards of any street whether the same be a nuisance or not, within a certain district of the metropolis, was a power of prevention and not of suppression, and did not therefore apply to a larger district mentioned in statute 25 & 26 Vict. chap. 102, § 78, whereby the power of improving and regulating streets and for the suppression of nuisances contained in the prior statute were applied to a larger district.

So, a by-law of the city providing that no person shall keep, nor shall there be kept within the city, any pig or swine, or any piggery, is ultra vires as being a general prohibition, and not restricted to such as are a nuisance. McKnight v. Toronto, 3 Ont. Rep. 234.

And a city ordinance which declares the erection of hog-pens within any inclosure in the city limits, or the permitting of hogs to run at large within any lot or inclosure in a city, except at slaughter pens authorized by the board of aldermen, and all hog-pens or lots now used as such, to be nuisances and provides for the abatement thereof, is too broad and sweeping in its provisions, and is therefore invalid. Ex parte O'Leary, 65 Miss. 80.

Under the police power, in order to prevent nuisances, city authorities have a right to pass ordinances regulating the keeping of dogs. Blair v. Forehand, 100 Mass. 136, 139, 1 Am. Rep. 94; Partbault v. Wilson, 34 Minn. 254; Morey v. Brown, 43 N. H. 373; Mitchell v. Williams, 37 Ind. 62; Carter v. Dow, 16 Wis. 239; Tenney v. Lena, 16 Wis. 566; Ex parte Cooper, 3 Tex. App. 439.

In Com. v. Steffee, 7 Bush, 161, an ordinance regulating the keeping of dogs and providing for the consequences of damages occasioned thereby was upheld under the charter authorizing the public authorities to pass any police laws for security and comfort consistent with the Constitution and laws of the state, although such ordinance did not constitute such keeping specifically a nuisance.

So, the keeping of a ferocious dog in such a manner as to allow it to go at large and become dangerous and an annoyance and terror to the neighborhood or to the public is a nuisance. Com. v. McClung, 3 Clark (Pa.) 413.

And an ordinance providing for the muzzling of dogs or for the keeping of the same upon the owner's own premises, and authorizing the killing of such as are found at large, passed pursuant to a charter giving power to declare, prevent, abate, and remove nuisances, was upheld in Haller v. Sheridan, 27 Ind. 494.

As to the right to kill dogs, see note to Hubbard v. Preston (Mich.), 15 L. R. A. 249.

Where the state Constitution gives power to a county, city, town, or township to make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with the general laws, and an act of the state legislature confers power upon the board of supervisors of the city and county to authorize and direct the summary abatement of nuisances, and to regulate the preservation of the public health and the prevention of contagious diseases, a city ordinance prohibiting the keeping of more than two object, and such ordinances are passed within the power conferred, the courts have nothing whatever to do with the reasonableness of the ordinances. Stated more briefly, a municipal ordinance, within the constitutional grant of the legislature, cannot be impeached in court for unreasonableness. The doctrine of judicial interference with town ordinances, on the ground of unreasonableness, has not been affirmed before in this state. On the contrary, our own cases repudiate the doctrine. In Crosby v. Warren, 1 Rich. L. 887, the court said: "The act gives the power to pass by-laws on the subject of streets, health, and good order, subject to the restrictions that they shall not be inconsistent with the laws of the land and legislative revision. On these subjects, and with these restrictions, their power is unlimited; and, if in their judgment the hog license to run at large be injurious to the streets or health of the citizens, they have a right to legislate on the subject, and pass laws for the removal or abatement of it, as a nuisance." In this opinion all the court concurred except Judge Wardlaw. He, however, in his dissenting opinion, said: "An apprehension that hogs might become nuisances, in vulgar phrase, that is, troublesome and disagreeable, formed no doubt the reason, and perhaps a very sufficient reason, why the council desired to prevent their coming within the corporate limits. Of that, as a matter affecting, or supposed to affect, the welfare and convenience of the village, the council were the judges, and their decision is just as binding, if it be erroneous, as it would be if it were correct, provided they adopted such means to effect their purpose as the charter authorized. Within the range of subjects to which their power of legislating extended, and not opposing the law of the land, their discretion is the rule; they may direct and may prohibit." In cows within certain limits within the city and county was held valid. Re Linehan, 72 Cal. 114, 116.

So, a by-law of a city providing that no cow shall be kept in any stable situated at a less distance than 40 feet from the nearest dwelling house, and where two cows are kept that the stable shall not be less than 80 feet from such dwelling house, is reasonable and unobjectionable. It not being necessary to declare expressly that the keeping of cows within such a distance is or may be a nuisance, although the prohibition is in effect such a declaration. McKnight v. Toronto, 8 Ont. Rep. 284.

In State v. Mabner, 48 La. Ann. 496, a city ordinance prescribing the limits within which dairies might be conducted by permission of the city council, and making it unlawful to keep more than two cows without a permit of the city council, was held not to be general in its operation as it did not affect all citizens alike who followed the same occupation, inasmuch as it was only those who kept more than two cows without permission who were subject to the penalties, and therefore the ordinance was unconstitutional and void.

And the same construction was put upon a similar ordinance in State v. Dulaney, 48 La. Ann. 500.

Under a statute declaring by implication the keeping of animals with the glanders to be nuisances, and directing the summary killing thereof, all horses are not declared nuisances. Miller v. Horton, 152 Mass. 540, 543, 10 L. R. A. 116, decided under Mass. Act of 1887, section 12.

In Newark & S. O. Horse Car R. Co. v. Hunt, 50 N. J. L. 308, the plaintiff claimed damages against the defendants for killing certain horses belonging to him, the defendants justifying their action under the provisions of the supplement to an act establishing a state board of health and preventing the spreading of glanders in horses, and making horses afflicted with that disease common nuisances, and authorizing the destruction of the same; and the court upheld the constitutionality of the acts as being within the police power, even though they authorized the summary abatement of such nuisances, the act leaving the question of justification in the killing of such animals open to proof.

Where the owner of a horse denies that the horse falls within the class declared to be nuisances, the legislature may not make the ex parte decision of the board conclusive upon it, and such determination is no defense in an action by the owner for compensation. Miller v. Horton, 152 Mass. 540, 543, 10 L. R. A. 116.

And under a city charter giving the authorities power to prevent and remove nuisances, an ordinance which prohibits the showing or exhibiting of certain horses in the town is within the power, such horses being a nuisance. Nolin v. Franklin, 4 Yerg. 163.

But in regard to the keeping of such horses it has been stated that to constitute a public nuisance it must be in a public place, or in such a place as the public can come within range of it. Ex parte Robinson, 30 Tex. App. 493, 495, wherein the keeping of such a certain horse within the town was done in such a manner that the public could neither hear nor see.

Although by articles 408 and 408 of Tex. Rev. Stat. authority is given to cities to pass ordinances for the abatement of all nuisances affecting the public health or comfort, and to punish the authors in a manner defined thereby, and article 383 gives them power to license, tax, and regulate trades, professions, occupations, and callings the taxing of which is not prohibited by the Constitution, the keeping of such a horse is not in contravention of the laws and purposes of the state, and therefore an ordinance which declares such keeping to be a nuisance is invalid. Ex parte Robinson, 30 Tex. App. 493, 495.

E. Articles of food.

The by-law of a town council of a borough providing that any butcher or dealer in meat, or any fishmonger, poulterer, or other person exposing or offering for sale on his premises, or having in his possession with intent to sell or expose for sale, any meat, fish, poultry, or other victuals or food unfit for the food of man, shall be subject to a penalty to be recovered before the justices, who shall decide of the unfitness, applies to a grocer exposing cheese upon his premises found to be unfit for food; the exposing for sale, or having possession of with intent to sell, things unfit for food, being a nuisance at common law, the by-law being within the powers of § 90 of the municipal corporation act. 5 & 6 Wm. IV. chap. 76. Shillito v. Thompson, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 12, 45 L. J. M. C. N. S. 18, 33 L. T. N. S. 503, 24 Week. Rep. 57.

The English public health act of 1875, §§ 116, 117, gives power to a medical officer of health or an inspector of nuisances to seize meat exposed for sale or deposited in any place for the purposes of sale or in preparation for sale, and intended for the food of man, which appears to be diseased or unsound and taken before a justice who has power to condemn the same and order it to be destroyed if Heisembrittle v. Charleston, 2 McMull. L. 236, the court said: "Such regulations are sometimes apparently tyrannical, but they must be submitted to as necessary police regulations. If they are tyrannical and unnecessary, the popular will can repeal them through the city council, or, if redress should fail there, by an appeal to the legislature." In Charleston v. Ahrens, 4 Strobb. L. 256, the court said: "This court, of course, has nothing to do with the policy of the ordinance. It may be very unjust, oppressive, and partial, or it may be one of those wise measures of prevention which experience has rendered necessary to circumvent the cunning of those who look more to their private gain than the interest of society." In Charleston v. Wentworth Street Baptist Church, 4 Strobb. L. 810, the court said: "It is sufficient to establish the grant that the power is or may be necessary for the welfare and government of the city. The city council has exclusively the authority to determine when the occasion may exist for its exercise, and the manner in which it should be applied. If an ordinance be exceptionable on these grounds, an appeal against its enforcement lies only to the corporators." In Summerville v. Pressley, 83 S. C. 61, 8 L. R. A. 854, the court said: "Assuming, for the present, that the town council had the power to pass the ordinance, no question can be made whether 'a nuisance' had been created, nor whether the restrictions complained of were necessary to accomplish the purpose in view. It was their exclusive right to judge what was necessary and requisite to preserve the health of the town." The case of State, Columbia Electric Street Light & P. Co., v. Sloan, 48 S. C. 21, is in harmony with the foregoing expressions, for the court declared the city ordinance questioned in that case valid, as within the municipal power, not in any wise because it appeared to the court to be reasonable, for the court expressly stated that "the question whether the ordinance is reasonable is not before the court for consideration." I think the case of Summerville v. Pressley, 83 S. C. 61, 8 L. R. A. 854, is conclusive for affirmance in this case. It is impossible, on principle, to distinguish that case from this. I cannot see how the recital in the Summerville ordinance that "it is necessary for the protection of the public health of Summerville that the soil should not be cultivated beyond a limited extent" differentiates that case from this, in which the ordinance in question contains no recital of the reason or necessity for its enactment.

so found to be diseased. It has been held that such meat might be so taken and condemned without summons or notice to the person to whom it belonged. White v. Redfern, L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 15, 49 L. J. M. C. N. S. 19, 41 L. T. N. S. 524, 28 Week. Rep. 168, 44 J. P. 87.

And under that statute a person having in his possession unsound meat intended for the food of man may be convicted, even though he may not have exposed the meat for sale. Mallinson v. Carr [1891] 1 Q. B. 49.

In Daly v. Webb, Ir. Rep. 4 C. L. 309, 18 Week. Rep. 631, diseased meat had been placed upon a cart and was passing along the streets of a city from a slaughter house to the place where it was to be manufactured into preserved meats, and was seized by the inspector of nuisances. It was held that his action was justifiable, the meat when placed upon the cart being exposed for sale and intended for the food of man within the meaning of Eng. Stat. 26 & 27 Vict. chap. 117, § 2, which gives power to the medical officer of health or the inspector of nuisances to make such seizure.

Unless there is some law making it essential to the validity of a town ordinance that it contain such recitals, a court is bound to assume that the lawmaking body thought it expedient or necessary, all this being implied from the mere fact of enactment. Besides, the record before us states that the ordinance in question here is "a health ordinance of the town of Darlington adopted as required by law, and now in force." In the Summerville Case, 83 S. C. 61, 8 L. R. A. 854, Judge Witherspoon held that the duty of the court was limited to the inquiry whether or not the power existed, and, if so, whether or not its exercise violated any constitutional provision, and his judgment sustaining the ordinance was affirmed. Justice McGowan, speaking for this court, quoted with approval from Harrison v. Baltimore, 1 Gill, 264, the following language: "Of the degree of necessity for such municipal legislation the mayor and city council of Baltimore were the exclusive judges. To their sound discretion is committed the selection of the means and manner (contributory to the end) of exercising the powers which they might deem requisite to the accomplishment of the objects of which they were made the guardians," etc.

Whatever, therefore, may be the law elsewhere, I think it is settled in this state that a municipal ordinance enacted within the power conferred by a constitutional act cannot be declared invalid because it is unreasonable. The ordinance in question here is clearly within the legislative grant, and it has not been shown that any constitutional provision has been violated thereby. But even granting the right of the courts to inquire into the reasonableness of an ordinance, the judgment below ought to be affirmed. Whether a particular ordinance is reasonable is a question of fact to be determined by the circumstances of the particular town or city, the objects in view, the necessity for its enactment, its tending to accomplish the purpose in view, etc. The evidence must be addressed to the trial court. This is a case at law, and it is well settled that this court will not reverse the judgment below on a question of fact in a case at law. According to the facts agreed on, Mr. Ward's inclosure wherein the hog was kept embraced about 2 acres in the town of Darlington. There is no report against Mr. Ward for keeping his premises in an uncleanly condition, which appear to the health officer who examined same to be clean and in proper general condition. The charge against him is for keeping the hog on the premises in placed upon the cart being exposed for sale and intended for the food of man within the meaning of Eng. Stat. 26 & 27 Vict. chap. 117, § 2, which gives power to the medical officer of health or the inspector of nuisances to make such seizure.

An ordinance prohibiting butcher's meat being sold within the corporate limits except in a public market was held valid as being for the benefit of health and good order. Winsboro v. Smart, 11 Rich. L. 551. In this case, however, it did not appear that the market was determined to be a nuisance, or that the power of a corporation to deal with it as a nuisance arose except in the arguments of counsel.

As to power of municipalities to regulate markets, see note to State v. Sarradat (La.) 24 L. R. A. 534.

violation of the ordinance. Mr. Ward admits keeping the hog on the premises, but denies the power of the council to pass and enforce the ordinance in question. It was admitted or stated in the "case" that the ordinance is a health ordinance. Upon this evidence the court was asked to declare the ordinance void. The circuit judge disposed of this in the following language: "So here that the hog is properly or cleanly kept is beyond the question. It may be now so kept, and may not be so kept in the future, or it may be so kept in the future. I can very well understand that, however well and cleanly kept a hog may be, the smell, the noise, indecent exhibitions, etc., may necessitate such an ordinance. This may be emphasized by reason of the levelness of the territory, the probability of smell being circumscribed or confined, or other circumstances showing a prepared and fertilized hotbed for the rapid growth and development of contagion on its sudden removal." If we had the power, can this court say upon the evidence that the circuit judge erred in finding, in effect, that the ordinance was reasonable and necessary? The presumptions are all in favor of the reasonableness of the ordinance. The burden of showing that the ordinance is not reasonable is upon him who assails it. What evidence was before the court to show the ordinance to be unreasonable, sufficient to override the implied fact of reasonableness and necessity, arising from the enactment of a health ordinance on the recommendation of a board of health charged with the duty of preserving the public health? Is the power of a town council to preserve the public health to be measured by the size of Mr. Ward's lot? Does the cleanly condition in which he keeps his premises relate in any way to the question whether the keeping of hogs within the limits of Darlington is or may become prejudicial to the health of the people of the town?

The judgment of the Circuit Court stands affirmed.

Davy, J., concurs.

Pope, J., dissenting:

The town council of Darlington, in this state, by an ordinance adopted on the 24th day of June, 1895, declared that it should be unlawful for any person to keep any hog or hogs within the limits of the town of Darlington after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1896, and that any person who shall transgress this ordinance shall be punished by a fine of not less than $10 or by imprisonment not exceeding thirty days. The defendant, J. J. Ward, violated this ordinance by keeping one hog in said town, which hog was allowed to run at large in a lot of 2 acres owned by said J. J. Ward. Mr. Ward was summoned for trial for said offense, and, appearing before the mayor according to the summons, admitted that it was true that he kept such hog on a 2 acre lot in said town, but denied that he was guilty of any offense thereby; that neither the board of health nor the town council have the power to pass the ordinance in question. He was adjudged guilty, and ordered to pay a fine of $20. From this judgment he appealed to the circuit court. When this appeal was heard it was dismissed, and he now appeals from such judgment to this court. The judgment of the circuit court and the grounds of appeal will be reported.

In considering this appeal I admit I have been greatly perplexed. Certain it is that the right of property is here involved, and it is equally certain that the power of the governmental agencies to protect public health is also hereby involved. If the question could be narrowed down to a question of private right, as opposed directly by the rights of the public, I should have no difficulty in subordinating the former to the latter, for in Charleston v. Wentworth Street Baptist Church, 4 Strobb. L.

808, this court held: "It is the office of the judges to make such a construction as will redress the mischief and advance the remedy; . . . that the law will never, by any construction, advance a private interest to the destruction of a public; but, on the contrary, will advance the public interest as far as it is possible, though it be to the prejudice of a private one." The case just cited arose from these facts: The corporation of the Wentworth Street Baptist Church was organized after the year 1836. It owned a lot of land in the city of Charleston, which it desired to use as a burial ground for its members. But the city council, in the year 1836, had by ordinance declared it unlawful to so use any lot of land in said city except in certain instances. When, therefore, the church asserted its right to use its land as it pleased by burying its dead therein, this suit was brought to prevent such use, and the court held that the private right must be subordinated to that of the public, and the church was compelled to desist from such burials.

Of course, the police power is made thus to subordinate private rights to those of the public. In our own state there have been repeated recognitions of this law, when in the hands of municipal corporations, which have derived their right to its exercise, within their limits, by express grant from the general assembly of the state. Primarily, of course, this right exists in the latter body. These decisions have related to sales of intoxicating liquors; to the regulations of burials in towns and cities; to regulations touching the observance of the Sabbath Day; to the roaming at large, upon the streets of incorporated cities and towns, of horses, cattle, and swine; to the regulation of the area of land in said towns and cities which may lawfully be cultivated; and also, to the presence of a conductor upon street-railway cars when electricity was the motive power; and other kindred subjects. McCullough v. Brown, 41 S. C. 220, 23 L. R. A. 410; State, George, v. Aiken, 42 S. C. 222, 26 L. R. A. 345; Charleston v. Wentworth Street Baptist Church, 4 Strobb. L. 806; Charleston v. Benjamin, 2 Strobb. L. 508; Kennedy v. Souden, 1 McMull. L. 328; Crosby v. Warren, 1 Rich. L. 385; Summerville v. Pressley, 33 S. C. 56, 8 L. R. A. 854; State, Columbia Electric Street R. Light & P. Co., v. Sloan, 48 S. C. 21.

The exercise of this police power by the state legislature, or the cities or towns where the legislature clothes them with the right to exercise this power, is not questioned by the appellant here. His contention is that this police power cannot be exercised by the legislature itself, nor by its creatures, known as municipal corporations, without restraint. In other words, his proposition is that, in order that police power may be used by either the legislature or municipal corporations, there must appear affirmatively that its use is reasonable. I must confess that there is not only authority, but sound reason, for this contention. As was well said by Mr. Justice Miller in announcing the unanimous conclusion of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 505, 19 L. ed. 987: "It is a doctrine not to be tolerated in this country, that a municipal corporation, without any general laws either of the city or the state, within which a given structure can be shown to be a nuisance, can by its mere declaration that it is one, subject it to removal by any person supposed to be aggrieved, or even by the city itself. This would place every house, every business, and all the property of the city, at the uncontrolled will of the temporary local authorities." Similar views were expressed in the case of McCullough v. Brown, 41 S. C. 220, 23 L. R. A. 410, and in the very recent case of State, Columbia Electric Street R. Light & P. Co., v. Sloan, 48 S. C. 21, Mr. Justice Gary held: "It is not necessary to cite authorities to sustain the general proposition that street railways are subject to reasonable regulations by the authorities of the municipality, where they are located, under its police powers." (Italics mine.) "In this case, whether the ordinance is reasonable is not before the court for consideration." (Italics mine.) From this quotation it would seem that the majority of this court regarded that it was necessary that such regulation by the city council of Columbia of street railways should be reasonable. Now, in a densely-populated city, it would be entirely reasonable to forbid the presence of a hog in any inclosure; but in a small town such as Darlington, where, as it appears from the "case" itself, Mr. Ward has a lot of 6 acres whereon he resides, fronting on the principal street for residences, it might be another matter altogether. The health officer of the town of Darlington reports Mr. Ward's premises as cleanly and in proper condition. Is there anything in the habits of this animal to put it under the ban? Certainly nothing in the record here discloses any such objection. The decision of the board of health so declares, and the town council enforces by its ordinance such declaration of the board of health. Is the property of the corporators thus to be held at the mercy, so to speak, of these governmental agencies? It is true that the maxim of the law is Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas, but how is it made to appear that one hog in a large lot infringes upon the rights of the public as to health? From time immemorial in this commonwealth the right to own hogs has been recognized in the citizen. Is this right of property to be struck down upon the simple ipse dixit of a board of health or town council without any showing whatever that the presence of this species of property is prejudicial to health in a thinly settled town? If courts have the right to inquire into the reasonableness of an exercise of the police power in any given case, surely this is an instance where the same should be done. We would be understood correctly. This ordinance of the town of Darlington does not pretend to exercise control or regulate the manner in which a hog is kept by any corporator. It denies absolutely his right to keep the same within the town. We recognize the distinction so clearly pointed out in the case of McCullough v. Brown, 41 S. C. 220, 23 L. R. A. 410, including the dissenting opinion therein, and also that of State, George, v. Aiken, 42 S. C. 222, 26 L. R. A. 345, existing between alcoholic liquors and lotteries on the one side, and all other species of property on the other. The sale of alcoholic liquors for drink and the sale of lottery tickets are under the ban of society everywhere, but other personal property is not. As we before remarked, hogs are recognized as a legitimate species of property, and therefore, in order for their presence in the town of Darlington, in the lot of a corporator as its owner, something more must be done than was done in this case to justify the denial to the defendant of his right to have his property on his own premises freed from this ordinance. I do not feel that a law, such as the police power, needs any more discussion at my hands. It is too well understood to justify any extended notice of its general effects. The case of McCandless v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 38 S. C. 103, 18 L. R. A. 440, is in point here, together with the other cases herein previously cited. I think, therefore, that the conclusion of this court should be, "It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed," but, two of the justices agreeing with the circuit judge, it will be otherwise.

McIver, Ch. J., dissenting:

I concur in the conclusion reached by Mr. Justice Pope in this case, and only desire to add a few words indicating the difference between this case and that of Summerville v. Pressley, 33 S. C. 56, 8 L. R. A. 854, much relied upon in support of the judgment below. In that case the ordinance there in question distinctly recited that "it is necessary for the protection of the public health of Summerville that the soil should not be cultivated beyond a limited extent," and there does not appear to have been any evidence adduced in that case contradicting such recital. The court was therefore bound to assume, and did assume, that some limitation upon the cultivation of the soil, within the corporate limits of that town, was necessary to the preservation of the public health. In the present case, however, no such fact appears. It is not recited in the ordinance, and there was no evidence that the keeping of a hog in a 2-acre lot, not shut up in a pen, was detrimental to the public health. Indeed, the evidence in this case tended to show the contrary, for it is stated in the "case" that the premises of the appellant have passed the inspection of the health officer. This court, certainly, cannot, in the face of common experience to the contrary, and without any evidence whatever, assume that the mere fact of keeping a hog, not in a small pen, but allowed to run at large in a 2-acre lot, would be detrimental to the public health. Indeed, so far as appears in this case, there is nothing to show that the ordinance in question was passed with any view to the preservation of the public health. The ordinance does not purport to regulate the manner in which private property shall be kept or used, but simply prohibits the keeping of the kind of property therein specified within the corporate limits of the town of Darlington; and, so far as I can perceive, it might just have well have prohibited the citizens of that town from keeping on their premises in said town a horse or a cow or any other domestic animal, or indeed any other species of property; and surely an ordinance to that effect could not be claimed to fall within the proper limits of municipal authority. Without going into any consideration of the other interesting questions, so ably discussed in the argument for appellant, it seems to me clear that the municipal authorities of the town of Darlington had no power to pass any such ordinance as that in question here.

William L. PUTNAM et al., Exrs., etc., of

(90 Me. 405.)

A bequest to an incorporated charitable institution of property in excess of the amount which such corporations are allowed by general statute to take and hold, if it is not prohibited by the statute of wills or by the charter of the corporation or by the law which authorized its organization, and there is no penalty for taking in excess of the limitation, is not void but merely voidable, and can be avoided by the state alone.

EXCEPTIONS to rulings, and appeal from the decree of the Supreme Judicial Court for Cumberland County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to have certain provisions in the will of Ira P. Farrington, deceased, declared to be invalid. Exceptions overruled. Decree affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Orville D. Baker and Clarence Hale, for plaintiffs:

The Maine Eye and Ear Infirmary, having already the full amount of property allowed it by the statutes of this state, is incompetent to take any further property under the bequest of this will.

The heirs are the proper parties to assert against the Maine Eye and Ear Infirmary that it is incompetent to take the property under the bequest in the will.

have held that a devise to a corporation was valid in cases where it was claimed, notwithstanding a corporation had general power to take and hold property for its general corporate purposes yet the special devise in question was not necessary to those purposes, or was being applied to some illegal use.

Hamsher v. Hamsher, 182 Ill. 273, 8 L. R. A. 556; Hayward v. Davidson, 41 Ind. 212; Chambers v. St. Louis, 29 Mo. 543.

It will be observed as to this class of cases: (1) that the authority of these tribunals is not to be compared with that of the courts of Rhode Island, New Jersey, and New York; (2) that the doctrine is merely asserted and assumed without examination of its grounds, and without any inquiry into the vital distinction between deeds and wills.

Cases relating to executed deeds conveying property in excess of the limitations of the charter are all governed by the one principle of executed conveyances.

They can have no application to the case at bar, but must logically rest on two principles wholly inapplicable to a case of devise under a will.

The first difference is that by every deed a quasi estoppel is raised against the grantor, and all claiming under him, forbidding him or them to dispute his voluntary grant, whether made with or without consideration.

A deed at the moment of delivery becomes an executed contract and transfer. It transfers the title at that moment by virtue of its own conveying power. It requires no act of the court to aid or complete it, but would require the positive interference of the court in order to divest the title thus acquired. A residuary bequest under a will is the diametrical opposite of all this. It is not an executed, but an inchoate, transfer. It does not operate at all till death, nor even after death has it any conveying power of itself alone unaided by the action of the court.

It would be illegal, and so impossible for a probate court to decree distribution, and it is illegal and impossible for this court to pass such a decree as would call for an illegal distribution of property and for an illegal vesting of more than $100,000 in the Maine Eye and Ear Infirmary.

Grant v. Bodwell, 78 Me. 480.

At common law the executor's assent to a specific legacy divests him of the legal title and perfects the inchoate title of the legatee, so that the latter may bring trespass, trover, replevin, or ejectment therefor, even against the executor.

The gift in this will to the Maine Eye and Ear Infirmary is a gift in trust for charitable purposes, and to a corporation which has been recognized by repeated resolves of the legislature of the state of Maine as a public charity. All the purposes of this trust, the precise charitable intent which the testator had in mind, can just as well be served with an individual or another corporation appointed by the court for trustee in place of the infirmary.

Peters, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Ira P. Farrington, the testator whose will is called in question by this bill in equity, died at his home in Portland, December 17, 1894, leaving a will dated July 9, 1891, and a codicil dated January 4, 1893. The will was probated in January, 1895, in the probate court below and approved by this court in the next April afterwards. The will, after a most generous provision for his widow, and numerous bequests to his relatives, besides several large bequests to certain local charities other than those to be herein named, contains the following residuary clause:—"Fifth. All the rest and residue of Estate, Real and Personal or Mixed, wherever situate, which I may own at my decease, or which I may then have the right to dispose by Will, including all and any of the foregoing legacies, devises, and other provisions which may in whole or in part lapse or for any reason fail, I give the Maine Eye and Ear Infirmary in the city of Portland, incorporated according to the statutes of Maine, the Maine General Hospital and the Portland Public Library, share and share alike, upon trusts, nevertheless, as follows:

"The one third given said Eye and Ear Infirmary shall be maintained as a separate fund designated as 'The Farrington Fund,' held, invested and reinvested, and the net income thereof applied forever annually or oftener, to the Charitable purposes of the Corporation.

"Likewise the one third given the Maine General Hospital shall be in the same manner maintained as a separate fund, designated as 'The Farrington Fund,' held, invested, and reinvested, and the net income thereof applied forever annually, or oftener, one half for the support of free beds, in its hospital, to be known as 'the Farrington Free Beds,' and the other half to the general Charitable purposes and the maintenance of the Corporation.

"And likewise the one third given the Portland Public Library shall be in the same manner maintained forever as a separate fund designated as 'The Farrington Fund,' held, invested, and reinvested, and the net income thereof applied forever annually, or oftener to the support of the Library of said Corporation.

"Provided, nevertheless, that whatever principal sum or sums may come hereunder to the Portland Public Library shall be paid to the city of Portland on the following trusts, namely,—

"To pay thereon perpetually interest semi-annually at the rate of four (4) per cent per annum, to the Portland Public Library said interest to be applied as aforesaid by said Portland Public Library to the support of its Library.

"Said fund shall be entered on the books of the city as 'The Farrington Fund for the Benefit of the Portland Public Library,' and the interest so paid by the city shall be entered on the books of the Portland Public Library as interest from such 'Farrington Fund.'

"If the city shall decline to accept the same on the trust aforesaid, or if for two years after request in writing by my executors to accept the same as aforesaid, the city shall neglect so to accept, I direct that said principal sum or sums be paid to said Portland Public Library to be held, invested, and reinvested and the net income thereof applied as hereinbefore set out."

The testator names Hon. William L. Putnam and Hon. Thomas H. Haskell as executors, and confers certain authority over his estate on them as such executors as follows: "I give the executors full possession, management, and control of all my real estate wherever situate, subject to the devise of my beloved wife; and I authorize them from time to time to lease, sell, or exchange the same, or any part thereof and to receive the proceeds of such leases and sales and all other incomes or other proceeds thereof, for the purpose of fully executing this will, reminding them, however, that their authority over my estate whether real or personal is given solely for the purpose of closing and distributing the same as heretofore mentioned directed, with a prudent regard for obtaining fair prices within a reasonable time to be taken therefor."

The codicil is as follows:

"I hereby republish and reaffirm said will except as herein modified.

"The gift of the one-third part of the rest and residue of my estate to the Maine General Hospital by the fifth clause of said will and all gifts and devises in any part of said will to said Maine General Hospital, I hereby revoke; and I hereby give, devise, and bequeath, all the same one third and all other said gifts and devises, to the Maine Eye and Ear Infirmary, to hold to the use of it and its successors and assigns forever; the same to be in addition to, and not to effect or change, the gifts and devises to said Maine Eye and Ear Infirmary in said will contained. I double the gift of $20,000, to the Home for Aged Men of Portland."

The Eye and Ear Infirmary is a charitable association organized under the general statute which authorizes the formation of such corporations. Rev. Stat. chap. 55, § 1. Numerous kinds and classes of persons and associations are permitted by this section to be organized into corporations, including all social, military, literary, scientific, temperance, moral, musical, agricultural, and many other societies and organizations. Section four of the chapter prescribes as follows: "Such corporations may take and hold by purchase, gift, devise, or bequest, personal or real estate, in all not exceeding $100,000 in value, owned at any one time, and may use and dispose thereof only for the purposes for which the corporation was organized." The constitution of the infirmary, a public record, declares the purpose of the institution as follows: "The object of the corporation shall be the establishment and maintenance of an infirmary in Portland, Maine, where a daily clinic may be held for the treatment, free of charge, of poor persons throughout the state, suffering from diseases of the eye and ear."

The bill alleges that the infirmary had at the death of the testator property to the full amount of $100,000 in value, and that any additional amounts to be received through this will would be in excess of the limit allowed by its charter and in disregard of the statutes of the state; and so it further alleges "that the said Maine Eye and Ear Infirmary is incompetent to receive and incapable of holding any property beyond the amount which it now possesses, and that the bequests and devises made to it under item 5 of the said will and under the codicil to said will of said Ira P. Farrington are invalid and void, and revert to the heirs of Ira P. Farrington." The bill includes the infirmary and the executors as respondents, the prayer of the same being that the parties be enjoined, the one against paying over, and the other against receiving, the devises and bequests in execution of the intention of the testator.

Both of these respondents, the executors and the corporation, filed general demurrers to the bill, which were sustained by the justice before whom the case was heard below, and the case comes to us on exceptions and a final decree in favor of the respondents. Mr. Justice Strout of this court, by whom the issues were decided, filed a written judgment in the case from which we reproduce that portion of the same which bears upon the questions we propose now to discuss, reading as follows: "This is a bill in equity, and comes before the court on demurrers. The will of Ira P. Farrington contains a bequest to the Maine Eye and Ear Infirmary. The complainants allege that that corporation is authorized to hold property to the amount of $100,000, and no more; and that it now holds property to that amount, and therefore cannot take the legacy given to it by the will. As the demurrer admits the facts, it must be assumed that the legatee now holds the full amount of property which it is entitled to hold. It is admitted to be a public charitable institution. Can it take the legacy, or devise? The gift is from the residue of the estate, after payment of legacies, and may include both real and personal property.

"At common law, corporations were entitled to take and hold real or personal property to any amount, if it was reasonably useful and convenient in attaining its legitimate ends. In England, so large an amount had been acquired and held by its corporations, particularly the ecclesiastical, that as a measure of purely public policy the statute of mortmain was enacted to prevent the accumulation of real estate in ecclesiastical corporations. That statute has not been generally adopted in this country; but it has been deemed wise in many instances to limit in the charter, or by general law, the amount of property to be held by corporations. In this state, by statute, corporations are entitled to hold and convey lands and other property. Rev. Stat. chap. 66, § 2. This authority is unlimited, unless the charter, or general law under which the corporation is created, or some statute, imposes a limit. A limit of $100,000 is imposed by the statute under which this corporation was created. Taken in connection with the common law, and the general statute upon the subject, it is apparent that the limitation upon this class of corporations, not applicable to many others, was a matter of public policy. As such, it is for the state alone to take advantage of its breach, if it chooses, or it may waive it; and consequently private parties cannot be permitted to assert against the corporation a violation of the limitation. The decided weight of authority is to this effect and the principle is deemed sound.

"A devise of land operates a conveyance upon probate of the will. The devisee takes by purchase. The title may be defeated, if the subject of the devise is required for the payment of debts. A bequest of personalty also is perfected in the legatee, at the date of the probate of the will, subject to the same contingency, although the time of payment may be deferred by the provisions of the will or the contingencies of administration.

"The will, in this case, gave to the infirm-ary one third of the residue of the estate, after payment of legacies, in trust, to be invested and kept invested, the income only to be applied to the charitable purposes for which the institution was organized. The codicil added another third of the residue to the gift, but said nothing about trust; but the fair construction of the codicil, taken in connection with the trust created by the will, is that the trust attaches to the entire two thirds. The effect of the codicil was to increase the one third in the original will to two thirds. No other change was intended by the testator. The whole scheme in his mind was charity. The gift was to a public charity, administered by the corporation created for that purpose.

"The infirm-ary can take the gift, upon the trusts specified, and hold it against all except the state, although the amount is in excess of the limitation in the statute.

"If, however, the infirm-ary should be regarded as incompetent to take the property in trust, it being devoted by the testator to a public charitable use, the court would appoint a trustee to carry into effect the testator's bounty. A public charity, definite in its objects as this is, is never allowed to fail for want of a trustee, and if the trustee originally appointed is incapable, from any cause, to take the property and execute the trust, a competent trustee will be appointed."

The question on the first branch of the case, therefore, is whether these devices and bequests are absolutely void as the complainants contend, or whether they are merely voidable according to the view of the question taken by the respondents. After very much examination of the authorities pro and con, and careful consideration of the principles which affect the respective positions of the parties, we feel forced to the conclusion that the position advocated by the complainants ought not to be sustained. We feel very much impressed with the theory, stated in many of the cases, that a charter is a contract between the state and the corporation; and that for any misuse or abuse of its privileges or powers the corporation is amenable to the state only, no individual having anything to do with the question. As applicable to the present case, the principle is that, if the infirm-ary, by accepting these bequests and devices, increases its property ever so much in excess of the amount in value which the statute allows it to possess, it would be a transgression of the law which the state can prosecute or not as it pleases, and the heirs of the testator have no interest therein. As long as the state does not interfere for the violation, it waives it and permits the infirm-ary to retain the property.

The general statute under which this infirm-ary was organized is not expressly prohibitory, but rather regulative and directory. No penalties are attached and none intended more than a possible forfeiture of the excessive property received, or of the charter, or of one or both. This interpretation of the statute cannot by any possibility be harmful to the community, as the state can make it as stringent as it pleases at any time. But thus far the state has had no motive either to amend the statute or to enforce forfeitures for violation of its provisions. And in one section of the chapter relating to general organizations the legislature allows devisees, bequests, and gifts to towns for the establishment, or increase of public libraries, without imposing any limitation whatever. Rev. Stat. chap. 55, § 10. There cannot be an objection that such absorption of property excludes capital from taxation, because that is a matter wholly within the control of the legislature.

An over strict construction of the law and of the rights of parties under the law in the case before us is neither expedient nor reasonable. Here is an institution, and the only one of the kind in the state, and virtually a state charitable institution of the most beneficent and humane kind, seeking money for supporting its very life and existence, and to enable it to render assistance free of charge to the poor of the state suffering from diseases of the eye and ear. This testator, who had been always a director in the institution and finally its president, knowing and fully appreciating its condition and necessities, after making provisions for other local charities, and giving to his next of kin preferred bequests according to his own judgment as to what they should have out of his estate, made, not while in the extremities of sickness, but nearly five years before his death, these legacies and devises for the use of the infirmity. Presumably he and those whose assistance he obtained to aid him in executing his purposes never dreamed that there was any obstacle in the way of his giving or the infirmity receiving the bounties which he so strongly desired to be charitably expended. And now what a spectacle is presented if equity be successfully invoked to take advantage of this accident or mistake, equity, whose boasted vocation is to relieve against accident and mistake, in order to wrest from this institution these donations for the benefit of distant relatives and heirs! What a public misfortune it would have been, if on account of the limited amount of capital it is by its charter privileged to hold, it had turned out that our oldest college in this state was prevented from receiving the munificent bequests lately tendered to it by deceased citizens of the states of California and New York, such donations not having as yet been actually received, and the state itself powerless to allow the college to take the gifts merely on account of such limitation!

It will be noticed that most of the authorities on which the complainants rely concede that the rule which we would apply to devises is at all events applicable to gifts by deed, the argument being that in such a case as this a deed would be valid and a devise void. It seems inconsistent that such potential consequences should attach to the mere form of transmitting the property. We do not appreciate the justice of saying that a deed of property delivered by a donor on the day of his death to a corporation would be good, and a devise of the same property made on the same day would be bad. But the argument by the complainants is that in the one case the transaction is executed and in the other case that it cannot be considered as executed without a resort to the forms and assistance of the courts. We think the whole thing involves a distinction without a difference, a formal, but not substantial, distinction. Each mode of transfer needs the protection and aid of the law to render it operative. In the first place, the will must be probated, it is said. But on that question no inquiry can be instituted to see if there be any impropriety in any particular devise or bequest. The residuary bequest in this will is fair and proper on its face and that is all that is required. The act of probating the will is the probating of all its parts. A devise of real estate vests such estate at once in the devisee; the title of such devisee being liable to be defeated if the estate be necessary for the payment of debts or the expenses of administration. Section 15, chap. 74, Rev. Stat., reads as follows: "No will is effectual to pass real or personal estate unless proved and allowed in the probate court." This will has been approved by the probate courts below and above with no questions or exceptions thereto pending. But it is said the bequests of the personal estate cannot be carried into effect until a distribution has been ordered and the executors' accounts have been approved. We think that even this fine technicality may be avoided by the executors, if need be. They would be justified in paying all the property left in their hands as residuary estate without any order therefor, should the devisees be willing to accept it and discharge the executors from their responsibilities. A good many estates are settled by the parties interested without any aid or order from the probate court.

The foregoing reasoning only serves to illustrate the unsubstantial foundation upon which it is endeavored to raise a technical excuse for pronouncing a deed voidable and a devise absolutely void. The true and conclusive answer, however, to this indefensible position of the complainants is that it is utter assumption on their part in declaring a devise like this to be void, when it is voidable merely, and can be rendered void in no way other than by the act of the government itself. No wrongful act by a corporation renders its charter void or creates any forfeiture without proceeding by which such forfeiture shall be established. A cause for forfeiture is not itself forfeiture. The same section which prescribes the amount of property which this corporation may hold, also declares that it may use and dispose of the same for the purposes for which it was organized. Suppose the corporation wrongfully uses or disposes of its property, could any party but the state intervene to punish the corporation for such transgression?

Now what is there illegal, let us ask, in this court or in the probate court below acting in the furtherance of bequests that are simply voidable and consequently valid until they have been declared to be otherwise upon the intervention of the state? If the state has the exclusive privilege, as it has, of rendering the voidable bequest void, what is there wrongful in our regarding it as sound and sufficient while the question of its validity is not acted upon by the state, or the error is waived or permitted by the state? What right has the judicial branch of the government to dictate what the state should do against its will or its policy, and decide a question for the state which the state can better decide for itself? What right has the court to deprive the state of all opportunity to determine whether it will thus severely punish this corporation for the mistake of the testator or will waive or overlook it? Certainly the state should not be prevented from making such election. If courts at the instigation of heirs can refuse to act upon voidable bequests as valid until avoided by the state, then, as a matter of course, the state can practically never have any opportunity to exercise its discretion in such a case any more than as if such right never existed, and the court would be assuming the prerogative of really acting in opposition to the state. The court could not exercise any broad discretion in the solution of the question, while the state could. It certainly is an excellent policy to refer such questions to the discretionary power of the state, which can determine them, according to the circumstances, upon the great principles of justice and generosity, and in conformity with the wishes and welfare of the whole community. Among so many societies and associations as are organized under the general statute there will always be exceptional cases where, from their amount of business or other causes they have come to exceed the limitation of capital allowed them, and it is reasonable that the state should have the privilege, if it pleases, of relaxing the statutory restraints in such exceptional cases. And the circumstances of the present case make the strongest appeal for the protection of this devise against the loss of the generous gifts to it from one who loved the institution as he would have his child, and who devoted to its interests his time and services, and, as he supposed, a goodly share of his estate which had been earned by his industry and economy for a long lifetime. And it may not be amiss to state the fact that the legislature has lately increased the limitation of capital which the infirmity may hold from one hundred thousand to one million of dollars.

There is but little authority, either English or American, favoring the conclusion that bequests or devises not strictly authorized by law are to be considered void instead of voidable. This will be seen in the examination of cases in this country to be made in the progress of this discussion. But it may also be worth the while to notice what application has been made of the principle by the English courts in view of the statutes of mortmain as existing in that country. In Grant on Corporations, a reputable English work on the subject, at page *101, the author states the doctrine as follows: "The meaning of the term 'unlicensed corporation' is this. As was observed above, the conveyance of lands to a corporation was not made void to all intents and purposes by the statutes of mortmain, but only voidable at the option of the lords and the Crown; consequently if the mesne lords and the Crown all consented to waive the escheat, each in their respective rights, the corporation to whom the land was granted enjoyed the property unmolested. In process of time the rights of the lords becoming difficult to trace, a license from the Crown was generally considered sufficient to ascertain the right of property to the corporation; and this license it became usual for corporations to obtain from the Crown, enabling them to take lands to such a value, notwithstanding the statutes of mortmain. In strictness, however, the license to hold in mortmain was only a waiver of the right of the Crown to enter on the lands alienated; for as no royal charter can per se take away the property, or prejudice the interest of the subject, such license did not abrogate the right of the mesne lords to enter, and therefore with respect to them the corporation was not secure until the lapse of the periods respectively limited for the assertion of their rights. In fact the King's license had only the effect of waiving the Crown's right to the escheat, etc., etc." The author further says: "The question is of the more importance, as there is no doubt that many corporations have greatly exceeded the limits of their license, and hold such surplus lands without any right derived from it for their doing so. It is clear, however, that if a corporation have exhausted their license to hold in mortmain, the fact does not make a devise or conveyance to them void. The only result is, that they may take, though, unless they can obtain an extension by the Crown of their license they cannot hold the lands, unless the mesne lords and the Crown choose to sleep upon their respective titles."

The cases in this country, most of them which favor the principle that an estate in the condition this is goes to the heirs of a testator rather than to the devisee, seem to inculcate the idea that the heirs may waive their right so as to allow the estate to pass to the devisee. And we have not the slightest doubt that, but for the interference of the heirs in the present case by this bill in equity, no obstacle would have stood in the way of a complete administration of the testator's estate according to his clearly expressed intention. No court would have had the least hesitation in following the ordinary course of procedure, or would have entertained the thought, suo moto, of instituting inquiry to see whether the bequests in question were valid or not. But why should a bequest, invalid when not consented to by the heirs, become unobjectionable when such consent is obtained? If illegal as coming from the testator, why not just as illegal when coming from the testator and his heirs? Such considerations as these go to show how illogical and untenable a position it is to denominate the devises and bequests in the present will absolutely void.

Each side relies on certain authorities in defense of its position, and between the two sides many have been referred to. The first one relied on by the complainants, and probably one of the earliest decisions on the question in this country, is Davidson College v. Chambers, reported in 1857, in 8 Jones, Eq. 253. The same question arose there that exists here, and the case was decided according to the contention of the complainants in this case. It went on the theory that as the college was seeking to obtain an illegal bequest, the law could not assist it to do so, and that the bequest was absolutely void. It was a severe and technical decision, reasoned out without the aid of authorities as few in this country existed to throw light on the subject at that time. But the opinion admits that its severe doctrine did not apply to real estate and only to personal property. Should that be the law in this state, and we do not see why not if the law of that case is to prevail here, it may turn out that the residuary clause here is valid as operative only on real estate. But in our judgment the dissenting opinion in that case by Nash, Ch. J., is more satisfactory than the prevailing opinions delivered by the two associate justices. The argument of the chief justice is more in consonance with the doctrine which has grown up since that day. The chief justice, after declaring that the restriction as to amount of corporate property is merely directory, and that the bequest was not void but at the most voidable, goes on to say: "If the restriction is a condition, it is a condition subsequent, for a breach of which no action can be taken against a corporation but by the sovereign, and with the latter, and its officials, it is a matter of discretion, whether a forfeiture will be enforced or not. To work a forfeiture of chartered privileges, there must be something more than accidental negligence, excess of power, or mistake; there must be something wrong arising from wilful abuse or neglect. . . . There is here no forfeiture, for none has been judicially pronounced. Let it be granted that by taking the whole of the property devised, the total amount in value would exceed what the corporation was entitled to possess, and thereby its charter might be forfeited, can the defendant, the executor or the next of kin, take advantage of the breach of the condition in these proceedings? A charter is a contract between the corporation and the sovereign. It is well settled that none but the parties or their privies can take advantage of a breach of a condition. Now, neither Mr. Chambers [donor] nor his executor, nor his next of kin, are any parties or privies to the contract,—upon what principle, then, is it, that the executor can refuse his assent to the legacy to the college, or upon what principle can the next of kin claim it, or any portion of it? And the chief justice considers many English cases in support of his plain propositions, and we are only prevented from quoting more at length from his opinion by the want of space.

The next case cited by the complainants is that of Cromie v. Louisville Orphans' Home Soc. 3 Bush, 365, decided in 1867. And this case we consider more favorable to the party against whom it is cited than to the party citing it. It appears that a citizen of Kentucky made different bequests in his will and among them one to an incorporated society in the state of New York, which already possessed all the property that the laws of New York allowed it to have for its capital. The testator's heirs contested the validity of the bequest on that account. The opinion of the court is peculiar and savors a little of judicial sectionalism. While it was admitted that the remedy for taking an excess of capital would be in a forfeiture of some kind, and that the forfeiture would belong to the state of New York, still it was thought inexpedient to send it there because that state might apply the proceeds of any forfeiture for purposes different from the objects to which the same would be applied in Kentucky; and so it was held that, as Kentucky could not avail itself of any forfeiture for the fault of a foreign corporation, and as New York should not have it under the circumstances, the heirs of the testator living in Kentucky better have the benefit of the same. But the court speaks significantly on the legal question as follows: "The question of title is between the corporation and the owner of the forfeited right. . . . The limitation in this case is a mere matter of state policy, and the state of New York alone can take advantage of its violation." And then the court goes on to justify its withholding from New York what it admits belongs to that state, and its giving the same to the heirs, in the manner following: "But notwithstanding this legal conclusion, should a court of equity enforce the devise against the heirs when, if the limitation has been transcended, the state of New York may take from the devisee the excess over the maximum of the prescribed value, and this court might thus give it, whatever it may be, to an object never contemplated by the testator, and to which he never would have devised it? The answer is, clearly not." The opinion concedes the point precisely as the defense in the present case claims it to be, but avoids its enforcement on account of the peculiar situation of the parties to be affected by the result.

The case of Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 43 N. Y. 424, is cited by the complainants as an authority favoring the position espoused by them. The opinion on this point is not fortified by any authorities, is quite brief as far as relates to the present question, and gives as a reason for its conclusion that "unlimited trusts of this character might become an unmitigated evil." But, let us ask, is that a question for the courts to determine, or is it for the state? a judicial, or is it a governmental, power or policy? Cannot the state by its representative officers regulate the tendency of the so-called evil with their power of instituting proceedings for forfeitures and escheats, or cannot the state by its legislative power entirely prevent it by penalties or provisions, to that end whenever it sees fit to do so?

But the opinion in the case cited admits as much when it goes on to say: "Doubtless the restriction upon corporations is a governmental regulation and one of policy, and to be enforced by the government." That is precisely what the respondents are contending for. Then the opinion adds: "But an individual whose interests will be affected . . . may assert and insist upon the limitation as a restriction." There is precisely the difference between that case and this. The effect of the reasoning in that case is that such an excessive bequest is voidable only and not void, but that it may be avoided by the government or by the heirs of the testator. On the other hand, the present respondents admit that such a bequest is voidable, and contend that it can be avoided only by the state,—that the bequest is not of itself a forfeiture, but at most a cause for forfeiture. It seems to us inconsistent to declare that the heir has the same right as the state, for in such case, as we have said before, the heir would practically have the exclusive right of repudiation and the state have none. Should not the state control its own policy and action on the question? Nor do we see how the apprehended evil of trusts is going to be prevented by regarding deeds of trust voidable and devises void.

The complainants also rely very much on the Cornell University Case, reported, in 1888, under the title of Re McGraw. 111 N. Y. 66, 2 L. R. A. 887, a strongly stated case and in point here, excepting as the New York policy differs from the policy maintained elsewhere, and as the municipal law there differs from the statutes of other states and especially from the statutory system of our own state. It is there held that such devises and bequests as these are absolutely and irrevocably void, and in this respect the case is not wholly consistent with the views expressed by the same court in the Chamberlain Case already commented on, and is in great advance of any doctrine expressed in any previous case in that state. The result is reached by an interpretation "of the general statutes of the state relating to the organization and holding of property by corporations of the class of Cornell University as the same have been affected by the terms of the special charter granted to it." While in our own state we have no statute affecting the question outside of the terms of the corporate charter itself, or of the general law authorizing the charter, the New York Code contains clauses touching the ability of corporations to acquire property which her court construes to be expressly and utterly prohibitory. The provisions are of themselves severe and they are also strictly and severely construed by the New York court. This same case came before the Supreme Court of the United States afterwards, and that court declined to review the decision of the New York court of appeals upon the ground that no Federal question was presented, inasmuch as the decision sought to be reviewed was based upon the charter of the University and the municipal law of the state of New York. Cornell University v. Fiske, 186 U. S. 152, 34 L. ed. 427. The statute of wills in New York is disabling and restraining in its character and prohibits a devise to a corporation unless specially permitted by its charter or by some statute to take property by devise. Her statutes on analogous subjects have been restrictive and her decisions have been accordingly. Its Code forbade a charitable trust to be created upon real estate. Its decisions decline to uphold a trust when a trust exists without a trustee, differing therein from the decisions of other states. Mr. Schouler (Schouler, Wills, § 26, note) says: "Under the policy of the New York Code an unincorporated association appears to be treated with little favor as the beneficiary of a devise." The same restrictive policy led its highest court to hold that a mortgage to a national bank to secure future advances as well as past indebtedness was void (Crocker v. Whitney, 71 N. Y. 161) and this doctrine was overruled by the more liberal policy of the United States Supreme Court in National Bank v. Whitney, 103 U. S. 99, 26 L. ed. 443. In Rainey v. Laing, 58 Barb. 453, the supreme court of New York in a carefully argued and considered case precisely like the present decided that the devise was valid as against all parties but the state, and the difference between that opinion and the one rendered by the court of appeals is that the one proceeds upon the liberal policy more generally entertained by courts and the other was governed by the more restricted and peculiar policy of the Code and courts of New York. The case of Wood v. Hammond, 16 R. I. 98, is also relied on by the complainants as an authority of importance in their favor, a case which follows the opinion of the New York court in the McGrave Case, and in point corroborates that opinion. See also Coggeshall v. Home for Friendless Children, 18 R. I. 696. The only other case cited on this branch of the case in behalf of the complainants is DeCamp v. Dobbin, 31 N. J. Eq. 671, and as the defense also relies on the same case reported in an earlier volume, we will defer commenting on that authority until we make a cursory review of some of the adjudged cases cited on the other side of the question.

In opposition to the doctrine attempted to be maintained by the complainants, the respondents have cited quite an array of cases, both of a direct and indirect bearing on the question, some of which will receive our examination.

The first on the list is Jones v. Habersham, 107 U. S. 174, 27 L. ed. 401, a case of devise precisely in point, where Gray, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "But there are two conclusive answers to this argument. 1st., Restrictions imposed by the charter of a corporation upon the amount of property it may hold cannot be taken advantage of collaterally by private persons, but only . . . by the state which created it." This case is assailed in the argument of counsel in several ways, and, we think, without actual effect. It is said that it is brief, but its brevity indicates the assurance which the learned justice felt that his proposition was correct. It is also objected to the force of the opinion that two grounds are given for the result to stand upon. But the ground invoked by the respondents is first given as of first importance, and this as well as the other ground is declared to be conclusive. It is further objected that the cases cited in support of the proposition of the opinion are not pertinent to the issue. The opinion does not discuss the very fine distinction, which the complainants contend for, between a gift by devise and a gift by deed, for the reason undoubtedly that the court entertained the belief that there is no real difference between the two, and that either is voidable only, and not void. And so the cases in support of the opinion are cited from both classes of the authorities. One voidable mode of gift cannot differ from any other voidable mode in its consequences and effect. And if it be admitted that a devise of the kind in question is only voidable, all that the complainants are contending for falls to the ground. The learned counsel for the complainants does not notice the fact that the same case came to the supreme court by appeal from the circuit court below, where it was elaborately discussed by counsel and court, on this and other points, Mr. Justice Bradley of the supreme court sitting in the capacity of a circuit judge, and delivering the opinion of that court, reported in 3 Woods, 443, in which opinion the learned justice, among other things, remarks as follows: "It seems to us, however, that the gift to the Georgia Historical Society is not void. . . . This, if the society accepted the trust, may have been cause of forfeiting its charter; but the gift would none the less be vested in it, to hold otherwise would be to render the society exempt from any inquiry on the subject at the suit of the state. . . . Certain things are ultra vires of a corporation; but when it has the power to hold property, and is forbidden to hold beyond a certain amount, the matter being one of degree merely, or of more and less, this is not a question of ultra vires, but of violation of its charter. A contrary rule would involve many absurdities [the court here stating some of them]. The corporation may be amenable to the penalty of violating its charter. Individuals cannot call it in question; its tenants must continue to pay its rents, and its debtors their debts; the state alone has the right to proceed against it. The state may or may not see fit to do so. It would depend on the circumstances of the case, the greatness of the excess, the causes which led to it, etc. The state may condone the offense. The legislature may relieve by enlarging its powers." The late Justice Bradley was famed as an original thinker, and his idea that if the contrary rule prevailed a corporation could never be punished for accepting a bequest which gave it property of value above the limit allowable, because it could defend upon the ground that the bequest was completely void, is certainly original and forcible.

A similar, if not the same, question arose in National Bank v. Whitney, 108 U. S. 99, 26 L. ed. 448, affecting the present case in several respects. The case was first decided by the New York court of appeals and its decision reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The national banking act allowed banks instituted by its authority to take mortgages on real estate for certain specified purposes "and no other." This bank took a mortgage on real estate to secure past indebtedness and also for such future advances as the bank might furnish the mortgagor. The latter branch of the transaction was directly forbidden by the banking act, the security not being for one of the purposes permitting it to be taken, and was declared by the New York court to be utterly void, but by the supreme court to be voidable only until rendered void by some action on the part of the Federal government. In the appellate court Field, J., in the opinion says: "Disregard of them only laid the association open to proceedings by the government. The impending danger . . . of a judgment of ouster and dissolution was, we think, the check, and none other, contemplated by Congress." "The consequence insisted upon did not follow; that the statute did not declare such security void, but was silent on the subject; that had Congress so intended it would have been easy to say so." All of this reasoning is as fitting in the present case as in that. There is nothing in the statute or charter of the infirmary stating that either deed or devise to it bestowing more property upon it than $100,000 shall be void. We have already sufficiently discussed the position that the law commits no wrong to actively participate in the execution of merely voidable bequests, for the reason that such bequests are to be considered valid by the courts until vacated or avoided by the state through its representative officers. But that fallacious position of the complainants, as we think it is, was involved in the case cited. The bank was the plaintiff, asking for the aid of the law, not for defending a possession, but for obtaining possession. It never had any actual possession of the land or its proceeds. Subsequently mortgagees of the same property had the possession first of the land and then of its proceeds. The bank was not sent out of court as a party unworthy on that account the protection of the court. Feeling the force with which this case presses against their position the complainants contend that there is a substantial difference between that case and this. We think, however, that the principle supporting both cases is essentially the same, and must seem to be so to the mind of an impartial investigator. The legal authors so estimate it, as will be seen hereafter.

Vidal v. Philadelphia, 48 U. S. 2 How. 127, 11 L. ed. 205, may also well be regarded as a significant authority on the question, where Story, J., says: "If the trusts were in themselves valid in point of law, it is plain that neither the heirs of the testator, nor any other private persons, could have any right to inquire into, or contest the right of the corporation to take the property, or to execute the trusts; but this right would exclusively belong to the state in its sovereign capacity, and in its sole discretion, to inquire into and contest the same by a quo warranto, or other proper judicial proceeding."

In harmony with these Federal cases is the very recent decision of the same question by the Maryland court of appeals in the case of Hanson v. Little Sisters of the Poor, 79 Md. 484, 82 L. R. A. 298 (affirmed January, 1897 in Congregational Church Bldg. Soc. v. Kerrett, 85 Md. 79, 85 L. R. A. 693), in which the court gives its reasons for preferring the adoption of the doctrine of the Federal courts rather than that promulgated in the Cornell University Case by the court in New York. In that case the proceeding was, as it is here, by a bill in equity brought by the heirs to have the devise declared void. The court in its opinion states the question and its decision of it clearly where it says: "It cannot be denied that this corporation had power to take and hold any estate and property not exceeding the charter limits, and the devise, therefore, was not void on its face, and must be held valid as to all the world until it has been determined, at the instance of the state, that the charter has been violated. If they have violated the law of their being they have committed a wrong not against any particular individual, but against the state, and this wrong can only be inquired into by a proceeding on the part of the state."

. . . In other words, the corporation can take property to any amount, but can hold it, as against the state, only to the amount provided by its charter." How does the active participation of a court, in promoting the administration of such a devise, become wrongful, as the complainants contend, so long as the wrong on the part of the corporation is not inquired into by the state, and the state, instead of urging objection, by its legislature, consents thereto? Of course, in no sense can the state be considered as any party to the present proceedings. The meaning of the argument of the court in the case cited is that, while it is the law that a charitable corporation shall hold only the amount of capital prescribed by its charter, it is also the law that no one besides the state can, in any suit or proceeding properly take notice of such transgression by the corporation.

In the case cited the court also says: "The contrary doctrine would make it very hazardous to take title from a corporation with such a limitation on its charter, and if the objection could be made by anyone, title to property once held by such corporations would cease to be marketable, litigation would be promoted, and courts would be constantly called on to decide the very difficult questions of fact, as to whether the property of a corporation does or does not exceed in value the charter limits. In the case now before us the estimates of the witnesses differ greatly, and a devise or bequest would be held valid or void according to the estimate adopted by the court. We think this is one of those cases which may be put in the class with those referred to by the late Justice

Miller in his dissenting opinion in Fritts v. Palmer, 182 U. S. 293, 88 L. ed. 321, where he says: "I can conceive of cases where corporations have been authorized to acquire a limited amount of real estate, such as the legislature may conceive to be useful and necessary to the purpose for which they are organized, . . . in which the question as to whether they have exceeded that amount . . . may be one for the state alone, and not of any private citizen." The counsel for the present complainants argues that the objection of inconvenience should have but the slightest influence on a question where so much principle is involved. We think, however, that the position of the Maryland court in this respect is not to be underrated. Certainly, titles affected in the way above-named would be much more hazardous if a devise of the kind be declared void, instead of voidable, for a devise to all intents and purposes void must remain so through all the mutations of ownership, and the heirs might never be shut out from reclaiming the property thus illegally devised. Many fixed principles of the law have been established on grounds of policy merely, even by the creation of legal fictions if necessary to reach a just result. There are policies within a policy, questions within a question, the smaller controlling the greater question as the rim of a wheel is supported and controlled by its spokes. The difficulty of applying the restrictive rule is a circumstance worth consideration. In one of the New York cases where, under the policy acted on in that state, a part of the bequest only could be received, the decree of the court was that so much of the bequest of money might be taken as would at 7 per cent per annum create an annuity of $4,000; and undoubtedly the same fund would produce to-day not more than half as much annuity. Do not such considerations help to induce the belief that the liberal policy advocated by the defense is the better policy?

Another case is cited by the defense over which there is some contention between the parties as to its value as a precedent, the case of De Camp v. Dobbins, 29 N. J. Eq. 86. The exact question arose there as it exists here, and Chancellor Runyon decided it on the same line on which the question was disposed of in the cases of the Federal supreme court, although the chancellor thought the same result might be reached also upon another ground disclosed by the facts. The case appears again on appeal in 81 N. J. Eq. 689, when the first decree was affirmed, Beasley, Ch. J., writing an opinion sustaining the decree upon a ground other than that selected by the chancellor and in opposition to the latter's opinion. The counsel here assumes that the whole court adopted the views of Chief Justice Beasley. The case does not show such a thing. In closing his opinion the chief justice says: "I shall vote to affirm the decree," and thereupon it is stated by the reporter that the decree below was unanimously affirmed. It is not intimated upon what ground the numerous members of that court cast their votes, whether upon the opinion of the chancellor or that of the chief justice, and there was no occasion that it should appear. On the contrary, we think we are justified in the inference that the chancellor was supported by the court excepting the chief justice, and we notice that another court has the same supposition. Wood v. Hammond, 16 R. I. 98, cited supra. The chancellor stated (29 N. J. Eq. 41) the essential conclusion arrived at in his opinion as follows: "If such limitations did in fact exist, it would not incapacitate the corporation from taking the gift, although its property at the time of receiving the gift was of the full annual value of $2,000. If a corporation takes land by grant or devise in trust or otherwise which by its charter it cannot hold, its title is good as against third persons and strangers; the state alone can interfere." 1 Perry, Tr. § 45; Wade v. American Colonization Soc. 7 Smedes & M. 663, 45 Am. Dec. 324. And again, if the limitation did in fact exist, the legislature might remove the restriction and permit the corporation to execute the trust or authorize it to receive the gift and administer the trust notwithstanding the limitation. This court will not suffer a trust to fail for want of a trustee, but will uphold the trust for a reasonable time, when necessary in order to enable the trustee to obtain the requisite authority to take and execute it: cites Bridges v. Pleasants, 4 Ired. Eq. 28, 30, 44 Am. Dec. 94; Inglis v. Sailor's Snug Harbor, 28 U. S. 8 Pet. 99, 7 L. ed. 617.

In Hamsker v. Hamsker, 182 Ill. 273, 8 L. R. A. 556, where the validity of a devise was involved, it is said in the headnote of the case: "Whether the corporation exceeds its power in receiving land by gift or devise, is a question alone for the state." And in the opinion the court says: "If the Young Men's Christian Association of Decatur has exceeded in extent its power of holding real estate, appellant, [heir] we conceive, cannot take advantage of the fact." Alexander v. Tolleston Club, 110 Ill. 65. Where a corporation may, for some purposes, acquire and hold the title to real estate, it cannot be made a question by any party, except the state, whether the real estate has been acquired for the authorized uses or not. Hayward v. Davidson, 41 Ind. 214. There being capacity to purchase or to receive by devise, whether the corporation, in so purchasing or receiving, exceeds its power is a question between it and the state, and does not concern appellant."

In a peculiar case or devise in Massachusetts, Baker v. Clarke Institution, 110 Mass. 88, the court says: "The purposes and object of the trust are distinctly set forth. If its full execution had been found to be impossible by reason of the continued incapacity of the cestui que trust to take the whole fund, it might have become necessary and proper for the court to declare a resulting trust, as to the excess, in favor of the next of kin, to be applied by law," citing the New York case of Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 43 N. Y. 424, for that proposition. Later in the opinion the court says: "But even if it was intended to evade or disregard the limit of legal capacity, we are not prepared to hold that it would render the bequest invalid, either in whole or for the excess." And the court further adds: "But we cannot doubt that the removal by the legislature of such a restriction upon the capacity of the corporation, before the complete execution of the trust, will enable it to receive the whole fund for its benefit, although [for peculiar reasons not important here], it could not do so at the time the will took effect." Here, certainly, is seen the idea of the court, that the excessive bequest was no more than a voidable act, indirectly said as strongly as if directly expressed. Mr. Schouler in his work on Wills, § 24, under the belief that receiving an excessive amount of capital is a voidable act merely, as will be seen by a later reference to his text, says, in a note: "Enabling acts of this character are frequently met in the special legislation of American states at each session, that of Massachusetts for instance."

Chambers v. St. Louis, 20 Mo. 548, is a case of a devise of property to a municipal corporation for certain purposes, and the question was as to what extent the corporation could take and hold the property. In this case the court, among other things, said: "It is a matter between the state and the city. The law is only directory in relation to corporations taking lands. It imposes no penalty nor does it in terms avoid the conveyance. Nowhere is a corporation in express terms prohibited from taking and holding lands. . . . It is not for the courts in a collateral way to determine the question of misuser by declaring void conveyances made in good faith." The city was authorized to acquire land necessary only for its municipal purposes. The case of Hayward v. Davidson, 41 Ind. 212, involved a similar question upon a devise to county commissioners for the benefit of a county, and was decided the same way as was the case in Missouri.

We have already referred to the case of Rainey v. Laing, 58 Barb. 453, as differing entirely from the McGraw or Cornell University Case, for the reason that it was decided on a policy generally prevailing in the American courts rather than on the statute of wills in the state of New York, which statute is, as construed by its court of appeals, intensely prohibitory in its character. In the case cited (Rainey v. Laing) the court said: "That the question whether the property, with that which the synod already held, would exceed in amount the sum to which its charter restricted it, could not be tried in an action brought by the executors, for the construction of the will, that that question was not to be determined collaterally, but only in a direct proceeding by the state. That the condition imposed in the act incapacitating the synod being, not against its taking, but against taking and holding, the corporation could take; but whether it could hold was another question, not necessary or proper in this collateral way to be considered—a question purely of public policy, with which individuals had no concern, but in which the state, as the sovereign, was alone interested, and which it might either raise or waive, according to its pleasure."

Another case of devise, relied on by both parties, Heiskell v. Chickasaw Lodge, No. 8, I. O. O. F. a late case reported, in 1889, in 87 Tenn. 668, 686, 4 L. R. A. 699. The case holds that as to a devise, where the charity is definite, heirs and other devisees cannot question the legal capacity of the trustee to hold and administer the trust, but the state alone can do so. At the time the devise took effect, the corporation held more than the amount prescribed in its charter. The same case also held, in deference to the decision in the Cornell Case, that there is a difference whether the funds bequeathed have been actually received or not by the donee, while we do not understand the latter case as admitting that a devise or bequest of the kind would be otherwise than void under any circumstances. But Mr. Pritchard, a Tennessee author, explains, in a note to his work on Wills, published as lately as 1894, that the Tennessee court was misled by not noticing the grounds upon which the Cornell University Case was decided by the New York court. And we quote below a portion of this note, numbered 18 to section 153 of the work referred to, as being instructive because of its references to many cases, and nests of cases in books, and particularly because it contains a clear explanation of why and how the New York policy, as illustrated in the Cornell University Case, differs from the policy of other states on the same question. The note discusses the English statutes of mortmain, and says that by the English statutes of mortmain, beginning with 9 Henry III., corporations were prohibited from taking or holding lands without the King's license, and that they were therefore excepted from the operation of the statutes of wills. The note then says that these statutes were never adopted in Tennessee, and then continues: "In Pennsylvania, however, no corporation can take or hold lands unless specially authorized by act of the legislature. Gouldie v. Northampton Water Co. 7 Pa. 233; Watts's Appeal, 78 Pa. 370. The exception contained in the English statute of wills was incorporated into the New York statute of wills, and under it, it was held that a devise of land directly to a corporation was void, but that a devise to a natural person in trust for a corporation was good. McCartee v. Orphan Asylum Soc. 9 Cow. 437, 18 Am. Dec. 516. A later statute of that state provides that devises of land may be made to every person capable by law of holding real estate, but no devise to a corporation shall be valid unless such corporation be expressly authorized by its charter or by statute to take by devise. 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 57, §§ 1-3. This statute renders devises directly or indirectly to a corporation void in the prohibited cases. Downing v. Marshall, 23 N. Y. 366, 30 Am. Dec. 290; Bascom v. Albertson, 34 N. Y. 584; King v. Rundle, 15 Barb. 150; Re McGraw, 111 N. Y. 66, 84, 3 L. R. A. 387. This statute operates upon the testamentary power. Consequently a devise made in New York to a foreign corporation is void, although the foreign corporation has authority by its charter to receive the devise. White v. Howard, 46 N. Y. 144, 165; United States v. Fox, 94 U. S. 815, 24 L. ed. 192; Royce v. St. Louis, 29 Barb. 650. But a New York corporation can take by devise in Connecticut although the devise would be prohibited if made in New York. The reason is that the corporation carries with it its charter, but not the law of devise of New York. White v. Howard, 38 Conn. 342; Thompson v. Swoope, 24 Pa. 474; American Bible Soc. v. Marshall, 15 Ohio St. 537. But see contra, Starkeveather v. American Bible Soc. 72 Ill. 50, 22 Am. Rep. 183; United States Trust Co. v. Lee, 73 Ill. 142, 24 Am. Rep. 226.

A devise of land in New York to the United States is bad (Re Fox, 63 Barb. 157, 52 N. Y. 530, 11 Am. Rep. 751; United States v. Fox, 94 U. S. 315, 24 L. ed. 192), but good in Massachusetts where there is no limitation as to devises to corporations. Dickson v. United States, 125 Mass. 311, 28 Am. Rep. 230. Corporations are usually limited as to the amount or value of real estate which they may hold, but, even where the corporation is already holding as much land as it is authorized to hold, its right to land devised to it can be questioned by the state only, unless, as in New York, there is some statute declaring the devise itself void. The Banks v. Poitiaux, 3 Rand. (Va.) 136, 15 Am. Dec. 706; Mallett v. Simpson, 94 N. C. 37, 55 Am. Rep. 594; Blunt v. Walker, 11 Wis. 334, 78 Am. Dec. 709; Leazure v. Hillegas, 7 Serg. & R. 313; Boird v. Bank of Washington, 11 Serg. & R. 411; DeCamp v. Dobbins, 29 N. J. Eq. 36; Hough v. Cook County Land Co. 73 Ill. 23, 24 Am. Rep. 230; Barrow v. Nashville & C. Turnp. Co. 9 Humph. 804. In Heiskell v. Chickasaw Lodge No. 8, 1 O. O. P. 87 Tenn. 668, 686, 4 L. R. A. 690, it is stated that there is a distinction between the case where a corporation is actually holding property in excess of the limitation of its charter and the case where a devise is made to it and the property devised has not yet come to its possession, and it is said that in the first case no one but the state can raise the question or enforce the forfeiture; but in the second case the heirs or residuary legatee may raise the question, because the gift would be void and the property would go the same as if it had not been made. Dickinson, Sp. J., cites Re McGraw, 111 N. Y. 66, 2 L. R. A. 387, to sustain this distinction. He seems to have overlooked the fact that the statute of wills in New York expressly declares such devises void. There can be no objection to the heirs making the question where the testamentary power is thus expressly limited by statute. In the absence of such a statute the devise is not void as fully shown by the authority cited above, and the heirs could no more attack it before the corporation went into the possession of a realty devised than afterwards. See extended note to Page v. Heineberg, 94 Am. Dec. 378, 381-387 [40 Vt. 81]; Barrow v. Nashville & C. Turnp. Co. 9 Humph. 804; Dockery v. Miller, 9 Humph. 781; Fellows v. Miner, 119 Mass. 541; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 332, 333, 678; National Bank v. Whitney, 103 U. S. 99, 26 L. ed. 443; Runyan v. Coster, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 122, 10 L. ed. 882."

The foregoing cases, with one exception, are where the question is discussed as to the ability of corporations to acquire by devise or bequest property exceeding the amount which their charters expressly allow them to possess. In addition to those authorities, many others are cited by the counsel for the respondents which affect the question in a less direct but more general way, and are important as containing discussions of the general principle at stake, and as indicating the common judicial sentiment on this and kindred questions; some of them bearing with special force on the question by analogy to it, others being the private opinions to some extent of individual justices perhaps, but all of them combined operating with much force and effect on the particular issue involved. The same idea pulsates through them all. Some of them are the following:

In Heard v. Talbot, 7 Gray, 113, in discussing the relations in which a corporation stands towards the state as well as towards individuals interested in the same question, the following remarks made in the opinion of the court appear: "Although the disuse of the canal and its abandonment by the corporation may be a gross disregard of the duty imposed on them by law, and an essential violation of the terms and conditions implied from the contract entered into with the government by the acceptance of the charter, and, upon due proceedings had, might be a sufficient ground upon which to decree a forfeiture of all their corporate rights and privileges, they do not constitute any valid ground upon which the exercise by the corporation of any of the powers conferred by their charter can be defeated or denied by third persons in collateral proceedings. This results from the very nature of an act of incorporation. It is not a contract between the corporate body, on the one hand, and individuals whose rights and interests may be affected by the exercise of its powers, on the other. It is a compact between the corporation and the government from which they derive their powers. Individuals therefore cannot take it upon themselves in the assertion of private rights, to insist on breaches of the contract by the corporation, as a ground for resisting or denying the exercise of a corporate power. That can be done only by the government with which the contract was made, and in proceedings only instituted against the corporation. . . . Therefore, it has been often held that a cause of forfeiture, however great, cannot be taken advantage of or enforced against corporations collaterally or incidentally, or in any other mode than by a direct proceeding for that object in behalf of the government."

In Davis v. Old Colony R. Co. 131 Mass. 258, 41 Am. Rep. 231, is a learned discussion by Gray, Ch. J., in the course of which he says: "There is a clear distinction . . . between the exercise by a corporation of a power not conferred upon it, varying from the objects of its creation as declared in the law of its organization, . . . and the abuse of a general power, or the failure to comply with prescribed formalities or regulations, in a particular instance;" to which proposition many and various cases are cited. In commenting on a former case between the same parties, it is in the opinion said as follows: "The objection that the corporation had no right to trade in gravel or land was raised by the defendant by way of defense to a bill in equity by the corporation for specific performance of his second agreement. . . . There can be no doubt of the correctness of the decision overruling the objection. The corporation by its purchase had acquired a title to the land, which was good against all the world, except possibly by the commonwealth."

It was upon the distinction above stated that it was held, in Brunswick Gas Light Co. v. United Gas Fuel & L. Co. 85 Me. 532, that one gas company could not sell its charter, inclusive of rights obtained through the exercise of the principle of eminent domain, to another gas company without the consent of the legislature. The same distinction is aptly stated, in a South Dakota mining case, Gilbert v. Hole, 2 S. D. 164, in this way: "There is a difference between exercising power entirely foreign to the nature of a corporation and exercising legitimate powers to an improper extent. In the former case, the acts done might be absolutely void; in the latter, they would only be voidable by a proper proceeding on the part of the state." The general rule illustrated by some of the preceding cases is also well put in case of Alexander v. Tolleton (7th, 110 Ill. 65, where the headnote reads thus: "Where a corporation, by the law of its creation, is authorized in some cases, or for some purposes, or to a certain extent, to take and hold the title to real estate, it cannot be made a question by any party, except the state, whether its real estate has been acquired for the authorized uses or not, or is in excess of the capacity of the corporation to take and hold. The state alone must assert her policy in that regard." In another Illinois case it is said: "A third person cannot in a collateral proceeding question the power of a corporation to hold real estate; only the state can do this, and in a direct proceeding." Barnes v. Suddard, 117 Ill. 287.

But the present suit is not either instituted or controlled by the state. It is a collateral proceeding by private parties. The state is not thereby exercising her policy, and if the suit can be sustained the state will have no opportunity whatever to express by any act its assent or dissent in relation to the conduct of the corporation accepting the bequests. The state is neither directly nor indirectly represented in the litigation. What can be plainer! But the corporation is using the state's machinery for their purposes, it is said. Is not that the business of the state whether such use of her procedure shall be had or not? Cannot the court wait until the state through her officials comes into court asking for any judicial assistance?

In Briggs v. Cape Cod Ship Canal, 137 Mass. 71, the point of many cases is expressed in these words: "The act of incorporation is a contract between the commonwealth and the corporation; whether the corporation has complied with the conditions is a question of fact to be judicially determined. The commonwealth may waive a strict compliance with the terms of the act, and may elect whether it will insist upon a forfeiture, if there has been a breach of condition." Even the North Carolina court feels some amelioration of its rigid doctrine maintained in Davidson College v. Chambers, the first case cited on complainants' brief, when, in Mallett v. Simpson, 94 N. C. 37, 55 Am. Rep. 595, thirty days after its first decision, it says: "Conceding that the railroad company had not purchased the land in question, nor used it for the purpose contemplated by the charter, the deed from Hardison to it vested the legal title and its right to purchase and hold the land could not be collaterally assailed. No one but the state could take advantage of the defect that the purchase was ultra vires."

The case of Penobscot Boom Corp. v. Lamson, 16 Me. 224, 33 Am. Dec. 656, is the only one 33 L. R. A.

looking towards the present question, but it contains a germ of the true principle when it decides that, in an action by a corporation, the defendant cannot take an advantage of any use or abuse of its corporate powers.

The law authors are nearly or quite unanimous in their concurrence on the exact question presented for our determination. In Devlin on Deeds, vol. I. § 120, it is laid down that "if a charter of a corporation forbids it to purchase or take lands a deed made to it is void." And the author in the next following section (121) ascribes to the state the discretion of applying any remedy, saying that "the general rule is that the state alone can take advantage of the clause of the charter prohibiting a corporation from holding land." In Beach on Private Corporations, § 878, it is said that "no party except the state can object that a corporation is holding real estate in excess of its rights." And it seems to us that it is a consistent deduction from that proposition to say that no party but the state can object to any effort by a corporation to acquire real estate. How can a thing be wrong in the beginning and right in the end? How can it be logically said that a contemplated act is wrong and as soon as consummated is right? It would seem as if the first step towards a wrong act would constitute less offense than the last step would.

Says Mr. Perry, in his reliable work on Trusts, § 45: "If a corporation takes land by grant or bequest in trust or otherwise, which by its charter it cannot hold, its title is good as against third persons and strangers; the state only can interfere."

The quotation below from Schouler on Wills (§ 24) directly implies that the bequests he is speaking of are merely voidable, for if void a legislature at its will could not cure the difficulty. The author says: "But limitations and restrictions under the act of incorporation should here be regarded, to the extent, at least, of procuring an enabling act from the legislature to hold the property where the original charter privileges would otherwise be transcended. In Massachusetts and many other states no disability to take by either devise or bequest is imposed by the statute of wills upon corporations. But the American rule is not uniform. Under the New York Code, for instance, it is expressly declared that no devise to a corporation shall be valid unless the corporation be expressly authorized by its charter or by statute to take by devise."

The text of the section, in Prichard on Wills, § 158, an extended note to which we have already incorporated in this opinion, on a review of the authorities says that when a corporation is already holding as much land as it is authorized to hold, its right to land devised to it can be questioned by the state only unless, as in New York, there is some statute declaring the devise to be void. It is said in Morawetz on Private Corporations, § 671, as follows: "The statute of New York prohibiting devises of real estate to corporations, unless expressly authorized by their charter or by statute to take by devise, renders prohibited devises absolutely void; and it has been held that the legislature cannot by subsequent enactment validate a devise which is void under the statute, for this would impair the vested rights of the heir.

A distinction should be observed between the effect of laws restricting the power of testators to devise their property to corporations, and laws restricting the power of corporators to take property. Such laws differ both in their application and in their legal effects." Again the author says in another section (§ 882) as follows: "A distinction should be observed between those laws whose object is to regulate corporations in respect to their power of acquiring and holding property, and laws whose object is to restrict the power of testators to dispose of their property. Laws of the former description are enacted in pursuance of a general policy of preventing corporations from acquiring the ownership of real estate in the absence of express authority from the state. But laws prohibiting devises to corporations are intended to restrict the testamentary capacity of testators, and their object, in many instances, is to prevent testators from being driven by the improper use of religious influence to devise their property to religious institutions, and thus disinherit their heirs."

Mr. Thompson, the learned and able commentator on Corporations, in his work which is the latest of any in this country on the subject, considers carefully the precise point in dispute between the present parties; and, in a lengthy section, fairly and fully states the effect of the authorities on both sides, and expresses his own opinion on the point in very positive terms in the manner following: "According to one view, if the amount of land which a corporation may hold is prescribed by its governing statute, and if it has already acquired lands to such an extent that a further devise to it will exceed that limit, then, in so far as the devise is in excess of that limit, it is void, and the title vests in the heirs. In such a case, the principle that the state alone can question the right of the corporation to hold the lands does not, in the opinion of some of the courts, apply, but the heirs of the testator can raise the question. Nor, in such a case, is the construction put upon the language of the statutes of mortmain applicable, making a distinction between the power to take and the power to hold; but such a statute, in the absence of some plain expression showing the contrary intent, is construed as prohibiting a taking where the prescribed limit has been reached. But other courts have taken the view that here, as in other cases, the question of the capacity of the corporation to take is one which can be raised by the state alone. And this is the only view sustainable on the analogies of this question. That view is, that a devise to a corporation, incapable for that or any other reason from taking, is good as against everyone save the state; just as is a deed to a corporation or to an alien; so that whenever the state waives its objection to it, that is an end of the discussion. But under the former view the devise is void only as to the excess; it is good up to the statutory limit, though there may be difficulty in determining that limit. Moreover under this doctrine, an act of the legislature passed subsequently to the death of the testator, enlarging the power of the corporation to take, will not affect the rights of the heirs, because the title vests in them instantly on the death of the testator, and it is not competent for the legislature to divest it." Thomp. Corp. § 5787.

The author, in § 6083, characterized the question as follows: "These considerations bring us to the somewhat new and growing doctrine, that whether a corporation has acted in excess of its granted powers, or in the face of an expressed or implied statutory prohibition, is one which cannot be raised in litigation between it and a private party, or between private parties, but can only be raised by the state, in a direct proceeding, either to forfeit the franchises of the corporation, or to subject it to punishment for doing the unlawful act." Other extracts from Mr. Thompson's book could be profitably added hereto, if it were reasonable to usurp so much space.

The complainants quote a part of a section from the same author as follows (§ 5800): "This principle [that the state alone can interfere] has no application where the corporation is seeking the aid of a court of justice to enable it to acquire lands which it has no power to acquire and hold. Here the principle is that a court of justice will not aid a corporation to do that which is impliedly forbidden by its charter or by the law." This might be misleading if read without the omitted portion of the section which is as follows: "It has, for instance, no application to a case where a suit in equity is brought to compel the specific performance of a contract to convey land to a railroad company, which the latter has attempted to acquire, not for any purpose connected with the building and operating of its road, but merely for speculative purposes. In such a case the specific performance was refused on the ground, among others, that the company had no power under its charter to take and hold land for such purposes." It is evident enough from the omitted extract, as well as from the citation in the note to the section that the meaning of the author is not inconsistent with his avowals in other sections of the work. The section applies to cases when a corporation has no power to be exercised and not merely where it exercises an excess of power of the same kind as that authorized by its charter. See, on this point, Case v. Kelly, 133 U. S. 21, 33 L. ed. 513.

The complainants quote in their brief an article in the Harvard Law Review (January, 1896) in which the writer, who was said at the argument by counsel for complainants to be a recent graduate of Harvard Law School, favors, upon the admittedly doubtful question, the view taken in the McGraw Case and not that adopted by the United States Supreme Court. But the writer makes no allusion to the fact that the opinion in his favorite case was based on certain stringent statutes of New York affecting the testamentary capacity of the testator to give, as well as upon the lack of ability in the donee to receive, while a different question was presented in Jones v. Habersham, 107 U. S. 174, 27 L. ed. 401, in which Mr. Justice Gray wrote the opinion. The writer also asserts that the latter case received but slight consideration at the hands of the court, he evidently not being aware that the same case was first deliberately considered and decided by the circuit court where Bradley, J., of the supreme court, delivered the opinion. Gray, J., stating that fact in the first line of his own opinion. The complainants also cite a bare remark in Bigelow's edition of Jarman on Wills, in note on page 63 of 6th edition, in which the editor seems to regard the doctrine that such a gift is invalid as the better doctrine.

But that learned author, in his brief note on the subject, takes no notice of the distinction between a want of testamentary capacity to give and a mere lack of authority in the corporation to take.

Taking now a retrospective glance at the cases and authorities on both sides which we have noticed in the foregoing pages, we feel impressed with the correctness of the statement of Strout, J., at the hearing of this case below, that the decided weight of authority is in favor of these respondents on this "new and growing question" as the author Thompson expresses it. Upon closing his discussion of the direct cases cited on his opening brief, the learned counsel for the complainants says: "But if the decisions of New York are claimed to rest upon the provisions of special New York statutes, what has the counsel to say as to all the other cases cited by the plaintiffs from North Carolina, from Kentucky, from New Jersey, and from Rhode Island?" We have substantially, according to our view, answered the questions ourselves by saying that the force of the opinion of the two judges in the North Carolina case is much lessened by the able minority opinion of the chief justice in the case and by the fact that the majority opinion yields the question as to devises of real estate; that the Kentucky case is a better authority for the respondents than for the complainants; that it is not sure that the complainants have any support in the New Jersey case outside of that contributed by the chief justice in his opinion; and that the Rhode Island case evidently follows the decisions in New York. How little authority then have the complainants to rely on outside of the McGraw Case in New York? We have no reason to doubt the correctness of the result of the decision in that case as based upon exceptional statutes in that state not existing elsewhere. And, should we undertake any criticism of that opinion, it would be that while the case was decided upon the statutory policy of that state, the opinion endeavors to bend into line with its policy the policy of other states where no such peculiar conditions are found to exist.

The counsel for the complainants has very critically reviewed the cases cited against them, and in some respects, as seems to us, upon purely theoretical rather than practical grounds. Their argument would sweep away much of the more direct authority, and all of the auxiliary cases as about worthless. This is too extreme. Of course, the cases of each class are not entirely alike, and may be of various degrees of force as authorities. But they all go to illustrate as well as to bring out the underlying principle on which a settlement of the case before us depends, and most or many of them are enough alike in support of the principle involved as to be regarded as leaves from the same tree.

The counsel rebels against regarding the national bank cases as fitting precedents in support of the question here, but they are so regarded in some cases and by some authors, which shows how other minds than ours are influenced by them. So the counsel protests just as strongly against the alien cases as being of any importance as authority. But that class of cases is constantly cited in the books as supporting by analogy such a position as the respondents stand upon here. Deeds to aliens may not be of principal importance, but it seems to us that devises to aliens, which are good at common law, are clearly cases in point and of more consequence as precedents than any other analogous authority. Does not the will containing a devise to an alien have to be approved with the same formalities as are required of the will of the present testator, and is the land devised any more in the possession of the devisee in the one case than in the other? It is argued in behalf of complainants that there is this distinction between an alien as devisee and a corporation as such; that in the case of an alien the disability is personal and does not attach until proved by some direct and not collateral proceeding, as bankruptcy must be proved in the case of a bankrupt or as felony must be proved in the case of a felon, before the full consequences of such a condition fall upon them. There must be a conviction. Is not that the very contention of the respondents here? What is there in this will which should lead a court to establish any illegality except by a direct proceeding for the purpose? And why should the law be any more generous to a bankrupt or a felon in the dispensation of its favors than to a charitable association? At common law, and by the statute law of some of the states, an alien can take real estate by devise and hold the same until office found to take it away from him. It is also argued for the complainants that executory contracts of an illegal nature where the illegality is participated in by both parties cannot be enforced by one party against the other, the parties being equally in fault. That principle is not applicable here. The executors and the corporation are not parties contending against each other. They are on the same side of this suit. It is admitted by the corporation that it would be a transgression of the law of its organization to accept the bequests unless the state actively or passively consents to it, and its silence is its consent. But what wrong has the testator committed by his act? The only contract that can be pertinently discussed here is that between the state and the corporation, and the state can do no wrong.

A few of the more important propositions pertinent to the case may, in conclusion, be briefly re-stated as these: That there is no restraining clause in our statute of wills preventing the testator from making these devises and bequests; that they are regular and valid on their face, nothing in the will indicating that the corporation might not be a competent trustee to administer the gifts; that the testator had no suspicion that there would be any question over the provisions of his will; that, if the bequests fail, it will be an accident caused by mistake of the testator respecting a fact or as-to the legal construction of such fact; that the same bequests (and devises) could have been safely made to almost any individual or to any one of many charitable corporations in the state instead of to this corporation; that there is a very narrow difference, if there be any, between selecting this institution and selecting any other suitable trustee for the execution of the trusts committed to it, such a corporation as this being merely a technical and meta-physical entity through which the benefit of the trusts were to go to poor persons suffering from certain diseases; that the heirs could have no voice or interest in the matter, unless accidentally so through the innocent mistake of the testator, they having no lien on the estate of either a legal or moral kind; that there are no words in the charter of the corporation, or in the statute authorizing its organization, that forbid its holding more than the amount limited by the statute, nor any penalties attached whereby to punish any transgression of the limitation, the only punishment intended being the risk of a forfeiture of the bequests or of the charter; that the limitation is chiefly directory and regulative, and, if impliedly prohibitory, incidentally and mildly so; that the charter is a contract between the corporation and the state in which no person is legally interested but the parties thereto, the same general rules of interpretation apply as in other contracts; that if the corporation fails to keep its side of the contract the state can take advantage of the default or not as it pleases; that the transgression may be so slight in its consequences that the state will forgive the offense, or forgive it because occasioned by some accident or resulting while the corporation is acting in good faith, or the state may, acting through its prosecuting officers, punish the offense for the public good; that the state may by its legislature authorize the corporation to increase its capital before the act is done, or, if the increase be made without authority, may ratify the act afterwards either by some legislative provision or, as may be done between any other contracting parties, by its silence and any other acts indicating consent; that from the foregoing propositions it is clearly deducible that bequests like the present are voidable only, and may be avoided by the state alone, and are in no sense to be regarded as void; that a policy arose as to what better be done in the circumstances of each particular case, and that the policy belongs to the state and not to the court and is an executive and not a judicial right, for the court would decide the question in the case for all cases and all time, while the state may decide the question differently at different times according to its discretion and the public good. This right the state has never surrendered and the court cannot take it from the state. But it would surely deprive the state of its privilege if the court fails to act upon these bequests as valid bequests until, in proper and independent proceedings, such bequests are declared to be void.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary and inexpedient to discuss the further contention of the respondents that the bequests are valid in equity if not at law, upon the maxim that no legal trust of a charitable nature shall fail for want of a competent trustee, and that if this corporation cannot act some other party may be appointed by the court that can.

Exceptions overruled. Appeal dismissed, and the decree below affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT

Frederick W. STOCK

v.

Township of JEFFERSON et al., Appts.

(.....Mich.....)

1. An injunction will not be refused to restrain the diversion of water from a milldam to one who has acted promptly in asserting his rights on the ground that the injury to him from the diversion of the water will be trivial compared with that suffered by the persons seeking to make the diversion in case they are not permitted to do so.
2. The improvement of highways, draining of lands, and general improvement of the country will not justify the diversion of water from a mill without compensation and due process of law.

(September 14, 1897.)

NOTE.—For some cases as to the rights of riparian owners, with respect to diversion of water, see Uibricht v. Eufaula Water Co. (Ala.) 4 L. R. A. 572, and note; also Gould v. Eaton (Cal.) ante, 181.

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Hilldale County in favor of plaintiff in a suit to enjoin the diversion of water from plaintiff's mill. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Chester & Twiss, for appellants:

Where the loss to complainant is disproportionate to that entailed upon the defendant by a perpetual injunction, it should not be granted.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

September 4, 1894, the complainant commenced this proceeding, praying for an injunction compelling the defendants to fill up a ditch they had dug to lower Pleasant lake, and carry the water therefrom south and east into the St. Joseph river, and then into the Maumee, and then into Lake Erie; complainant alleging that the waters from Pleasant lake had always run to the north and west, and through a chain of lakes and St. Joseph river to his mill, and from there on into the waters of Lake Michigan. Prior to 1858 a flouring mill was built at Hillsdale, which mill was run by water taken from the St. Joseph river. This river has its source in a chain of lakes four or five in number, the largest of which is Baw Beese lake, and the furthest of which is Lake Pleasant. In 1858 parties began to dig a ditch to carry the water in the direction in which the defendants have taken it. The then owners of the mill filed in the circuit court of Hillsdale county a bill, praying for a writ of injunction to restrain the parties from pursuing their work. A decree was rendered in that case, in accordance with the prayer of the bill. In 1869 the complainant became the owner of the mill in question, and has owned and operated it ever since. The defendant township and George E. Porter, highway commissioner, caused a ditch to be dug in the summer of 1893 and 1894, for the purpose of improving the highway in the township of Jefferson, in which there was a sink hole, which gave the township authorities a great deal of trouble. In the summer of 1898, while defendants were digging this ditch, complainant saw and talked with a number of those engaged in the work, and notified them the water they were diverting belonged to him, that he used it for the purpose of conducting his business in the city of Hillsdale; and on April 24, 1894, when defendants resumed their work on the ditch, complainant caused a copy of the decree that was made in 1858 to be served upon the highway commissioner, and forbade their continuing their work. As they failed to do so, this bill was filed. The case was heard in open court. In addition to hearing the testimony, the trial judge visited the premises, and saw what had been done, and the topography of the country. The judge found that much of the water which naturally flowed out from Lake Pleasant and from the big marsh about one of the other lakes would come down to the mill pond of the complainant if not diverted, and that Mr. Stock, as owner of the mill, had a right in the waters which naturally flowed from Lake Pleasant and this big marsh into his mill pond, and that the defendants were not justified in the action they had taken in digging this ditch, and that the effect of it was to divert the water from the mill, and granted a decree in the case, enjoining the defendants from diverting the waters which would naturally come to complainant's mill pond, and directing that the ditch be filled up at a certain point, to a certain depth, from which decree defendants appeal.

While the testimony is conflicting, we have no doubt, from an examination of the record, that the conclusion of the learned trial judge that the digging of this ditch was without legal right, and that its effect was to divert from complainant's mill a very considerable quantity of water to which he was entitled, is fully justified by the evidence. There can be no question from the record that the complainant was legally entitled to the use of all the water that would naturally come to his mill pond. The defendants were not riparian proprietors on the stream, and there is no question of the adjustment of the rights of several riparian proprietors on the same stream of water. So far as defendants diverted water to which complainant was entitled, they were trespassers.

It is the claim of the defendants that the loss to the complainant caused by the diversion of the water is trivial, while the damage the defendants would sustain if a permanent injunction is granted would be very great, and that, therefore, the injunction ought not to be allowed; citing Potter v. Saginaw Union Street R. Co. 88 Mich. 297, 10 L. R. A. 176, and cases there cited; Torrey v. Camden & A. R. Co. 18 N. J. Eq. 298; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 800, and note; Logansport v. Uhl, 99 Ind. 531, 50 Am. Rep. 112. None of these authorities establish the doctrine that, where one trespassed against acts promptly after notice of the trespass, equity will not interfere where the trespass is of a continuing nature, and is irreparable in its character. An examination of these cases will show either that it was doubtful if any damage would be done, or the complainant had not acted promptly in appealing to equity. It does not appeal to one's sense of justice to say that the exercise of a right possessed is not of as much benefit to the possessor as the taking of that right from the owner would be to the trespasser, and therefore the trespasser should be allowed to continue his trespass.

We think it clearly appears from the testimony that a large amount of water has been diverted from complainant's mill to which he was entitled, and that the conversion will continue if the action of the circuit judge is not sustained. It is doubtless true that many owners of lowlands about Pleasant lake and the large marsh are benefited by the cutting of this ditch, but one man is not to be deprived of property rights because to do so would benefit others more than he is injured. "It has always been settled that the owner of realty is entitled to the aid of equity to prevent permanent and continually recurring injuries to the enjoyment of his property. To deprive him of such enjoyment is to deprive him of the property itself, wholly, or to the extent of the mischief. Neither can it be allowable for wrongdoers to rely on their own wrong to change or lessen his means of redress. When they do mischief it is their own fault if they render a stringent remedy necessary, and they, and not the party injured, must take the consequences." Koopman v. Blodgett, 70 Mich. 610; Hall v. Ionia, 88 Mich. 498; Corning v. Troy Iron & N. Factory, 40 N. Y. 191. In the case of Koopman v. Blodgett, 70 Mich. 610, it is said: "A person owning a suitable place for a mill site cannot be deprived of it because someone else has wrongfully interfered with the stream above him. Without either such a lapse of time as will bar suit or indicate acquiescence, or some act of estoppel, rights of property are not to be barred." In the case at issue the complainant and his grantors had maintained a mill at this place for more than forty years, and whenever an attempt was made to direct the water in the manner it has been diverted by the defendants the courts were appealed to. Counsel says complainant stood by, and allowed defendants to incur large expense, and that he is estopped from appealing to equity now. We cannot agree with counsel in his contention. The defendants knew the complainant was opposed to what they did. He forbade their acts, and when they continued them, he caused a copy of a decree made more than forty years ago, in favor of his grantors, to be served upon them, and, when they paid no attention to all this, without unreasonable delay he appealed to the court. If they have expended considerable sums of money in committing this trespass, it is their own fault, and they must lose it.

It is urged very earnestly by counsel that Mr. Stock's right to maintain his dam and to use the water that would naturally come to his mill must give way to the right of the public to improve the highways, to drain lands, and to generally improve the country. It is sufficient reply to this argument to say that it has long been the fundamental law of the land that a man is not to be deprived of his property without due process of law, and without compensation.

Decree is affirmed, with costs.

NEBRASKA MEAL MILLS, Appt.,

v.

ST. LOUIS SOUTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

(..... Ark.)

1. A railroad company is not liable for delivery to the consignee to whom goods are billed, without notice to it that the bill of NOTE.—To whom may delivery be made under bill of lading.

NEBRASKA MEAL MILLS v. St. Louis S. W. R. Co. presents a rather unusual state of facts. The bill of lading made the goods deliverable to the consignee absolutely without any mention of order or assigns. In most of the bills of lading there has been some qualification of the absolute right of the consignee. In many of them the property is deliverable to order, in which event the cases agree that the carrier cannot safely deliver without such order or knowledge that it has not been given.

Goods deliverable to order.

If the property is consigned care of the consignee to order of the one making advances on the bill of lading, the carrier will be liable to the latter in case he delivers to the consignee without the latter's order. Stone v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 88 S. D. 1.

By issuing bills of lading stipulating for a delivery to order the ship becomes bound to deliver to no one who has not the order of the shipper. It is no excuse for a delivery to the wrong person that the indorsee of the bill of lading was unknown and that notice of the arrival of the vessel could not be given to him. If the consignee cannot be found it is the duty of the carrier to retain the goods until they are claimed, or to store them for the owner. And he has no right under any circumstances to deliver them to a stranger. The Thames v. Seaman ("The Thames"), 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 98, 20 L. ed. 804.

If the goods are shipped subject to the order of the consignor the carrier will not be justified in delivering them without such order by the fact 88 L. R. A.

lading has been forwarded to a bank with a draft attached for collection, although the bill of lading is not produced.

2. The right of a carrier to deliver to the consignee is not affected by a statute declaring bills of lading negotiable and any person to whom the same are transferred to be held the owner so far as to give validity to any pledge, lien, or transfer upon the faith thereof, and that no property specified therein shall be delivered except on the surrender and cancellation of the that one of the employees of the shipper said that the property was for a certain person. Sawyer v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 22 Wis. 408.

In Brandt v. Bowlby, 2 Barn. & Ad. 332, where the cargo was deliverable to the order of certain persons, the carrier delivered without their order, but defended upon the ground that the property had vested in the one to whom it was delivered, and that therefore the damages would be no more than nominal; but the court held that the property had not vested in him and that full damages could be recovered.

Although the shipment is made to the order of the consignor the carrier will not be liable if it has delivered to the order of one whom the shipper has held out as his general agent with authority to give orders as to the delivery of shipments. Watson v. Hoeseac Tunnel Line Co. 13 Mo. App. 263.

If the contract of the carrier calls for delivery to the order of the consignor the carrier by delivering to a third person has the burden of showing that he is the true owner. Wolfe v. Missouri P. R. Co. 97 Mo. 473.

If the goods are to be delivered to the consignee or his order the carrier will not be justified in delivering to a general agent of the consignor. Wilson Sewing Mach. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 71 Mo. 208.

Where the shipper has retained the bill of lading himself and the carrier delivered the property to the consignee without the order of the shipper, the court said where any person holding property as carrier which he knows to belong to one person and to be subject to his order voluntarily gives that property to another without the owner's bill of lading, except in cases where the bill of lading has been transferred.

authority it is evidence of a conversion. Lealie v. Canada C. R. Co. 44 U. C. Q. B. 21.

Must deliver to holder of bill of lading.

Under ordinary circumstances where the goods are deliverable to order or assigns there must be a delivery to the holder of the bill of lading, and delivery to the consignee who does not hold the bill of lading is not sufficient.

In Walker v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 49 Mich. 446, it is said that carriers must recognize transfers of bills of lading, and unless protected by proper vouchers cannot always assume to deal with consignments as actually and beneficially belonging to the consignee.

The carrier will be liable if he delivers to the consignee while the bill of lading is in the hands of a third person who has advanced money on it. Alderman v. Eastern R. Co. 115 Mass. 233.

It is the duty of the carrier to ascertain whether or not a bill of lading was delivered to the shipper, and if so to retain the property until demanded by one claiming under that title, and to deliver in accordance with it. Furman v. Union P. R. Co. 106 N. Y. 573.

A delivery of goods by a common carrier otherwise than in accordance with the bill of lading is in the carrier's wrong and at his risk. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Stern, 119 Pa. 24.

The carrier may be liable for delivery to a person who does not hold the bill of lading. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. v. Larned, 103 Ill. 298; St. Louis & T. H. R. Co. v. Rose, 20 Ill. App. 670; Merchants' Despatch & Transp. Co. v. Merriam, 111 Ind. 6; Garden Grove Bank v. Humeston & S. R. Co. 67 Iowa, 526; Gibbons v. Farwell, 63 Mich. 344; Union Stock Yards Co. v. Westcott, 47 Neb. 300; Collins v. Burns, 43 N. Y. 1.

A steambot cannot avoid its liability for the loss of the goods by showing that it delivered them to the owner of a wharfing boat lying in front of the place to which the goods were destined. Wayne v. The General Pike, 18 Ohio, 421.

It is immaterial that prior to the making of the advance on the bill of lading the carrier has improperly parted with control of the property, as the improper delivery of the property will not relieve the carrier of its liability to the indorsee of the bill of lading. First Nat. Bank v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 85 Hun, 160.

The directions of the bill of lading must control over the marks on the packages. Moore v. Henry, 18 Mo. App. 35.

If the goods which are shipped by separate bills of lading are included by the delivery clerk in one bill of charges and delivered to the person paying the bill, the carrier will be liable to the person whose property is by the mistake wrongfully delivered. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Ames, 40 Ill. 249.

In Sanquer v. London & S. W. R. Co. 16 C. B. 163, 3 C. L. Rep. 811, the carrier delivered some butter to persons to whom he had been in the habit of delivering at a different place from where the 38 L. R. A.

D. Russell. The appellant then, without notice to the railway company, drew a sight draft on said Russell for $182.30, the price of the meal, and attached it to the packages were marked for delivery, and he was held liable for not delivering to the holder the bill of lading; but the question does not turn upon the rights given upon the bill of lading, but upon the assumption of the carrier as to the proper delivery and whether or not there had been a ratification.

In case the carrier signs a bill of lading to deliver the cargo to a certain person, and afterwards signs another to deliver a portion of it to another person, he will be liable to the consignor in case he fails to comply with the latter bill. Stille v. Traverse, 3 Wash. C. C. 43.

And in Anderson v. Clark, 2 Bing. 20, where the consignee refused to accept the draft and the carrier redelivered to the consignor, he was held liable to the consignee for neglecting to deliver in accordance with the bill of lading.

If the consignee refuses to accept or to make an appointment under the bill of lading, the carrier will be justified in delivering to the agent of the consignor at the port of discharge. Shepard v. De Bernales, 13 East. 565.

In Low v. De Wolf, 8 Pick. 101, it was held that where it became necessary at an intermediate port to unload a portion of the cargo which could not be restowed, and so was delivered by the master to a third person to be sold on account of the owner, the master will not be held liable to an assignee of the bill of lading for the amount transmitted to the owner, the bill of lading being "to order or assigns," and the master not knowing of the assignment.

Necessity of production of bill of lading.

The almost universal rule is to require a production of the bill of lading before making a delivery.

Unless the carrier has stamped the bill as not negotiable he is bound to recognize the validity of transfers and to deliver the property only on the production and cancelation of the bill. Bank of Batavia v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 106 N. Y. 196, 60 Am. Rep. 440.

A railroad company may for its own protection exact the production of the bill of lading before making delivery of the goods to the consignee. Bas v. Glover, 63 Ga. 745.

A clause in a bill of lading requiring the presentation to the carrier of the bill of lading properly indorsed as the evidence whereon delivery shall be made is valid. Bishop v. Empire Transp. Co. 1 Jones & S. 99.

If the bill of lading provides for a delivery of the property to the consignee upon presentation of the duplicate, the carrier will be liable in case he delivers without requiring production of the duplicate. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. v. Irvin, 46 Ind. 180.

In McEwen v. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. 33 Ind. 368, 5 Am. Rep. 216, the bill of lading stipulated for a delivery to the consignee upon his production of the duplicate bill of lading, and the carrier delivered without such production. It bill of lading, and had the same forwarded to a bank at Pine Bluff, Arkansas, for collection. The bank presented the draft for payment, but Russell was insolvent, and failed to pay. The St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company, which had received the meal as connecting carrier, having no notice that a draft had been drawn on Russell and sent for collection, or that Russell was insolvent, or that the consignor desired to retain control of the meal until the draft was paid, delivered the meal to him without requiring the production of the bill of lading. The appellant brought this suit against the railway company to recover damages, alleging that the delivery under such circumstances was wrongful and resulted to its injury. The finding and judgment were in favor of the defendant.

Messrs. Bridges & Wooldridge, for appellants:

The railway company is liable to the shipper, if it delivered the meal without requiring the consignee to surrender and cancel the bill of lading, and by reason thereof plaintiffs were damaged.

When goods are consigned without reservation on the part of the consignor the prima facie legal presumption is that the consignee is the owner. The fact of consignment does not vest an absolute title in the consignee. His title is not complete until the bill of lading comes into his hands.

2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 242.

It was the duty of the carrier to ascertain whether a bill of lading was delivered to the shipper, and, if so, to retain the property until was argued that the stipulation was for the benefit of the carrier to aid identification, but the court held that it was for the benefit of the consignor, and that the delivery without compliance with the stipulation rendered the carrier liable.

In Cole v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 21 Mo. App. 443, it is stated in the separate opinion that if the carrier delivers the goods to the wrong party he does so at his peril, wherefore the law is that the carrier has the right for his necessary protection to demand the bills of lading before delivery, or, in case of a demand by the rightful owner, to require reasonable evidence of his identity.

The carrier will be liable for delivering without the production of the bill of lading. Bristol & West of England Bank v. Midland R. Co. [1891] 2 Q. B. 663.

A delivery to the consignee is at the peril of the carrier unless at the time of delivery the consignee surrenders the bill of lading made or indorsed to himself. Gates v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 42 Neb. 379; Union P. R. Co. v. Johnston, 45 Neb. 57.

A carrier which delivers goods intrusted to him for carriage, without production of the bill of lading describing the goods, is liable in trover for their value to a bona fide holder of the bill of lading taken for value before the delivery of the goods at destination. First Nat. Bank v. Northern R. Co. 58 N. H. 253.

In City Bank v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 44 N. Y. 126, it is said it is the law that a carrier is bound to ascertain whether a bill of lading was delivered to the shipper, and if delivered he must retain the property until it is demanded by one claiming under that title.

If by the terms of a bill of lading the goods are to be delivered to a named consignee or his assigns, the master is not entitled to deliver the goods to the consignee without the production of one of the parts of the bill of lading. The Stettin, L. R. 14 Prob. Div. 142.

If the bill of lading is indorsed as security for a draft the carrier will be liable in case he delivers to the consignee while the draft is outstanding unpaid and the bill of lading is not surrendered. The Thames, 7 Blatchf. 226.

A carrier which transacts business for a certain firm between two places without ever requiring bills of lading to be delivered up as a condition for delivery of the freight will be liable to a third person to whom the bill of lading has been transferred for value without notice of the irregularity in the mode of transacting the business. Walters v. Western & A. R. Co. 56 Fed. Rep. 369.

If a bill of lading is attached to a draft on which money is advanced the carrier will be liable to the one making the advances in case he delivers the cargo to a purchaser from the consignee without requiring the bill of lading to be delivered up. Walters v. Western & A. R. Co. 63 Fed. Rep. 391.

Where the goods are consigned to the order of the consignor, and the bill of lading is indorsed in blank and negotiated for value as security for a draft, the carrier has no right to deliver the goods without production of the bill of lading or authority from the holder thereof. Boatmen's Sav. Bank v. Western & A. R. Co. 81 Ga. 221.

If a shipper takes a bill of lading to himself as consignee, and the carrier delivers the goods to another with his consent but without surrender of the bills of lading, a subsequent assignee of the bill of lading, though acquiring it without notice and for value, will have no recourse against the carrier. Alabama Nat. Bank v. Mobile & O. R. Co. 42 Mo. App. 284.

The fact that a person claiming the property gives an undertaking to deliver the bill of lading as soon as he receives it will not justify the carrier in delivering to him. Merchants Bank v. Union R. & Transp. Co. 69 N. Y. 373, affirming 8 Hun. 249.

But in Ramish v. Kirschbraun, 107 Cal. 659, it appears that the carrier was in the habit of delivering the property in advance of the arrival of the bill of lading upon the giving of a bond for its protection.

The carrier will be liable in case it delivers in violation of the express notice not to deliver without production of the bill of lading. Foggan v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 40 N. Y. 8, R. 718.

The delivery of the goods by the carrier to a person unauthorized to receive them, without requiring production of the bill of lading but relying on his representation that he is the holder of it, is a conversion. Forbes v. Boston & L. R. Co. 133 Mass. 154.

In Nathan v. Giles, 5 Taunt. 558, 1 Marsh. 220, it is assumed that if the shipowner delivered without production of the bill of lading he would be liable to the indorsee upon the latter's demand for the cargo.

If the goods are delivered without production of the bill of lading the carrier assumes the burden of showing that the delivery was to the proper person. National Bank v. Atlanta & C. Air Line R. Co. 26 S. C. 216.

If the carrier delivers without the production of the bill of lading he takes upon himself the risk of its previous transfer for value to an innocent indorsee. Midland Nat. Bank v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 62 Mo. App. 531.

If by a course of dealing the carrier has acquired a habit of delivering to the consignee without objection from the holder of the bills of lading it may continue to treat the consignee as agent of the holder of the bill of lading, and will not be liable for delivering to him without a surrender of the bill of lading. Ontario Bank v. New Jersey S. R. Co. 59 N. Y. 610.

demand by one claiming under that title, and to deliver in accordance therewith.

City Bank v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 44 N. Y. 186; Furman v. Union P. R. Co. 106 N. Y. 579.

Defendant railway company could have protected itself by demanding of the consignee a production and cancellation of the bill of lading.

Bass v. Glover, 68 Ga. 746; 2 Beach, Railways, § 951; Furman v. Union P. R. Co. 106 N. Y. 579; Merchants' Despatch & Transp. Co. v. Merriam, 111 Ind. 6; McKuen v. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. 88 Ind. 864, 5 Am. Rep. 216; Walker v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 49 Mich. 446; Wells, F. & Co. v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 32 Fed. Rep. 51.

If the carrier delivered the goods to the consignee without requiring him to surrender

If the carrier delivers upon order of the consignee he will not be liable to one to whom the consignee subsequently assigns the bill of lading the surrender of which the carrier did not require. Anchor Mill Co. v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. (Iowa) 71 N. W. 255.

The New York statute prohibits the delivery by a common carrier of property covered by a bill of lading except upon surrender and cancellation of the bill. Colgate v. Pennsylvania Co. 102 N. Y. 120, affirming 81 Hun, 297.

The fact that the words "Not negotiable" are upon the back of the bill of lading is not sufficient to satisfy the requirement of the New York statute that no delivery shall be made without a surrender of the bill of lading unless it contains the words "Not negotiable" upon its face. First Nat. Bank v. New York C. & H. R. Co. 85 Hun, 160.

In Howard v. Shepherd, 9 C. B. 297, 19 L. J. C. P. N. 8. 249, where the suit was for delivering the property to one who was not the holder of the bill of lading, it appeared that the declaration did not allege the production of the bill of lading by the plaintiff, so no breach of his duty to the plaintiff was shown and judgment went against him; but it is said the duty of the shipowner was to keep the goods until some person presented the bill of lading to him at the point of destination.

In one case it was held that where the property was bought under a fictitious name and consigned to the purchaser by that name, and a bill of lading mailed to him, which was not delivered because no person of that name was known, the carrier was not liable for delivering the property to him, although he did not produce the bill of lading, and was known by another name to the station agent, because of which he claimed the goods as agent for the consignee. Dunbar v. Boston & P. R. Corp. 110 Mass. 28, 14 Am. Rep. 576.

The bill of lading may be controlled by subsequent communications or by statutes.

In Mitcheil v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 17 Ill. App. 231, the carrier was held justified in delivering without production of the bill of lading upon seeing a telegram to the consignee telling him to do the best he could. That anything he did would be satisfactory.

So it was held that a bill of lading requiring delivery to the owner or his assigns may be controlled by a subsequent letter directing the master to manage as A B and C D have directed with regard to goods shipped by them. And the master will be justified in doing as either of the parties mentioned direct. Forrester v. Dodge, 12 Mass. 555.

In Texas there is a statute requiring delivery upon payment of freight.

The carrier is justified in refusing to deliver goods until the bill of lading is produced, notwithstanding L. R. A.

and cancel the bill of lading, and the draft was not paid, it would be liable to the shipper for such loss.

Gates v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 42 Neb. 879; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Stern, 119 Pa. 24; North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 123 U. S. 727, 31 L. ed. 287; Bank of Commerce v. Bissell, 73 N. Y. 615; Newcomb v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 115 Mass. 280; Weyand v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 75 Iowa, 578, 1 L. R. A. 650; Second Nat. Bank v. Cummings, 89 Tenn. 669; Alderman v. Eastern R. Co. 115 Mass. 238; Midland Nat. Bank v. Missouri P. R. Co. 182 Mo. 423.

A bill of lading in this state is not only assignable, but it is made a negotiable instrument, the same as a promissory note or bill of exchange.

standing security is offered. 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. § 245.

Under this statute it has been held that a carrier cannot rightfully refuse to deliver the goods after inspecting the bill of lading on the ground that the bill is not surrendered to him if the consignee tenders the freight charges as contained in the bill and executes a receipt for the goods. Dwyer v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 69 Tex. 707; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McCown (Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 435.

But a railroad company is not liable for failure to deliver goods to an unidentified consignee where he fails to produce the bill of lading though he may offer security. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Freeman (Tex. App.) 9 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 497.

Although it has been held that under the Texas statute prescribing a penalty for refusal to deliver freight it is not necessary to entitle the consignee to the penalty that he should have presented his bill of lading when making demand for the property. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dwyer, 75 Tex. 572, 7 L. R. A. 478; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McCown (Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 435, reversed on another point on rehearing, 26 S. W. 745.

The point made in NEBRASKA MEAL MILLS v. ST. LOUIS SOUTHWESTERN R. CO. that, if the bill of lading makes the property deliverable to the consignee absolutely, delivery may be safely made without production of the bill of lading, does not seem to have been presented in any other case. It would seem that there might be some ground for distinction between cases where the consignment was absolutely to the consignee and those where it was to his order or assigns. But there is language in some of the above cases holding that the carrier cannot safely deliver without a production of the bill of lading, which is broad enough to include all cases whether made to order or assigns or not.

Shipper's rights.

The doctrine of stoppage in transitu is not within the scope of this note, but some cases have arisen in which the rights of the shipper under the bill of lading have been considered.

On delivery of goods to a carrier and a receipt of a bill of lading therefor making the property deliverable to the consignee, the consignor loses all control over the goods except the right of stoppage in transitu. Armentrout v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 1 Mo. App. 158.

After shipment the carrier holds the property for the lawful holder of the bill of lading. If the bill is drawn in the consignee's favor, the consignor's possession and control are gone. Schindler v. Smith, 18 La. Ann. 476.

If the shipper takes the bill of lading in his own name the carrier cannot rightfully deliver the property to any other person except on his order

Plaintiffs had a right to rely upon the statute requiring the production and cancellation of the bills of lading. Defendant was bound to take notice of the same. The statute was as much a part of the contract as if it had been inserted in the bills of lading.

Colgate v. Pennsylvania Co. 109 N. Y. 120; Jasper Trust Co. v. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. 99 Ala. 416.

The intention of the parties was an important question and should have gone to the jury, for a delivery to a carrier is considered as a delivery to the consignee only when and as it is in agreement with the terms and intention of the shipment.

Taylor v. Turner, 87 Ill. 296; Emery Sons v. Irving Nat. Bank, 25 Ohio St. 360, 18 Am. Rep. 299; Scharff v. Meyer, 133 Mo. 428.

A connecting carrier's liability for a failure to carry out the original contract with the shipper is the same as that of the carrier issuing the bill of lading, and the law imposes upon it the same duties.

St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Weekly, 50 Ark. 397.

Messrs. Samuel H. West, J. M. Taylor, and J. G. Taylor, for appellee:

A bill of lading is defined to be a written acknowledgment by a common carrier of the receipt of certain goods described therein, and an agreement to transport them to their place of destination, to be there delivered in good order to the consignee or his assigns.

2 Beach, Railways, § 951.

A clause requiring the presentation to the carrier of bills of lading, properly indorsed, as the evidence on which the delivery of the goods is to be made, is valid.

or transfer of the bill of lading. Young v. East Alabama R. Co. 80 Ala. 100.

In First Nat. Bank v. Crocker, 111 Mass. 163, it is said that where by the terms of the bill of lading the goods are to be delivered to the consignor's order the carrier is his agent and not the agent of the consignee.

If the carrier delivers to the consignor at an intermediate station without surrender of the bill of lading it will be liable to a subsequent assignee of the bill of lading who receives it before the goods would in due course have arrived at destination. Ratzer v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 64 Minn. 245.

If the shipper has received a bill of lading and forwards it to the point of destination he cannot demand back the goods before the ship sails without indemnifying the carrier against liability to a holder of the bill of lading at the port of destination. Tindall v. Taylor, 4 Bl. & Bl. 219, 3 C. L. Rep. 190, 24 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 12, 1 Jur. N. S. 112.

If the bill of lading is attached to a draft upon the consignee the carrier will be liable to him in case he delivers the property while in transit to the shipper after the consignee has taken up the draft. Wells, F. & Co. v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 15, 12 Sawy. 519.

If the shipper has exercised his right of stoppage in transitu the vessel is not liable for refusal to deliver to the consignee under the bill of lading. The Vidette, 34 Fed. Rep. 306; The E. H. Pray, 27 Fed. Rep. 474.

If the order for stoppage is withdrawn the carrier will be liable for refusal to deliver to an assignee for value of the bill of lading. Schmidt v. The Pennsylvania, 4 Fed. Rep. 543.

The fact that one of the bills is marked "duplicate" does not change its effect, but if it is indorsed for value the consignor will lose control over the property and the carrier will be liable to the indorsee if it permits the consignor to control the delivery. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Heldenheimer, 32 Tex. 196.

If the bill of lading requires delivery to the consignee or his assigns no action can be maintained by the shipper without a surrender of the bill of lading or the consent of the consignee. Shepard v. Heineken, 2 Sweeney, 525.

Duplicate bills.

If the carrier issues an original bill of lading to shipper's order and another duplicate for the shipper's protection with no mark making the original void in case of delivery on the duplicate it will be liable to an assignee for value of the original in case it redelivers to the shipper on the duplicate. Midland Nat. Bank v. Missouri P. R. Co. 132 Mo. 492.

If duplicate bills are issued which are not stated 38 L. R. A.

to be duplicates the carrier will be liable in case it delivers on one of them to the holder of another for value without notice that the second is outstanding. Midland Nat. Bank v. Missouri P. R. Co. 132 Mo. 492.

The fact that a duplicate bill of lading is procured and presented by a person claiming the goods, which is not assigned or indorsed by either the consignor or consignee, will not justify the carrier in delivering the goods to him without further identification. Cavallaro v. Texas & P. R. Co. 110 Cal. 318.

Delivery may be made to the one first producing the bill of lading although a duplicate had been previously assigned for value to a third person. Glyn v. East & West India Dock Co. L. R. 7 App. Cas. 591, 52 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 146, 47 L. T. N. S. 309, 31 Week. Rep. 208, 4 Asp. M. C. 580. Affirming L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 492, 50 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 62, 43 L. T. N. S. 534, 29 Week. Rep. 318, citing The Tigress, Brown & L. 38, 32 L. J. Adm. N. S. 97, 9 Jur. N. S. 361, 3 L. T. N. S. 117, 11 Week. Rep. 578, as holding that the master would have been justified in delivering to the holder of the first bill of lading presented.

In Fearon v. Bowers, 1 H. Bl. 364, note, where the question was between rival claimants under duplicate bills of lading, and the suit was against the captain for wrongful delivery, it is said that according to the usage of trade the captain was not concerned to examine who had the best right on the different bills of lading. All he had to do was to deliver the goods upon one of the bills of lading. But this statement was limited in L. R. 7 App. Cas. 591, to the extent that if he had notice of both he must determine at his peril which was the better claim.

In Barber v. Meyerstein, L. R. 4 H. L. 317, 39 L. J. C. P. N. S. 187, 22 L. T. N. S. 808, 18 Week. Rep. 1041, it is said that in case of duplicate bills of lading the shipowner having no notice of a first dealing with a bill of lading may, on the second being produced by another party, be justified in delivering the goods to that party.

Shipping receipts.

In Bailey v. Hudson River R. Co. 49 N. Y. 70, where shipping receipts were taken but not forwarded to the consignee, and the consignor subsequently changed the destination of the property, the carrier was held liable for a delivery to the changed consignee on the ground that the title had passed to the original consignee at the time of the shipment, and that the consignor then lost control over the property.

If a receipt has been given for the goods by the master of the ship, the holder of the receipt, and not of the bill of lading subsequently issued without surrender of the receipt, is entitled to control

Porter, Bills of Lading, § 397.

A compliance with the bill of lading, or shipping contract, is all that is required of the carrier.

North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 123 U. S. 738, 81 L. ed. 288; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hartwell, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 745.

We need not discuss the statute making bills of lading negotiable because the bill of lading in this case was never assigned or negotiated in any way, and the rights of the parties stand as they did without the enactment of Sandels & Hill's Digest referred to by counsel; for all agree that the statute is only declaratory of existing law relating to the transfer of bills of lading.

Durr v. Hervey, 44 Ark. 306, 51 Am. Rep. 594.

the delivery of the goods. Craven v. Ryder, 3 Marsh. 127, 6 Taunt. 433, Holt, 100.

The one who pays drafts with railroad receipts attached for a cargo of grain has a right to the property which will entitle him to maintain an action against the carrier in case he delivers to a third person upon the order of the consignee without a production of the receipts. Newcomb v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 115 Mass. 230.

The receipt of an express carrier is not of equal importance with a regular bill of lading. In Ten Eyck v. Harris, 47 Ill. 268, it appeared that the package was delivered without surrender of the receipt which reached the hands of a third person for value. The court says "when evidence of delivery was introduced it became a question of identity to determine to whom the delivery was made." The implication seems to be that delivery to the consignee would exonerate the carrier, although the receipt was outstanding and in the hands of a person who had advanced money on it.

Indorsement required.

Possession of the bill of lading by one other than the consignee without indorsement does not authorize the carrier to deliver to him, although there is a custom at the place to deliver under such circumstances. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Barkhouse, 100 Ala. 543.

If the bill of lading is to the order of the consignee, the carrier will not be justified in delivering to the consignee, although he presents the bill of lading, unless it is indorsed. Weyand v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 75 Iowa, 573, 1 L. R. A. 630.

If the goods are deliverable to the shipper's order the carrier has no right to deliver to any person unless he manifests his right to the property by the exhibition of the bill of lading indorsed by the shipper. And if the carrier delivers without such indorsement it will be liable to the true owner of the property or to one having the actual possession of the bill of lading as collateral security for the value of the property. Douglas v. People's Bank, 86 Ky. 176.

In Sword v. Young, 89 Tenn. 126, it was held that the holder of an unindorsed bill of lading should be required to identify himself as the proper consignee before the carrier would be justified in delivering it to him.

But in Tracy v. Storer, 5 La. 367, it was held that if the carrier had delivered all but two packages out of eighty-eight to the holder of the bill of lading he could not justify a refusal to deliver the other two on the ground that there had been no assignment of the bill of lading.

Wrongful holder.

The mere possession of the bill of lading is not in all cases sufficient.

It is like in this respect to a negotiable note. The maker of the note may pay the same to the payee at any time without requiring a surrender or cancellation of his note, and after doing so may be compelled to pay the note to an innocent indorsee thereof for value, etc., before maturity; yet if such note were not transferred, indorsed, or assigned by the payee to anyone, no one would pretend that the maker had incurred any liability because he had paid his note; he has but performed his contract and that is the end of such transactions.

If the bill of lading is obtained without authority or by fraud it will not affect the right of the owner to stop the goods in transit. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Erwin, 84 Ind. 457.

One holding under a stolen bill of lading cannot retain the possession as against a claim of the carrier for a return of the property. Shaw v. Merchants' Nat. Bank ("Shaw v. R. R. Co.") 101 U. S. 557, 25 L. ed. 892.

Where the shipping receipts were stolen by the consignee, who procured bills of lading upon them which he negotiated for value, the carrier was held liable for delivery under the bills of lading against the orders of the consignors. Brower v. Peabody, 13 N. Y. 121.

The carrier cannot withhold the property from the true owner because one who has procured the bill of lading by fraud has indorsed it to a bona fide holder for value. Decan v. Shipper, 85 Pa. 229, 78 Am. Dec. 384.

In Hazard v. Abel, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. 412, it was held that a warehouseman who issued his receipts for grain delivered by the carrier which were indorsed to the consignee's agent was not liable for delivering upon them, although the bill of lading had been delivered for value by the agent to a third person. The agent, having no authority to deliver the bill of lading, could not transfer a good title to the assignee.

It has, however, been held that the master of a vessel who has issued a bill of lading to a person returning a shipping receipt which was issued to the true owner cannot be required to deliver to the true owner unless the bill of lading is returned or fully indemnified against, although the possession of the receipt was obtained from the shipper by false representations. Keyser v. Harbeck, 3 Duer, 373.

So, where the seller thought he was consigning the goods to the order of a reputable merchant, and mailed the bills of lading to him, but they were obtained by another person of the same name who presented them to the carrier who then delivered the goods to him, the merchant having refused them, the carrier will not be liable for a misdelivery. Bush v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 3 Mo. App. 62.

Effect of order to notify certain person.

The fact that the bill of lading contains a direction to notify a certain person of the arrival of the goods is no indication that he has any interest in them. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Southern Bank, 41 Ill. App. 237.

The carrier will be liable if he delivers the goods to the consignee while the shipping receipt contains directions to notify the consignee and deliver to the order of the consignor who has forwarded

A carrier is justified in delivering goods in accordance with the terms of the bills of lading to the consignee, notwithstanding the consignor has transferred the bill of lading, when such delivery is justified by custom, and this without being liable to a holder of such a bill of lading.

Forbes v. Fitchburg R. Co. 183 Mass. 159.

Riddick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill of lading under which the meal was forwarded by defendant railway company stipulated that it was to be transported to Altheimer, Arkansas, and there delivered to the consignee, E. D. Russell. It is admitted that the railway company performed its contract in strict accordance with its terms. But it is said the receipt with a draft attached for collection. Libby v. Ingalls, 124 Mass. 608.

Directions in a bill of lading to notify a certain person of the arrival of the shipment at the place of destination is no authority to the carrier to make delivery of such shipment to the person so to be notified without the production of the bill of lading. Union Stock Yards Co. v. Westcott, 47 Neb. 800.

The carrier is not justified in delivering to the person whom he is directed to notify if the property is deliverable to the order of a third person whose order is not obtained. Bank of Commerce v. Bissell, 72 N. Y. 615.

If the bill of lading is to the order of the consignor with directions to notify the consignee, a delivery to the consignee without the order of the consignor will render the carrier liable for the loss thereby occasioned. Wright v. Northern C. R. Co. 8 Phila. 18.

If a bill of lading is given to the order of the shipper with directions to notify J. B., a connecting carrier, with notice of the terms of the bill of lading will be liable for the damage in case it delivers to J. B. without the order of the shipper. The court says the duty of a common carrier is not merely to carry safely, but also to deliver to the person designated by the terms of the shipment, or to his order, at the place of destination. There are no conditions which will release him from this duty except such as would also release him from the safe carriage of the goods. The carrier cannot relieve himself from responsibility by turning the goods over to a person not entitled to receive them. North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 128 U. S. 737, 31 L. ed. 287.

Rights of true owner.

The carrier will be justified in delivering the property to the order of the true owner, although it is contrary to the terms of the bill of lading, the goods having been shipped and the bill of lading procured by one having no title to them. Heintz v. The Idaho ("The Idaho"), 98 U. S. 575, 28 L. ed. 978.

The carrier may be justified in delivering to the true owner although he has given a bill of lading to a third person as shipper. Young v. East Alabama R. Co. 80 Ala. 100.

As against the consignor it may be a good defense to the carrier that he delivered to the true owner. Bates v. Stanton, 1 Duer, 79; Sheridan v. New Quay Co. 4 C. B. N. S. 618, 28 L. J. C. P. N. S. 58, 5 Jur. N. S. 248; National Bank v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 44 Minn. 224, 9 L. R. A. 268; Brunswick v. United States Exp. Co. 46 Iowa, 677; Pingree v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 66 Mich. 143.

that the consignee, Russell, had not paid for the meal; that the consignor had drawn upon him for the price of the meal, and had forwarded the draft, with the bill of lading attached thereto, to a bank for collection, thus showing an intention that Russell should not have the meal without first paying for it. The answer to this argument is that, if it be true that the consignor did not intend that the meal should be delivered until the payment of the purchase price, yet it is also true that the railway company had no notice of such intention. The meal was billed "straight" to the consignee, and, as the railway company had no notice of the intention of the consignor to retain the ownership and control of the property, it was justified in presuming that the consignee was the owner thereof, and was discharged by a delivery to him at the place specified in the bill of lading. Sweet v. Barney,

The carrier may justify if he delivers to the true owner. Western Transp. Co. v. Barber, 56 N. Y. 544. The court says the bailor can confer on the bailee no better title than he himself has except in cases of negotiating bills of lading and like cases. This thought is not elaborated, however, so as to show the limits of the exception or whether or not the exception would extend to the protection of a person who had advanced money on the bill of lading to a bailor who had no title to the property.

But if the carrier undertakes to justify delivery to a third person, on the ground that he was the true owner, he has the burden of proof to establish that fact. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Moline Plow Co. 18 Ind. App. 225.

So the carrier will be liable if he surrenders the property to a person having merely a telegram from the sheriff to stop the property, that the sheriff will be there on the next train with attachment. Nickey v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 86 Mo. App. 79.

Delivery on carrier's copy.

The carrier cannot be required to deliver the cargo upon his copy of the bill of lading while the other copy is outstanding. The Saugerties, 44 Fed. Rep. 625.

If the carrier delivers the cargo on his own copy of the bill of lading without requiring the production of the others he will be liable to a third person into whose hands the duplicate has come for value. The Mary Bradford, 18 Fed. Rep. 189.

Incidents of delivery.

If the holder of the bill of lading receives due notice of the arrival of the vessel, and the bill of lading provides that the property shall be at the risk of the consignee as soon as it leaves the ship's tackle, the shipowner will not be liable if it is taken away by a third person after it is placed on the wharf. The Santee, 7 Blatchf. 186.

In The Ben Adams, 2 Ben. 445, which was a case of the mixing of the cargo, the court says the carrier is responsible for the value of the goods if he delivers them to a wrong person, even though by mistake or imposition.

If the bill of lading is signed before any property is placed on board it will not convey any title to property subsequently put on board for another purpose, so as to render the carrier liable to one who pays a draft on the faith of it, in case he makes other disposition of the cargo. The John K. Shaw, 32 Fed. Rep. 491.

There is no duty to deliver until the freight is paid. Frothingham v. Jenkins, 1 Cal. 42, 38 Am. Dec. 285.

But the carrier cannot hold the goods for the payment of prior freight due from the consignor if 23 N. Y. 835; O'Dougherty v. Boston & W. R. Co. 1 Thomp. & C. 477; Lawrence v. Minturn, 58 U. S. 17 How. 100, 15 L. ed. 58; McEwen v. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. 83 Ind. 368, 5 Am. Rep. 216; Hutchinson, Carr. § 180; Elliott, Railroads, § 1436.

It is argued for appellant that the railway carrier had no right to deliver to the consignee except upon a production of the bill of lading. To this argument we reply that the carrier must deliver in accordance with the bill of lading, and if it delivers without requiring the production of the bill of lading it assumes the consequence of a wrong delivery. But in this case the delivery was made strictly in accordance with the requirement of the bill of lading which evidenced the contract made with plaintiff, and he therefore has no right to complain. Counsel for appellant have cited Furman v. Union P. R. Co. 106 N. Y. 579, and Merchants'

Despatch Transp. Co. v. Merriam, 111 Ind. 6, as sustaining the contention that, under the circumstances here, the railway company was guilty of negligence in making the delivery without requiring a production of the bill of lading. But a broad distinction between those cases and the one at bar is that in neither of those cases were the goods billed "straight," and in neither of them were the goods delivered to the person to whom the bill of lading stipulated the delivery should be made. In the case of Furman v. Union P. R. Co. the goods were delivered to Lucca Brothers, who the court held were not the consignees. In the second case cited (Merchants' Despatch Transp. Co. v. Merriam) the goods were shipped from Boston consigned to G. & C. Merriam, Louisville, Kentucky. After they arrived at Louisville they were delivered by the carrier to Turner, without requiring the production of they are consigned absolutely to the consignee. Bacharach v. Chester Freight Line, 133 Pa. 414.

The carrier cannot be held liable for the loss in case its agent is made the agent of the shipper to collect the price before the goods are delivered, the bill of lading being indorsed and delivered to him, in case he permits the delivery without requiring payment of the price. Cox, v. Columbus & W. R. Co. 91 Ala. 322.

If the indorsee of the bill of lading does not notify the carrier that he has it, but permits the consignee to deal with the property as his own and consign it to a third person, and to control its movements so that it is delivered to one who pays for it, the indorsee will be estopped by his negligence from attempting to hold the carrier liable for a delivery if the carrier was not aware that the bill of lading had been issued. National Bank v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 163 Pa. 467.

But in Joslyn v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 51 Vt. 32, it was held that although the indorsee of the bill of lading knew that the property had been delivered to the consignee and that he was consuming it in his business, and took no steps to prevent it, it did not estop him from looking to the carrier for indemnity for his loss when the consignee became insolvent without paying the draft.

These are certain cases dealing with the place of delivery rather than the person to whom it should be made, which are not within the scope of this note, of which the following are examples:

The interposition of statutory or prohibitory laws may justify the shipowner in his neglect to deliver at a certain port according to the terms of a bill of lading. Bradstreet v. Heron, Abb. Adm. 209.

If because of refusal to permit the property to be landed at the point of destination because of its inflammable character the custom is for the principal consignee to select a near-by place for the discharge of the cargo, and the other consignees to receive their property there, and after the selection the property of a small consignee is not permitted by the yardowner to be landed because of a difference between him and the owner, whereupon the shipowner lands it at another place near by, no action will lie against him for failure to deliver according to the bill of lading. Blossom v. Smith, 3 Blatchf. 316.

Exceptions in bills of lading.

Delivery to the wrong person is not a loss within the meaning of an exception in the bill of lading for loss of the property. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McWhitney, 36 Ind. 426.

An exception in the bill of lading of liability for loss from any act of the mariners will not include a misdelivery of the property. Guillaume v. Hamburg & A. Packet Co. 43 N. Y. 212, 1 Am. Rep. 512.

A clause that if the property is not taken away when it is ready for delivery it will be deposited at the expense of the consignee, and at his risk of fire, loss, or injury, does not include loss by wrongful delivery. Collins v. Burns, 4 Jones & S. 518.

A stipulation as to the measure of damages in case of loss will not govern in case of a delivery to the wrong person. Erle Despatch v. Johnson, 87 Tenn. 460.

Instructions for collections.

If the bill of lading requires the carrier to collect the charges before delivering the property the carrier will be liable in case he delivers without making the collection. Meyer v. Lemcke, 81 Ind. 208.

If the bill of lading stipulates that the goods shall not be delivered to the consignee until he has paid a certain amount of money, part of the purchase price, the carrier will be liable for delivery without fulfillment of the condition. The John Owen v. Johnson, 2 Ohio St. 142; The Argyle v. Worthington, 17 Ohio, 460.

The carrier will be liable if it disobeys the positive order of the consignor not to deliver the property until the consignee pays a draft which has been forwarded against the bill of lading, if the bill of lading has been kept from the possession of the consignee. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hartwell, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 745; Hartwell v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 15 Ky. L. Rep. 778.

Conflicting claims.

Where after the bill of lading has been issued a third person claims a lien on the property for the purchase price the master will be excused from not delivering under the bill of lading if he gives the consignee immediate notice of the claim and takes steps to arrest the action of the court until the consignee can assert his title. And if the carrier bonds the property he should inquire into the validity of the consignee's title, and if there is any doubt call upon the claimants to litigate their rights among themselves or refuse to deliver the property if he finds that the consignee is a mere agent for the consignor and not a consignee for value. Wilson v. Churchman, 4 La. Ann. 462.

Acts of third persons.

The carrier is not liable if the servants of the assignee of the bill of lading, into whose possession the property has gone without notice of the title of their principal, redeliver the property to the ship-the bill of lading. The company was held liable because it delivered the goods to the wrong person. In both of these cases it was said that the carrier was guilty of negligence in not requiring the production of the bill of lading before delivery of the goods, for the reason that such bill would have shown that the person to whom delivery was made was not the consignee. In each of those cases the carrier failed to deliver the goods in accordance with the terms of the bill of lading. The delivery was made to a person not named as consignee in the bill of lading, and the carrier was held liable for a wrong delivery. But those cases can be no authority for holding a carrier liable for a delivery made to the person named as consignee in the bill of lading and in exact accordance with its terms. It is further said that, apart from the common law, the railway company is liable under the provisions of our statute. Sandels & H. Dig. §§ 509, 510. These sections provide that warehouse receipts and bills of lading, given for goods, wares, merchandise, cotton, grain, and other commodity, shall be negotiable by written indorsement, and that "any and all persons to whom the same may be transferred shall be deemed and held to be the owner of such goods, wares, merchandise, cotton, grain, flour, or other produce or commodity, so far as to give validity to any pledge, lien, or transfer given, made, or created thereby as on the faith thereof, and no property . . . specified in such bills of lading or receipts shall be delivered except on surrender and cancellation of such receipts and bills of lading; provided, that all such receipts and bills of lading which shall have the words, 'Not negotiable,' plainly written or stamped on the face thereof, shall be exempt from the provisions of this act." But we are of the opinion that this act does not affect the right of the carrier to deliver except in those cases where the bill of lading has been transferred. Bills of lading are frequently transferred as security for loans and advances, and the purpose of this statute was to protect those who make advances upon the faith of such transfers. The case of Colgate v. Pennsylvania Co. 103 N. Y. 120, cited by counsel for appellant, arose under a statute similar to our statute. But in that case the bill of lading had been transferred by the consignee named therein, and, as it was issued without the words, "Not negotiable," upon it, the court said that the carrier was bound to know that it "may have passed into other hands and become the property of other than the consignee." The carrier was held liable because by an assignment of the bill of lading the title of the property had been transferred from the consignee to the plaintiff in that case. The case thus came squarely within the scope of the statute, which, to protect purchasers and others advancing money upon bills of lading, required the carrier to deliver only upon surrender of such bills of lading. But in this case the bill of lading was not transferred, the rights of no third party are involved, and neither the statute nor the decision just referred to has any bearing upon the question to be determined; and so, without discussing them, we may say, of the other cases cited by counsel for appellant, they do not, in our opinion, sustain the contention that the railway company is liable under the facts of this case.

If, as counsel for appellant contends, the per. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. McFadden, 89 Tex. 188.

If a carrier receives goods under a bill of lading containing instructions to deliver them to the order of the consignor, and forwards them to their destination by other carriers whom he does not properly instruct, by reason of which the goods are delivered without the consignor's order, the carrier will be liable. North v. Merchants & M. Transp. Co. 146 Mass. 315.

But the initial carrier will not be liable for a delivery without production of the bill of lading, if at the time it delivers the goods to the connecting carrier, which takes the goods to destination, it informs him that the goods are not to be delivered until the bill of lading is produced. Rickerson Roller Mill Co. v. Grand Rapids & L. R. Co. 67 Mich. 110.

Consignment to consignor's agent.

It has been held that if the consignment was to the agent of the consignor the carrier was under no obligation to honor his claims, but that the sole duty was to the consignor.

Thus, if the consignee is a mere agent of the consignor the carrier may be justified in withholding the property from him in favor of an assignee in bankruptcy of the shipper. Lineker v. Ayeshford, 1 Cal. 75.

The consignee, if only an agent for the consignor, has no greater rights than his principal, and, in case the principal has acquired no rights to the property as against a third person, the agent cannot compel a delivery to himself under the bill of lading against a claim of the true owner. Wilson v. Churchman, 4 La. Ann. 452.

This rule appears to have arisen, in part at least, 88 I. R. A.

from rulings which held that the agent could not maintain an action for nondelivery to him.

In Coxe v. Harden, 4 East, 211, it was stated that it seems that the mere indorsement of a bill of lading to an agent to enable him to receive the goods on account of the principal will give him no right to maintain an action for the wrongful delivery of the goods.

In Waring v. Cox, 1 Campb. 369, where the consignor indorsed the second bill of lading to his agent for the purpose of stopping the goods in transit, it appeared that the goods were delivered under the first bill of lading before the second bill was presented, and it was held that the second indorsee could not maintain an action for misdelivery. The ruling is put upon the ground that he had no title to the goods, not having paid value for them.

But it seems to have been held by Lord Ellenborough in a case cited in Paley on Agency, 364, that the agent to whom the goods are consigned may maintain an action for their nondelivery to him under the bill of lading.

It has also been held that an indorsee of a bill of lading cannot maintain an action upon it in his own name. Thompson v. Dornay, 14 Mees. & W. 403, 15 L. J. Exch. N. S. 320.

But in Haille v. Smith, 1 Bos. & B. 563, it was held that the indorsement of the bill of lading transferred the title to the indorsee so that the carrier would be liable to him in case he delivered the cargo to assignees of the consignor.

So it has been held that an indorsee has sufficient title to sue for nondelivery of the goods. Morison v. Gray, 2 Bing. 280.

Upon the question of delivery by a carrier to an impostor in the absence of a bill of lading, see note to Pacific Exp. Co. v. Shearer (Ill.) 37 L. R. A. 177.

H. P. F.

bill of lading represented the meal, and the ownership of the meal was in appellant so long as it held the bill of lading, still, as such owner, it unconditionally directed the carrier to deliver the meal to Russell. It would seem unreasonable to believe that the legislature intended to impose a liability upon the carrier in favor of the consignor for obeying and carrying out the directions of such consignor in regard to the delivery of the consigned property, for such intention would be contrary to common principles of reason and justice. To justify the court in arriving at such a conclusion, the language of the act to that effect should be so plain and direct that it would not be reasonable to give it a different meaning. The language of this act does not, in our opinion, justify any such conclusion. On the contrary, the purpose of it, as before stated, was to protect persons not parties to the bill of lading originally, but who for a valuable consideration acquired an interest in the property represented by it through transfer of the bill of lading to them. There was certainly no occasion for an act of this kind to protect the rights of the consignor, for he is a party to the contract of shipment, and can protect himself by stipulations therein. In this case the appellant could have protected itself against the failure of the consignee to pay for the meal by making the consignment to its own order, or, after the meal had been consigned to Russell, it might, upon discovery of his insolvency, have effected the same purpose by stoppage in transitu and notice to the railway company not to deliver until payment of the draft to which the bill of lading had been attached. But the appellant failed to do this, and the railway company in good faith delivered the meal in accordance with its contract and the directions of appellant, as shown by the bill of lading. Under such circumstances, it seems to us, notwithstanding the able argument of counsel for appellant, that this claim for damages has neither the letter of the law nor any principle of justice to sustain it. Judgment affirmed.

v.

Thomas McGIRL, Respt.

(.....Mont.....)

The purchase and solicitation of wool by an agent of a foreign corporation for shipment to other states wherein the principal business of the corporation is done is a business directly pertaining to interstate commerce which the foreign corporation is entitled to engage in without complying with a state statute imposing conditions upon its right to do business in the state.

(July 10, 1897.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Yellowstone County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover money alleged to have been advanced by plaintiff to defendant. Reversed.

Statement by Hunt, J.:

The plaintiff and appellant herein, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of New Jersey, at the time of this suit and of the transaction which brought it about, was doing a commission business, as a wool commission merchant, in the states of New York and Massachusetts and the state of Montana. The complaint alleged that in July, 1892, the defendant, at Billings, Montana, consigned a wool clip to plaintiff, in New York, to be sold by plaintiff for defendant on sixty days' credit, the proceeds thereof to be paid to defendant by plaintiff, less the commission on sales, interest on moneys advanced, freight and interest thereon, discount on sales not due, cartage, and advances. It is alleged that plaintiff, to accommodate defendant, deposited in the hands of defendant, on account of the transaction between the parties, the sum of $7,019.20, as an advanced payment in case of the sale of said wool, on the net proceeds thereof, to be kept by defendant on account of the net sales of the wool if the said wool sold for enough, less commission and charges, to amount to $7,019.20, but that any amount over and above the net proceeds of the sale of the wool, or the difference between the net proceeds of the sale and the $7,019.20, if any, should be subject to a drawback by the plaintiff, and be to and for the use of plaintiff, and to be returned to plaintiff by defendant if the net proceeds of the wool did not amount to the sum advanced; that pursuant to this agreement the defendant's wool was consigned to plaintiff; and that some time thereafter it turned out that on the accounting pertaining to the transaction between plaintiff and defendant a balance was found due and owing by defendant to plaintiff, inasmuch as the wool did not sell for a sufficient sum to fully pay plaintiff for its advances to defendant, and the charges agreed to be paid. Judgment was asked for the amount claimed to be due as a drawback. The defendant admitted that he had consigned the wool to plaintiff to be sold for him, and that he had been paid by plaintiff, as an advance on said consignment of wool, the sum of $7,019.20, but denied all of the alleged agreement concerning the shipment of the wool subject to the drawback claimed by plaintiff.

NOTE.—The restrictions on interstate commerce business by a foreign corporation are considered in a note to Kindel v. Beck & P. Lithographing Co. (Colo.) 24 L. R. A. 311.

For an affirmative defense the answer also averred that there was to be no drawback, and that, if the wool did not sell for an amount sufficient to cover the advance made by the plaintiff, it would bear the loss. Among other defenses pleaded, it was averred that plaintiff could not maintain his action for the reason that plaintiff was a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New Jersey, and had not complied with chapter 24, div. 5, Gen. Laws, Mont. Comp. Stat., in that it had not filed in the office of the secretary of state, or with the county clerk of Yellowstone county, a duly authenticated copy of its charter or certificate of incorporation, and the statement required by § 442 of the law referred to, and in other respects had not complied with said law, or with the provisions of an act of the third legislative assembly of the state of Montana entitled "An Act to Provide the Conditions upon Which Foreign Corporations May Do Business in This State," approved March 8, 1893. The cause was tried to a jury, and evidence heard. The court then, of its own motion, instructed the jury that inasmuch as the plaintiff was a foreign corporation, and had not complied with the act of the third legislative assembly providing the conditions upon which foreign corporations might do business in Montana, the act and contract of the plaintiff with the defendant was void as to the corporation, and could not be enforced in the district court, and that it was the duty of the jury to find for the defendant. In accordance with this instruction of the court, a verdict was rendered for the defendant for costs. A motion for a new trial was made and overruled. The plaintiff appeals.

Mr. Gib. A. Lane, for appellant:

It cannot be said that plaintiff is within the prohibitory clause of the act of March 8, 1893, as it has not begun to carry on business in this state since said act was passed, even if it were a foreign corporation.

Powder River Cattle Co. v. Ouster County Comrs. 9 Mont. 149.

Section 2 is wholly unconstitutional as discriminating between citizens of the states when it attempts to make a contract void and not enforceable as to one of the parties thereto, i. e., the corporation, and by implication holds it good and enforceable as to the other party, if a citizen of this state.

Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 118 U. S. 727, 28 L. ed. 1187.

This act cannot be construed as having a retrospective operation.

The act of 1893 was not pleaded and could not apply if it had been. A plea of the failure to comply with the statute is necessary.

Hunt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, a corporation of New Jersey, doing business in that state, and in the states of New York and Massachusetts, as wool commission merchant, sent an agent into Montana to solicit consignments of wool to its eastern houses, there to be sold on commission by plaintiff for the benefit of certain consignors, woolgrowers of the state of Montana. It had various transactions of this nature with woolgrowers in Montana. In the particular case before us the exact terms of the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant gave rise to this litigation, but the facts were undisputed that plaintiff advanced a large sum of money to defendant upon his wool, and that the defendant's wool was consigned to plaintiff at New York, to be sold there by plaintiff, who was to credit defendant with the amount of the sale. The real contention between the parties was whether the shipment so made was subject to a drawback by plaintiff against defendant if the wool did not net a sufficient sum in New York to cover plaintiff's advances to defendant, including interest, costs, etc., or whether the burden of any loss that there might be was to fall entirely on plaintiff. The defendant availed himself of several defenses, including the one upon which the court directed a finding in his favor, namely, that the contract sued on was void as to the corporation, and could not be enforced in favor of the corporation. By an act of the legislative assembly of the state of Montana, approved March 8, 1893, every foreign corporation, before it commenced to do business in Montana, was required to file a certificate with the secretary of the state, designating an agent, who must be a citizen of Montana, upon whom service of process might be had, and also stating the principal place of business of such corporation in this state. It was also provided by § 2 of said act that, if any foreign corporation failed to comply with the provisions of the law, all its contracts made and entered into with citizens of this state should be void as to the corporation, and that no court of this state should enforce the same in favor of the corporation. Inasmuch as plaintiff did not comply with the statute just cited, the important question raised is whether or not, if the plaintiff's facts alleged in its complaint are true, and the defendant does in reality owe to plaintiff the amount sued for as a drawback, plaintiff can recover on its contract. It has been repeatedly laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States that interstate commerce carried on by corporations is entitled to the same protection against the exactions of a state which is given to such commerce when carried on by individuals. We are aware that the construction put upon § 2, art. 4, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several states, has been generally uniform, to the effect that the language of that clause relates only to natural persons, and not to artificial bodies, as corporations, and that the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the language referred to mean those of the general nature granted to a state's own citizens, and not those special privileges conferred upon corporate bodies. Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 59 U. S. 18 How. 404, 15 L. ed. 451; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 18 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 374; Ducat v. Chicago, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 410, 19 L. ed. 972; Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 857; Philadelphia & S. Mail S. S. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 826, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 808. But, in the carrying on of interstate commerce, corporations are guaranteed the same rights and are entitled to the same protection as individuals. The Supreme Court in Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 204, 29 L. ed. 162, expressly held that it did not make any difference whether such commerce is carried on by individuals or by corporations. Justice Bradley, sitting on the circuit bench in the case of Stockton v. Baltimore & N. Y. R. Co. 32 Fed. Rep. 9, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 411, used the following language: "And, in carrying on foreign and interstate commerce, corporations, equally with individuals, are within the protection of the commercial power of Congress, and cannot be molested in another state by state burdens or impediments. This was held and decided in the case of Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 204, 29 L. ed. 162, and affirmed in the recent case of Philadelphia & S. Mail S. S. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 826, 30 L. ed. 1200, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 808, and although the decision in Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357, conformed to the doctrine of Bank of Augusta v. Earle, the following striking language was used by the court, to wit: 'At the time of the formation of the Constitution a large part of the commerce of the world was carried on by corporations. The East India Company, the Hudson's Bay Company, the Hamburg Company, the Levant Company, and the Virginia Company may be named among the many corporations then in existence which acquired, from the extent of their operations, celebrity throughout the commercial world. This state of facts forbids the supposition that it was intended in the grant of power to Congress to exclude from its control the commerce of corporations. The language of the grant makes no reference to the instrumentality by which commerce may be carried on; it is general, and includes alike commerce by individuals, partnerships, associations, and corporations." We may fairly supplement this language by adding that, when the Constitution was adopted, it could not have been supposed that the regulations of commerce to be made by Congress might be of no avail to commercial corporations, or, at least, might be rendered nugatory with regard to them, in consequence of state restrictions upon their power to act as corporations in any other state than that of their origin." We may therefore proceed with the investigation of the case, relying upon the truth of the proposition that, if the transactions between the plaintiff and the defendant in this case were commerce among the several states, Congress alone could regulate such commerce, under the Constitution of the United States, and the state had no power to regulate that commerce, or impose any obligation or exaction upon the plaintiff which it could not impose or exact upon an individual transacting the same business.

Now, we inquire, what was the nature of the business done, and was it interstate commerce? If we find that it was interstate commerce did the statute obtain requiring the corporation to file the certificate referred to as a condition precedent to its right to purchase the wool of the defendant in the manner that it did, and was it an attempt on the part of the state to regulate commerce among the several states, and therefore null and void? In the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23, Chief Justice Marshall, in one of his greatest opinions, discussed § 8, art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States, in which Congress has been granted the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indian tribes." He said: "The subject to be regulated is commerce, and our Constitution being, as was aptly said at the bar, one of enumeration, and not of definition, to ascertain the extent of the power, it becomes necessary to settle the meaning of the word. The counsel for the appellee would limit it to traffic, to buying and selling, or the interchange of commodities, and do not admit that it comprehends navigation. This would restrict a general term, applicable to many objects, to one of its significations. Commerce undoubtedly is traffic, but it is something more—it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between the nations, and parts of nations, in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse." In Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347, Justice Field used the following language: "Commerce is a term of the largest import. It comprehends intercourse for the purposes of trade in any and all its forms, including the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities between the citizens of our country and the citizens or subjects of other countries, and between the citizens of different states. The power to regulate it embraces all the instruments by which such commerce may be conducted. So far as some of these instruments are concerned, and some subjects which are local in their operation, it has been held that the states may provide regulations until Congress acts with reference to them; but where the subject to which the power applies is national in its character, or of such a nature as to admit of uniformity of regulation, the power is exclusive of all state authority. It will not be denied that that portion of commerce with foreign countries and between the states which consists in the transportation and exchange of commodities is of national importance and admits and requires uniformity of regulation. The very object of investing this power in the general government was to insure this uniformity against discriminating state legislation." Again we find Justice Field defining for the court what commerce among the states consists of, as comprehended by the Constitution of the United States, in the case of Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 288. He there said: "Commerce with foreign countries and among the states, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. For the regulation of commerce as thus defined there can be only one system of rules, applicable alike to the whole country; and the authority which can act for the whole country can alone adopt such a system. Action upon it by separate states is not, therefore, permissible. Language affirming the exclusiveness of the grant of power over commerce as thus defined may not be inaccurate, when it would be so if applied to legislation upon subjects which are merely auxiliary to commerce." In the still later case of Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 204, 29 L. ed. 162, the same justice speaking for the court, said: "Commerce among the states consists of intercourse and traffic between their citizens, and includes the transportation of persons and property, and the navigation of public waters, for that purpose, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. The power to regulate that commerce, as well as commerce with foreign nations, vested in Congress, is the power to prescribe the rules by which it shall be governed,—that is, the conditions upon which it shall be conducted; to determine when it shall be free, and when subject to duties and other exactions. The power also embraces within its control all the instrumentalities by which that commerce may be carried on, and the means by which it may be aided and encouraged. The subjects, therefore, upon which the power may be exerted are of infinite variety. While with reference to some of them which are local and limited in their nature or sphere of operation, the states may prescribe regulations until Congress intervenes and assumes control of them; yet, when they are national in their character and require uniformity of regulation affecting alike all the states, the power of Congress is exclusive. Necessarily that power alone can prescribe regulations which are to govern the whole country. And it needs no argument to show that the commerce with foreign nations and between the states, which consists in the transportation of persons and property between them, is a subject of national character, and requires uniformity of regulation. Congress alone, therefore, can deal with such transportation; its nonaction is a declaration that it shall remain free from burdens imposed by state legislation. Otherwise there would be no protection against conflicting regulations of different states, each legislating in favor of its own citizens and products, and against those of other states. It was from apprehension of such conflicting and discriminating state legislation, and to secure uniformity of regulation, that the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the states was vested in Congress." In McCull v. California, 136 U. S. 104, 34 L. ed. 392, Justice Lamar quotes approvingly the following definition of "commerce" as given by Pomeroy on page 876 of his work on Constitutional Law: "It includes," says Pomeroy, "the fact of intercourse and of traffic and the subject-matter of intercourse and traffic. The fact of intercourse and traffic again embraces all the means, instruments, and places by and in which intercourse and traffic are carried on, and, further still, comprehends the act of carrying them on at these places and by and with these means. The subject-matter of intercourse or traffic may be either things, goods, chattels or merchandise, or persons. All these may therefore be regulated." In Cook v. Rome Brick Co. 99 Ala. 409, the supreme court of Alabama decided that the sale of bricks in another state, to be delivered in Alabama, or the filling of an order sent from Alabama for bricks in another state, is an act of interstate commerce, not affected by the statutes of Alabama, which required a foreign corporation to have a place of business and an agent in Alabama as a condition precedent to its capacity to do business in Alabama. A like decision was made very recently by the supreme court of Tennessee. State v. Scott, 98 Tenn. 254, 36 L. R. A. 461. A law of Tennessee required every person, other than photographers of the state, who solicited pictures to be enlarged outside of Tennessee, to pay a certain sum per annum as a privilege tax. But the court held the statute unconstitutional, and used the following language: "Enlargement of pictures by citizens of other states for citizens of this state is the primary matter, though the tax is in terms laid upon other persons engaged as agents, in the promotion thereof. The process of enlarging involves the making of a larger picture after the image or likeness of a smaller one. When this is done by one person, upon the order of another, and the larger picture is delivered for a consideration, the parties have certainly had a commercial transaction; and, if they be citizens of different states, and the picture be made in one state and sent into the other state, as indicated in the statute and averred in the presentment, the transaction as between the principals is as obviously interstate commerce. The latter is a commercial transaction between citizens of different states, and that is what interstate commerce means. Whether the transaction be conducted directly or entirely by the principals themselves, or in part by the agency of another, is of no consequence; it is interstate commerce in both instances. So there is no room for doubt that the enlargement of pictures referred to in the statute is, to all intents and purposes, interstate commerce."

Now, when we apply to the facts of this case the principles of the foregoing definitions, what do we have? The plaintiff corporation sent its agent into Montana to solicit or buy wool to be consigned to its wool houses in other states, wherein it does its principal business. The agent did no other kind of business for the corporation in Montana. Such being the case, it seems clear to us his business directly pertained to interstate commerce. It related to intercourse and traffic between Montana and New York, and the subject-matter of the intercourse and traffic was the wool itself. If the Northern Pacific Railroad in transporting the wool over its road between Montana and Minnesota was engaged in interstate commerce,—as clearly it was,—we cannot perceive how the transaction by which the wool itself was exchanged through consignment or sale by defendant to plaintiff can be excluded from any reasonable definition of "commerce among the states." The sale and exchange of wool is among the great operations of the commercial world. It is, like traffic in cotton or wheat or corn, a subject of frequent intercourse between citizens of the different states and different nations. The railroad transportation is a part of the commerce,—the instrument or vehicle of intercourse; the wool, the essential subject-matter of the intercourse and traffic. It being our opinion from what we have said that the plaintiff corporation was engaged in a business which was strictly interstate commerce, no law of the state could control or restrict such commerce by exacting conditions for permitting the plaintiff to do such business. The argument that a foreign corporation has its domicile in the state from which it derives its existence, and that its right to transact business elsewhere, and to enforce its contracts made in other states, depends purely upon the comity of those states, is not pertinent. The power of a state to make discriminations in privileges granted to foreign corporations may be exercised where a foreign corporation desires to do business within the limits of the state, not strictly interstate or foreign commerce. This may be illustrated by familiar instances of cattle and sheep companies, or mining and smelting corporations, in Montana. No foreign corporation, we take it, organized for any of the purposes for which such associations are usually formed, and desirous of carrying on its business and of acquiring a domicile in Montana, can escape the consequences of omission to comply with the terms and conditions upon which it has a right to do business within the state. Indeed, such corporations, in the exercise of legislative discretion, may be excluded from the state altogether, as was laid down in Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 857, and Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 148 U. S. 305, 36 L. ed. 164, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 57. Such conditions or restrictions, however, are permissible upon the ground that a state may not be willing, upon grounds of a policy of its own, to have a corporation, even if legally created under the laws of the state of its creation, establish a business in Montana, or the state may demand of it a license tax, or the performance of any other reasonable condition, before it can claim the same protection in the conduct of its business that is accorded to like corporations within the jurisdiction of the state. Pembina Consol. Silver Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 81 L. ed. 650, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 24. But a most vital limitation in this respect upon the power of the state springs up where the business of the foreign corporation is commerce between the corporation, the creature of the legislature of one state, and a citizen of another state. Pembina Consol. Silver Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 81 L. ed. 650, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 24. As against all such foreign corporations engaged in interstate commerce, the state can pass no prohibitory law, constitutional or statutory, without impinging upon the commercial clause of the Constitution of the United States. The decisions of the United States Supreme Court justify these views. In Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 118 U. S. 784, 28 L. ed. 1139, the court had before it statutes quite similar to those upon which respondent in this case relies; and while the decision was based upon the ground that the statute could not affect a corporation under the laws of one state which did a single act of business in another, still there is language in the opinion recognizing the doctrine that the statute could not be construed "to impose upon a foreign corporation limitations of its right to make contracts in the state for carrying on commerce between the states, for that would make the act an invasion of the exclusive right of Congress to regulate commerce among the several states." The implication from this language is that if a foreign corporation has sent an agent into Montana, and made a contract within the latter state for the consignment of wool between Montana and New York, no construction can be put upon the statute of Montana which would render such a contract void without invading the exclusive right of Congress. If, therefore, this contract sued upon was lawfully made, notwithstanding a statute which declares or attempts to declare it void, it follows that any legislation of the state which seeks to prevent the enforcement of the contract is equally an invasion of the exclusive right of Congress. It must be true that if the state cannot declare the contract void, it cannot prevent the enforcement of the contract. In the case of Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 118 U. S. 786, 28 L. ed. 1139, there is a brief concurring opinion by Justices Matthews and Blatchford, in which they planted themselves firmly upon the broader ground that the making of a contract in Colorado to manufacture certain machinery in Ohio, to be there delivered for transportation to the purchasers in Colorado, was commerce, and that for the state of Colorado to prohibit it, except upon conditions, was to regulate commerce between Colorado and Ohio, which lay exclusively within the province of Congress. "It is quite competent, no doubt," said Justice Matthews, "for Colorado to prohibit a foreign corporation from acquiring a domicile in that state, and to prohibit it from carrying on within that state its business of manufacturing machinery. But it cannot prohibit it from selling in Colorado, by contracts made there, its machinery manufactured elsewhere, for that would be to regulate commerce among the states." The facts in that case, as also in the case of State v. Scott, 98 Tenn. 254, 36 L. R. A. 461, heretofore cited, and that of Bateman v. Western Star Mill. Co. 1 Tex. Civ. App. 90, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 260, present the converse of the case at bar. The foreign corporations in all those instances were domiciled in other states, and through their commercial agents solicited business and sold and shipped goods to points in the other states in which laws existed imposing upon foreign corporations compliance with certain conditions precedent to their right to do business within such states. But the opinions were all based upon the reasoning that the goods sold were commodities subject to barter and sale, and that the sale, transportation, and delivery of goods and the transaction of business between a foreign corporation of one state and a citizen of another state constituted interstate commercial transactions, which corporations, as well as individuals, could carry on free from any restraints by any state. But, as we have heretofore seen, the transaction pertaining to the wool shipped by the defendant to the plaintiff in this case is obviously brought within the same rule. It is just as much an interstate commerce transaction to export wool from Montana to New York as it is to import clothes made of the wool from New York to Montana. Either transaction is interstate commerce, and neither can be interfered with by local law.

Of course, this exclusive power of the regulation of interstate commerce by Congress does not interfere with the police power of the state. Police regulations often incidentally affect commerce, but they still remain police regulations. The line of distinction between an attempt to put a burden or restriction upon interstate commerce, and the police power of the state, has been very recently discussed by Judge Grosscup, in Re Lebott, 77 Fed. Rep. 587, who thus expressed himself: "The Supreme Court of the United States, in an unbroken line of decisions, has held that any attempt to put any burden or restriction upon interstate commerce, either by the way of taxing it, or requiring a license from its agents or drummers, or a discriminating license or tax upon any of its goods or products, is outside the power of a state, and an infringement upon the powers of the national government. . . . The government of the United States has control and exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce. The government of the state has the power to look after police regulations, such as affect the life, health, or morals of the citizens." The decision of Judge Grosscup in the case quoted from was to the effect that an ordinance of the city of Chicago which prohibited the sale or the offering for sale of vinous liquors in Illinois by the representative of a California association, without a license, was not an exercise of the police power of the state, but was an attempt to regulate interstate commerce, and consequently invalid. It has also been held in the case of McCall v. California, 186 U. S. 104, 34 L. ed. 892, that where a statute affects commercial transactions among states only in such an indirect, incidental, and remote manner as not to burden or impede interstate commerce, it is not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. But there again a different rule applies from that which must be applied in this case.

We do not think it necessary to proceed any further in this discussion. It has been so repeatedly held by the Supreme Court of the United States that every tax on interstate commerce is a burden on that commerce, and, if imposed by the legislature of a state, is illegal, that it is scarcely necessary to cite more decisions to that effect. They are referred to in Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 33 L. ed. 811, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 184, and are reviewed by the supreme court of Tennessee in State v. Scott, 98 Tenn. 254, 36 L. R. A. 461. The trend of the later decisions of the supreme court has been, we think, to extend the protection afforded to the carrying on of interstate commerce, by including within the definition of the words any form of interstate commerce, "whether by way of duties laid on the transportation of the subjects of that commerce, or on the receipts derived from that transportation, or on the occupation or business of carrying it on." Lyng v. Michigan, 135 U. S. 161, 34 L. ed. 160, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 148; Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 58, 35 L. ed. 652; Brennan v. Titusville, 153 U. S. 302, 38 L. ed. 728, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 658.

As the country has developed, and commercial intercourse between the citizens of the several states has expanded, and facilities for the conduct of such commerce have so vastly multiplied, the wisdom and perspicuity of the framers of the Constitution in preserving in Congress the exclusive right to regulate and control such commerce, and to preserve it wholly free from any local interference or impediment on the part of the state, is too apparent to need comment. It may be safely said that one of the causes for the development of the states is the business relations between citizens of different states,—relations which, in turn, exist because of the guaranty by the Federal Constitution that interstate commerce shall remain free from any impositions or discriminations of state legislation.

The sequel of these views is that the contract alleged to have been made between the plaintiff corporation and the defendant was, if made as a fact, valid and enforceable; and, the transaction being one of lawful interstate commerce, it could in no manner be affected by any statute of the state imposing conditions (not in the exercise of the police power) upon plaintiff precedent to its capacity to enter into the contract. Perhaps the legislature did not mean to extend the statute under consideration to foreign corporations engaged in interstate commerce. The presumption would be that they did not, but whatever the purpose may have been in this respect is immaterial to this discussion; for, if it was intended to include such foreign corporations, we hold the statute unconstitutional in that respect. The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

Reversed and remanded.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

Jacob S. JOHNSON, Plff. in Err.,

v.

STATE of New Jersey.

(59 N. J. L. 535.)

1. A statute which attempts to deprive the governor of his constitutional power to appoint judges of an inferior court by changing the name of the court and requiring the judge to be elected without changing its jurisdiction or functions is void.
2. A statute attempting to abolish several inferior courts and to substitute one court in their place cannot be separated so as to uphold the substituted court in place of some of them if one is protected from destruction by the Constitution and its judge is a member of the others.
3. Exclusion of negroes from jury duty upon the trial of a negro is not ground for reversal if the exclusion was not designed.
4. The requirement of Rev. p. 526, that the sheriff shall file the jury list summoned for service with the county clerk, is directory merely, and failure to do so will not invalidate a trial unless it affirmatively appears that injury was done.
5. Testimony of nonexperts as to the appearance of footprints in the sand near the scene of a crime, and prints made in sand by boots worn by the prisoner, is admissible upon the question of his connection with the crime.

(Dixon, J., dissentia.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Oyer and Terminer for Somerset County convicting defendant of murder. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mears, Steele & Meehan, for plaintiff in error:

The trial of this indictment was before the court of oyer and terminer.

This court by an act of the legislature was then abolished, and had no jurisdiction of the cause after the 1st Monday of December, 1895.

Pub. Laws 1895, p. 807.

The court of oyer and terminer is one of the inferior courts of the state, and § 1, art. 6, of the Constitution vests in the legislature the power to alter or abolish its inferior courts, as the public good may require.

If one part of an act, or even of a section, be good, and the remainder bad, so much of it as is good will be permitted to stand, while the unconstitutional part will be declared and held void.

Keokuk N. L. Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 80, 24 L. ed. 377; Penniman's Case, 103 U. S. 717, 26 L. ed. 604; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 676; State, Morgan, v. Monmouth Pl. Road Co. 26 N. J. L. 109.

When a part of an act is declared unconstitutional but the rest is independent and can stand alone, the portion so declared to be unconstitutional is as if it had never been passed, and the constitutional portion must remain in full force.

State, Brown, v. Copeland, 3 R. I. 83; State, Cornish, v. Tuttle, 53 Wis. 45; Com., v. Hitchings, 5 Gray, 485.

Every presumption and intendment is in favor of the constitutionality of an act, and a court is not justified in pronouncing it invalid unless satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of its repugnance to the Constitution. It must be presumed that the legislature did not intend to violate the Constitution.

Cooper v. Telfair, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 18, 1 L. ed. 722; Colwell v. May's Landing WaterPower Co. 19 N. J. Eq. 249; Foster v. Essex Bank, 16 Mass. 245, 8 Am. Dec. 185.

A construction which raises a conflict between parts of the Constitution is not permissible when by any reasonable constructions the parts can be made to harmonize.

People, Livesey, v. Wright, 6 Colo. 92.

When the power to alter or abolish the court to which the appointment is to be made is vested in the legislature, such power is not limited to its jurisdiction, but must be construed to extend to the Constitution and powers of the court as a whole, and if, in the judgment of the legislature, the public good requires, it should extend to an alteration in the method of appointing its judges.

Engeman v. State, 54 N. J. L. 247.

If a judge makes a mistake in principle, in determining whether a challenge shall prevail, his decision is reviewable.

Patterson v. State, 48 N. J. L. 889.

The court will take judicial notice of the census and that there is a large negro population in the county of Somerset subject to jury duty.

12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 175, note; 5 Crim. L. Mag. p. 449.

In the selection of the general panel of jurors, for the term of the court at which plaintiff in error was tried, there was a practical exclusion of his race from jury duty, and a discrimination against them, as a matter of course, because of their color; and by such exclusion and discrimination he was deprived of a right to which he was entitled.

Thompson & M. Juries, §§ 29, 30; Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 313, 323, 25 L. ed. 667, 671.

The court erred in admitting in evidence sand impressions not made from the original footprints.

It was incompetent because it was not proved that the model or impressions were reproductions.

It was not proved that the boots with which the impressions were made were the boots that made the footprints at the scene of murder.

These impressions in effect were sought to be proved as copies of the original footprints, and no proper foundation was laid for their introduction as secondary evidence; and upon this ground they were not properly admitted.

Eborn v. Zimpelman, 47 Tex. 503, 26 Am. Rep. 315.

Messrs. Nelson Y. Dungan and James J. Bergen for defendant in error.

Depue, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error was indicted for murder, for causing the death of Sarah Ann Rogers. The indictment was found in the court of oyer and terminer of the county of Somerset at the term of September, 1895. On the traverse of this indictment the prosecutor was tried before said court, and convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to death. The writ of error places under review the following assignments of error:

First, that the court before which the defendant below was tried and convicted had no legal existence, having been abolished by the act of 1895, commonly called the "County Court Act." By an act of the legislature passed June 13, 1895, the inferior courts of common pleas, the courts of oyer and terminer, and courts of quarter sessions of the several counties of the state were abolished, and a county court established in each of the counties of the state, to be known and designated as the "[name of county] county court," with the same jurisdiction, civil and criminal, as the courts which were abolished previously possessed. The act provided for one judge for each county, to be elected by the qualified voters of the county. It further provided that any county court might be held by any justice of the supreme court, or by any judge of a county court, or by such justice and judge sitting together, with a proviso that a justice of the supreme court should preside in the trial of indictments for crimes punishable by death. Pamph. Laws 1895, p. 807. Under the judicial system in existence prior to the act of 1895, a judge of the court of common pleas, as such a judge, sat as an associate in the oyer and terminer, and as a judge of the court of common pleas he sat in the quarter sessions. These judges were appointed and commissioned as judges of the court of common pleas. The appointment of a judge as judge of the court of oyer and terminer or court of quarter sessions was a thing unknown. The judges of the court of common pleas sat in the oyer as judges of the court of common pleas, just as the justice of the supreme court presided in that court,—not as a judge of the oyer and terminer, but in virtue of his commission as a justice of the supreme court. By the Constitution as amended in 1875 the prerogative of appointing the judges of the court of common pleas was conferred upon the governor, with the advice and consent of the senate. The act of 1895 did not create a new court with a new jurisdiction. It simply created a court by a new name, and invested it with all the jurisdiction and functions exercised by the old court, and took from the executive the power to appoint its judges, and delegated it to a popular election. The power of the legislature to alter or abolish the court of common pleas as the public good may require is indisputable. State, Kenny, v. Hudapeth, 59 N. J. L. 320; same case (in this court) 59 N. J. L. 504. This power has been vindicated to the extent of permitting the legislature to vacate the commissions of those judges who were in office when the legislature intervened. But the capacity of the legislature to alter or abolish is not involved at this time. A court consists in its jurisdiction and functions, and not its title or name. The legislature in the act of 1895 (carefully preserved the jurisdiction and functions of the old court in everything which is the essential quality of a court, gave the tribunal a new name and transferred the selection of the incumbents of the judicial office from the executive to a popular election. The court of common pleas, as a court, and all its concomitants, such as the right of its judges to sit in the oyer and sessions, were retained by the act of 1895 precisely as they existed before. All that was done was a change of name and the mode of selecting the judges who were to officiate in the court. The Constitution having conferred upon the governor the prerogative of appointing, with the advice and consent of the senate, these judicial officers, it was not competent for the legislature by a subterfuge to divert this prerogative right to another source. When the Constitution prescribes the manner in which an officer shall be appointed or elected, the constitutional prescription is exclusive, and it is not competent for the legislature to provide any other mode of obtaining or holding the office. State, Morris, v. Wrightson, 56 N. J. L. 127, 141, 22 L. R. A. 548. That is precisely what the act of 1895 purported to accomplish,—to leave these courts with a change of name, and the executive shorn of his prerogative of appointment. It was on this ground that the supreme court in State, Schaik, v. Wrightson, 58 N. J. L. 50, decided that the act of 1895 was unconstitutional and void. That decision is approved by this court. It is contended by counsel that, although the act of 1895 is unconstitutional with respect to the judges of the court of common pleas, it may be sustained with respect to the judges of the oyer and terminer and court of quarter sessions; these courts being without any constitutional protection or regulation, and the selection of the judges being wholly a matter of legislative discretion. The theory on which the argument proceeded was that the statute consisted of two parts, one of which, being unconstitutional, might be rejected, and the other retained. It is undoubtedly elementary law that the same statute may be in part constitutional and in part unconstitutional, and, if the parts are wholly independent of each other, that which is constitutional may stand, and that which is unconstitutional will be rejected; but if the different parts of the act are so intimately connected with and dependent upon each other as to warrant a belief that the legis-statute intended them as a whole, and that if all could not be carried into effect the legislature would not have passed the residue independently, and some parts are unconstitutional, all the provisions which are thus dependent upon each other must fail. As was said by Mr. Justice Matthews in Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 270, 304, 29 L. ed. 185, 197: "It is undoubtedly true that there may be cases where one part of a statute may be enforced as constitutional, and another be declared inoperative and void, because unconstitutional; but these are cases where the parts are so distinctly separable that each can stand alone, and where the court is able to see and to declare that the intention of the legislature was that the part pronounced valid should be enforceable, even though the other part should fail. To hold otherwise would be to substitute for the law intended by the legislature one which they may never have been willing by itself to enact." Sprague v. Thompson, 118 U. S. 91, 30 L. ed. 116; Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 158 U. S. 601, 635, 39 L. ed. 1108, 1125. In Warren v. Charlestown, 2 Gray, 84, it was held that "when the parts of a statute are so mutually connected and dependent, as conditions, considerations, or compensations for each other, as to warrant a belief that the legislature intended them as a whole, and that, if all could not be carried into effect, the legislature would not pass the residue independently, if some parts are unconstitutional and void, all the provisions, which are thus dependent, conditional, or connected, must fall with them." This rule with regard to an unconstitutional feature in a statute is elementary, and it applies in an eminent degree to the legislation in question. The judges who, under our judicial system prior to the act of 1895, sat as associates in the oyer and terminer, and as judges in the court of quarter sessions, were appointed and commissioned as judges of the court of common pleas; and it is inconceivable that it was the legislative scheme by the act of 1895 to leave the court of common pleas in existence, and its judges in commission, and create a new judicial officer, known as a "county court judge," to hold the courts of quarter sessions, and to sit as an associate to the supreme court justice in the court of oyer and terminer. That such was not the purpose of the legislature is demonstrated by the title of the act, which is as follows: "An Act To Abolish the Inferior Courts of Common Pleas, Courts of Oyer and Terminer and General Jail Delivery, and Courts of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, To Establish in their Places a County Court in Each of the Counties of This State, and To Provide for and Define the Jurisdiction, Powers, and Duties of Such County Courts." It is obvious from the title of the act, as well as its body, that it was the legislative purpose to abolish the old courts, and substitute the new court in their place. The legislative scheme, in its main feature,—that is, the extinguishment of the old courts,—having failed, the other part, which is not separable, must fail also.

The second ground assigned for reversal is the exclusion of negroes from jury duty, the prisoner being a colored man. There is no proof in the case to show that this exclusion was done designedly or that such persons were omitted from the panel of jurors except in the same way that white citizens not selected were omitted. The conduct of the sheriff in the selection of the jurors was approved by the court below, and its decision is not subject to review. Patterson v. State, 48 N. J. L. 382.

Third, that the sheriff did not deliver a list of the jurors actually summoned to the clerk, pursuant to § 9 of the act concerning juries. Rev. p. 526. By that section it is made the duty of the sheriff to deliver a list of the jurors by him summoned for service at such term, certified by him to be a true list, to the clerk of such court, who shall thereupon file the said list, and forthwith lay the same before the said court, and no person shall serve as a juror whose name is not contained in said list, if objection be made before such person is sworn or affirmed. The jury for the general panel was drawn in the presence of the court and the list of names so drawn, with the proper certificate attached, was filed with the county clerk, and a copy thereof retained by the sheriff. The persons so selected were by the sheriff duly summoned, and all were in attendance on the day fixed for the trial; objection having been made to the panel because the sheriff had not filed with the county clerk a list containing the names of the jurors summoned. The challenge was overruled, and the sheriff advised by the court to file the list, as he did on that day, as appears by the certificate of the clerk. From the jurors thus summoned were selected forty-eight persons, as required by law, a list of whom was served on the defendant, and from this list was drawn in the usual way the jury by whom the case was tried and determined. The claim by the prisoner is that, although the jury were properly chosen and duly summoned, they could not try the defendant, because of the fact that the jury that had been summoned was not certified to and filed by the sheriff with the county clerk. In disposing of this assignment of error, it is sufficient to say that the general panel of jurors in this case was drawn by the sheriff before the court of common pleas, pursuant to the 5th section of the act of April 21, 1876 (2 Gen. Stat. p. 1854, ¶ 50), and that the list of the general panel was certified to by the judges of the said court, pursuant to the statute, as jurors selected in all respects according to the provisions of the statute, a copy of which list was filed by the clerk in his office, and another copy delivered to the sheriff. The statute just referred to contains the only prescription of the mode in which the general panel shall be drawn. The other provisions of the statute are directory merely, and will not invalidate the selection and return of jurors unless it affirmatively appears that injury was done. Gardner v. State, 55 N. J. L. 17; Poulson v. Union Nat. Bank, 40 N. J. L. 563. The prisoner's counsel was informed by the list on file in the clerk's office of the names of the persons upon the general panel, and at the opening of court every juror whose name appeared on the general panel was present, and answered to his name. It may also be said that the sheriff was under no duty to deliver this list of jurors before the commencement of the term, the language of the section being, "as soon as may be after the commencement of the term," and no application was made to postpone the trial of the case until such a certificate might be made. The sheriff's failure to comply with this statutory requirement was a mere irregularity, which could in no wise have prejudiced the defendant in maintaining his defense upon the merits; and the statute forbids the reversal of a judgment upon an indictment for any imperfection, omission, defect in, or lack of form, or for any error except such as shall or may have prejudiced the defendant in maintaining his defense upon the merits. 1 Gen. Stat. p. 1138, § 89.

The fourth assignment of error relates to the judicial action of the trial court with respect to the introduction of certain evidence. The case was one depending wholly on circumstantial evidence. Certain witnesses testified to having seen certain footprints of a peculiar character in the dirt and soil near the body of the woman who had been murdered, and, for the purpose of showing that such footprints had been made by this defendant, the state produced the boots that were worn by the prisoner on the night in question. Certain impressions in sand, made in the presence of the jury by the boots just mentioned, were exhibited to the jury, against objections taken by counsel of the defendant. This constitutes this assignment of error. The testimony of the witnesses with regard to the appearance of these footprints was undoubtedly competent. Such testimony involved in no sense the knowledge of an expert, and the exhibition of the boots worn by the defendant on the night in question, and the impress in the sand by way of illustration with them, were also competent. We agree with the opinion of the supreme court on this subject.

The counsel of the prosecutor also contends that on a review of the whole record, pursuant to the act of May 9, 1894 (1 Gen. Stat. p. 1154), the conviction should be set aside and a new trial ordered. We have examined this case carefully and have reached the conclusion that the plaintiff in error has not suffered manifest injury, either in the rejection of testimony, or in the charge to the jury, or in the denial of any discretionary matter by the court, or upon the evidence adduced at the trial. We think that this case was fairly tried, and that the evidence justified the jury in their verdict.

Finding no error in the record or proceedings, the judgment should be affirmed.

Dixon, J., dissenting:

In January, 1896, the plaintiff in error was tried and convicted of murder in the first degree, before a tribunal styled in the record the court of oyer and terminer of the county of Somerset, held by a justice of the supreme court and two others styled judges of the court of common pleas of said county. At that time the act of June 18, 1895 (Pamph. Laws, p. 807), which purports to abolish the courts of oyer and terminer and of common pleas after the 1st Monday in December, 1895, stood upon the statute book unrepealed.

For the reasons set forth by Mr. Justice Magie in his dissenting opinion in State, Schalk, v. Wrighton, 58 N. J. L. 50, I think that act was a valid exercise of the constitutional power of the legislature to abolish the inferior courts of the state, and therefore that the tribunal which tried and convicted the plaintiff had no lawful existence, and consequently no jurisdiction.

That the act of April 9, 1896 (Pamph. Laws, p. 236), could not validate such proceeding is sufficiently maintained by the opinion of Chief Justice Beasley in Maxwell v. Goetschius, 40 N. J. L. 383, 29 Am. Rep. 342.

The judgment should be reversed.

For reversal—Dixon. 1.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT

Kate McNULTY

v.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(182 Pa. 479.)

A railroad employee engaged in working upon a bridge is a passenger while riding on a railroad train to his home after his day's work is done, where his contract entitled him to free transportation and he was not under any obligation to ride or engaged in any service for the company while so riding.

(October 11, 1897.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 3, for Philadelphia County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

NOTE.—For employee of a railroad as a passenger, see Doyle v. Fitchburg R. Co. (Mass.) 25 L. R. A. 167, and 33 L. R. A. 344.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. David W. Sellers, for appellant:

Decedent rode in the car only as an employee.

Tunney v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 291.

To impose upon the defendant the obligation of a carrier as to a passenger is to make a contract never agreed to.

Bricker v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 182 Pa. 8.

If McNulty was not in the car as an employee, then he was a trespasser.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Mooney, 126 Pa. 250.

He was on the car only by reason of his contract of service. He was therefore on the road "while lawfully engaged."

Ricard v. North Pennsylvania R. Co. 89 Pa. 195; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Colvin, 118 Pa. 230.

Mr. P. F. Rothermel, Jr., for appellee:
The case at bar falls directly within the decision of O'Donnell v. Allegheny Valley R. Co. 59 Pa. 239, 98 Am. Dec. 386.

Sterrett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first and third specifications of error are intended to present what may be regarded as the controlling question in this case: Whether upon the undisputed facts, the relation of plaintiff's husband to the defendant company, at the time he was killed, in the collision that occurred on October 28, 1894, was that of a passenger being transported in one of its cars, or that of an employee then in the service of the company. The specifications are as follows: (1) In refusing to charge, as requested in defendant's first point, "that McNulty was carried by defendant in the performance of a contract of employment and service, and was in law not a passenger, but an employee, and, as he was injured by a collision due to the negligence of the engineer, the verdict must be for the defendant." (3) "In charging the jury that the decedent was a passenger." This specification was doubtless intended to embrace that part of the charge in which the learned trial judge refers to the relation of the deceased to the defendant company at the time of the collision. If so, it offends against rule 23, which provides that "the part of the charge . . . referred to must be quoted totidem verbis in the specification."

Turning to the charge sent up with the record, we find that as to the contractual relation existing between the deceased and the defendant and the circumstances attending the collision in which he lost his life, etc., the learned judge said: "It appears that the husband was an employee of the railroad company. He was employed to work on a bridge at Tacony, in this county, under a contract of employment, by which he was to receive $1.20 a day; and the company also contracted to transport him from his home to the place where his work was to be performed, and from that place back to his home at night, when his work was over. The dead man lived at Bristol, in the adjoining county; and, upon the Sunday when he met his death, he had finished his work about 15 or 20 minutes after 6 o'clock, and he, with other workmen employed upon the bridge at Tacony, entered a passenger car of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and the car then proceeded towards Bristol. It stopped at a station called 'Croyden,' situated between Tacony and Bristol; and while there at rest, or when about to come to rest, a freight train of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, upon the same track, crashed into the rear end of the car and plaintiff's husband was killed. It was argued to the court that under a statute of our state, and under the general law, a railroad company was not liable in damages in such a case as this, because McNulty was an employee of the company at the time of the accident, and that the company is not liable to the employee who is injured through the negligence of another employee. In passing upon the motion for a nonsuit, I stated, and I now charge you, that, under the contract of hiring in this case, the services, the work, the employment of McNulty, ceased when he quit work at Tacony, and that, while he was being transported to his home over the tracks of the railroad company, he was not an employee then in its service; and therefore the injury which he suffered, and which resulted in his death, did not come to him while he was in the employ of the company. . . . He was not in the employ of the company, but was being transported over the road for a valuable consideration, under a contract, it is true, which involved his employment, but a contract in which the transportation and the wages were a return for services rendered; and therefore it became the duty of the company to transport him with care, and with due regard for his safety."

It is unnecessary to refer in detail to the testimony. A careful examination of the record clearly shows that the foregoing instructions were in strict accord with the undisputed evidence in the case. The conclusively established facts as to the contractual relation of the parties are not susceptible of any other conclusion than that the transportation of plaintiff's husband from and to his home in Bristol was part of the consideration moving from the company to him, and given him, with the $1.20, in payment of a day's wages. That being so, he had virtually paid for his passage home in the car in which he was riding at the time of the collision, and was therefore a passenger, and not an employee, as soon as his day's work was done, and he entered the car for the sole purpose of being carried home. In its controlling features, this case is on all fours with O'Donnell v. Allegheny Valley R. Co. 59 Pa. 239, 98 Am. Dec. 386, in which Mr. Justice Agnew, after referring to the contract of hiring in that case, says: "The work of the plaintiff was wholly at the bridge. . . . At the time of the accident the plaintiff had finished his day's work, and was 10 or 12 miles distant from the bridge on his way home. Under these circumstances, the court below instructed the jury that the plaintiff was traveling as a passenger and not in the capacity of a servant. . . . He was not bired to pursue his business on the train, but was carried in consideration of a reduction in the price of his wages. When his day's work was performed, he was no longer in the service of the company, but was free to go or stay, and, when he traveled, in effect paid his fare out of his wages." As was clearly shown in O'Donnell v. Allegheny Valley R. Co. 59 Pa. 239, 98 Am. Dec. 386, the cases of Ryan v. Cumberland Valley R. Co. 23 Pa. 384, and Tunney v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 291, are clearly distinguishable from the one now under consideration. The plaintiff in the former was a laborer on a gravel train. In the exercise of his employment he was required to be on the train. The loading and unloading of gravel necessarily required the hands employed in that work to travel with the train from place to place. He traveled, not as a passenger to any particular destination, but went with the train whenever it became necessary to obtain or deposit gravel. His traveling on the cars, like that of a brakeman or a fireman, was in pursuance to his employment, and not under a contract with the company for transportation to his home or elsewhere. In the other case it was part of Tunney's employment, as a laborer, for specific wages, to travel from Birmingham to Derby on a train called the "pick-up train," for the purpose of gathering up materials left along the line of the road; and he was required to be ready for the train at Birmingham, and start thence on his trip, and return there. The case was put distinctly on the ground that it was part of Tunney's contract of service that he was to return each day to Birmingham by the pick-up train, to be ready to start upon his work the next morning."

In the case at bar, the transportation from and to his home to which the deceased McNulty was entitled was not in any sense a service or connected with any service that he was rendering to the defendant company, but it was a service which the latter, by the terms of the contract, was required to render to him. He was under no obligation to ride on the cars, but there was an obligation on the part of the company to afford him an opportunity of doing so, if he saw fit to avail himself of it; and when he exercised the right to which he was thus entitled, and entered the car for the sole purpose of being transported to Bristol, he was a passenger, in the full sense of the word, and not an employee of the defendant. Before he did so, his day's service to the company was fully completed, and he had earned the $1.20, together with the right of transportation to Bristol.

The point for charge, recited in the second specification, was rightly refused, for the reason that there was no evidence in the case to bring it within the provisions of the act of April 4, 1868. As we have seen, plaintiff's husband, according to the undisputed evidence, was a passenger and not an employee, at the time of the collision; and hence, by express terms of the act itself, it has no application to the case.

The question of defendant's negligence as the sole cause of McNulty's death has been definitely determined by the verdict rendered under adequate and proper instructions. The question of contributory negligence of the deceased was not even suggested.

Further elaboration of the questions involved in the assignments of error is unnecessary. We find nothing in either of them that would justify a reversal or modification of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

Re Estate of Williamina LENNIG, Deceased.

(182 Pa. 485.)

1. A written agreement to transfer a share of a mere expectancy cannot be sustained as a gift, and is not valid when it is entirely one-sided without any consideration, and is not made in settlement of any controversy or dispute.

NOTE.—As to the validity of the transfer of an expectancy, see note to McCall v. Hampton (Ky.) 8; L. R. A. 226; also Hale v. Hollon (Tex.) 36 L. R. A. 75.

2. An abandonment of effort to obtain a codicil to a will cannot constitute a valuable consideration for the assignment of an expected interest in the estate, as it is against public policy to recognize such opportunity as the legitimate basis of a contract right.

A PPEAL by John B. Lennig, trustee, etc., from a decree of the Orphans' Court for Philadelphia County disallowing his claim to a share in the estate of Williamina Lennig, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John G. Johnson, for appellant:

The agreement of February 28, 1891, considered by itself, was binding upon all the parties thereto, and vested in the trustee of the children of John B. Lennig the right, at the decease of Mrs. Williamina Lennig, to receive one third of that portion of her estate which she had derived from her husband.

1. The agreement was made, not for the benefit of the covenantors, but for that of the children of John B. Lennig, who were entitled through their trustee to recover thereon.

Mississippi C. R. Co. v. Southern R. Assn. 8 Phila. 107.

2. The agreement operated as an equitable assignment to the trustee of the children of John B. Lennig of one third of the husband's portion of Mrs. Williamina Lennig's estate.

A seal imports only a constructive consideration, and is not sufficient to enable a court of equity to compel specific performance of any agreement, and much less an agreement to transfer an expectancy.

A gift is not executed unless the thing be delivered or what is the equivalent thereto.

Schieff's Appeal, 179 Pa. 319.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The subject of contention in this cause is the distribution of a fund constituting the estate of Williamina Lennig, amounting to about $180,000. The decedent left a will, wherein she bequeathed the whole of the fund to Williamina Thudicum, a daughter, and two granddaughters, Joyeuse and Williamina Fullerton. These three legatees have the prima facie title to the fund because it is given to them by the will of the last owner, the present testatrix. But the appellant, as trustee for his three children, claims one third of the fund by virtue of a paper duly executed by the three legatees in the lifetime of the testatrix. The paper is dated February 28, 1891, and the testatrix died September 15, 1893. The contents of the will were known to all the parties at the time of the execution of the paper mentioned. The appellant, John B. Lennig, trustee, was a son of the testatrix and her deceased husband, Charles Lennig, and the three children of the trustee were her grandchildren. The paper in question was an agreement on the part of Williamina Thudicum, Williamina Fullerton, and Joyeuse Fullerton that the share of Charles Lennig's estate which the testatrix received as his widow, claiming under the law and against his will, should be equally divided in the following manner, to wit: "One full third part thereof shall be paid to Williamina Thudicum absolutely. One other equal third part thereof shall be equally divided, share and share alike, between Williamina Fullerton and Joyeuse Fullerton. And one other equal third part thereof shall be equally divided, share and share alike, amongst the present and future children of John B. Lennig, and for this purpose shall be paid to the said John B. Lennig, as their trustee."

case with most careful attention, we are clearly of opinion that this paper was voluntarily executed by the parties to it, with a full knowledge of its contents, and with the intent that the instrument should do precisely what it purported to do, to wit, transfer to the children of John B. Lennig, through him as trustee, one equal third part of that part of the estate of the testatrix which she derived from her husband's estate. It is perfectly manifest to us that there was no fraud, imposition, mistake, misrepresentation, or undue influence exerted or existing in the minds of the parties to the instrument at the time of its execution, or at any time afterwards. Upon this branch of the case we concur entirely with the findings and views of the learned auditing judge, and, if the decision of the case depended alone upon these considerations, we would reverse the decree, and award the one third of the fund to the appellant, as trustee. But there is a fundamental question lying back of the instrument and the evidence affecting it, which, as it seems to us, is fatal to the appellant's claim. It is this, and it arises in this manner: The fund in controversy belonged to the testatrix absolutely, and she could dispose of it as she pleased. She has given it to her daughter and her granddaughters, and she refused to give any part of it to the appellant's children, when she had the opportunity to do so by means of a codicil to that effect, which she was asked to sign, but refused. We mention this incidentally, and not because we think it is vital to the decision. We see no reason to discredit the positive testimony of Dr. Fricke in relation to the codicil which he presented to the testatrix for her signature. The claim of the appellant therefore rests exclusively upon the effect, in any legal or equitable sense, of the paper signed by the daughter and granddaughters of the testatrix. While it must be conceded that, although they were mere expectant legatees at the time they signed the paper, they subsequently became absolute owners of the fund, by reason of the testatrix dying without having made any change in her will, yet they now claim that they have changed their minds; that they desire the whole of the estate themselves; that they formally revoked the grant made, by another instrument duly executed; but, over and above all, that the instrument they did execute was never obligatory upon them and conveyed no estate or interest to the appellant or his children. The blunt question therefore arises, Can that instrument be enforced against them, contrary to their will? If it was a good conveyance, operative from its date, or if it became effectually operative from the death of the testatrix, it could not now be recalled or rescinded by any act of theirs; and hence the formal rescission by the paper of June 12, 1893, is not of very material consequence, except as notice that the parties to it were determined to resist all claim under the former paper, and were no longer agreed that the appellant or his children should have or take any part of the fund under the original instrument.

The question now recurs, Does that instrument confer a good title, which can be enforced either at law or in equity? The difficulty about it grows out of the peculiar character of the subject-matter of the instrument. It was an estate in expectancy only. The grantors had no present estate or interest in the property at the date of the grant. It was the property of the testatrix, and she might at any time, up to the moment of her death, revoke her will, and give the estate to other persons. The instrument was therefore an attempted conveyance of something that did not then belong, and might never belong, to the persons assuming to convey it.

There are plenty of authorities in relation to this species of assignment or grant, but the sum of the whole of them is that at law they convey nothing, and in equity they must be founded upon a valuable, not merely a good, consideration. In Bayler v. Com. 40 Pa. 37, a married woman, her husband joining, executed a mortgage, to secure a debt of the husband, upon all her estate, right, title, and interest which she would be entitled to receive from her father's estate. When, after the father's death, the creditor attempted to enforce it, we held it could not be done, because the estate mortgaged was only an expectancy, and it was invalid at law, and in equity there was no sufficient consideration to sustain it. Strong, J., delivering the opinion, said: "The mortgage given by Mrs. Jay and her husband to Henry Bayler was not a pledge or conveyance of any estate which she owned at the time of its execution. . . .

Her father was then living. In his estate she had no property—no interest. The subject of the mortgage was therefore nothing that she then had. It was a mere expectancy, and the instrument of mortgage was made, not for any consideration then received by her, or parted with by the mortgagee, but solely for the purpose of securing a prior debt of her husband. . . . It is an old and well-settled rule of the common law, that a mere possibility cannot be conveyed or released; and the reason given for it is that a release or conveyance supposes a right in being. . . . At law, therefore, nothing passes by a deed of land of which the grantor is only heir apparent. Certainly nothing by its direct operation. . . . But though a conveyance of an expectancy, as such, is impossible at law, it may be enforced in equity as an executory agreement to convey, if it be sustained by a sufficient consideration." In Power's Appeal, 68 Pa. 443, we said (Read, J.): "An heir, or an expectant devisee or legatee, may, in the lifetime of the intestate or testate, in equity sell or assign his expectant or contingent interest, whatever it might turn out to be, upon the death of the person from whom it may come, which contract, if made upon a valuable consideration, a court of equity will enforce." Citing from Snell, Eq. p. 72, the opinion proceeds: "A mere expectancy, therefore, as that of an heir at law to the estate of an ancestor, or the interest which a person may take under the will of another then living, nonexistent property, to be acquired at the future time, as the future cargo of a ship, is assignable in equity for valuable consideration. . . . The interest which a child has in his orphanage part is a mere contingency, and no present right, and therefore a release of it is not valid, in point of law; but, if founded on a valuable consideration, it shall operate as an agreement, and be binding in equity." In Kuhn's Estate, 163 Pa. 488, our Brother Williams, delivering the opinion, said: "At law a valid transfer can be made of anything in actual existence. What the assignor has he may dispose of. What he has not, although he may hope or expect to acquire it, he can make no title to because he has no title himself. But such sales and assignments have been sustained in courts of equity whenever good conscience seemed to require it, and not otherwise. . . .

If the consideration for such an assignment is a fair and honest one, the assignment will be treated as an agreement to transfer when the assignee's title accrues, and it will be held to take effect as an assignment when the expectant interest vests in the assignor. . . . Was the assignment to Julia Ann Kuhns good in equity? This must depend on the bona fides of the transfer and the adequacy of the consideration." There is a great abundance of authorities to the same effect, and it is not necessary to cite more of them. They are not really disputed. Recognizing their force, the appellant contends that in this case there was sufficient consideration for the agreement in question on two grounds: (1) Because of its being a family settlement; and (2) it led to a discontinuance of efforts to procure the execution of a codicil to the will, in favor of the appellant's children.

We do not see how the paper can be regarded as a family settlement. There was nothing in dispute. There was no title or claim of title of any kind residing in the appellant's children. There was no doubt existing about any question at issue between the parties as to the title to any interest in the estate of the testatrix on the part of the children of the appellant. So far as there could be any title or pretense of title before the death of the testatrix, the persons signing the paper were the only persons having any interest whatever. Their interest was but an expectancy, at the best. While such as interest would have been sufficient to bind them, it could only do so by virtue of an actual and valuable consideration passing to them from the grantees. But there was no controversy or dispute between the parties about any claim of interest or title which the grantees had or might have in the estate of the testatrix, and hence we cannot see how the paper can be regarded as a settlement of a dispute or controversy. If they had even a doubtful claim, although it were found afterwards that it could never have been realized, still it would probably be regarded as sufficient to sustain an actual settlement. But here there is nothing which can be regarded as having even the semblance of a claim upon which to raise any kind of a consideration. In Wistar's Appeal, 80 Pa. 495, which was a bill in equity founded upon an agreement which was claimed to be a family settlement, and where actions of ejectment had been brought and were pending for trial when the agreement was made, and in which the master found that the plaintiffs were entitled to the relief sought on the ground that the agreement was of the character claimed, this court reversed the master and court below, and dismissed the bill.

Mr. Justice Sharswood, delivering the opinion, said: "It is certainly true that all agreements for the compromise and settlement of family disputes are favorably regarded, both in courts of law and equity, and are supported, not only as beneficial in themselves, but as conducing to peace and harmony, where it ought most especially to exist. . . . But the principle is not to be carried so far as to work practical injustice. Especially it ought not to override every other rule upon which courts of equity proceed in the enforcement of the specific performance of contracts. A bill for that purpose is always an appeal to the conscience of the chancellor, in which he exercises a sound discretion under all the circumstances, and he will not interfere if the bargain is hard or unconscionable, or the terms unequal, or the complainant is taking an undue advantage from the strict legal construction of the words.

. . . In the compromise of family disputes particularly, the agreement of compromise should be complete in itself, not a mere plan looking to a future adjustment of details; more especially when, so far from settling the family difficulties, it will be itself merely the germ of future litigation. Otherwise, instead of promoting peace and harmony, it may be the source of prolonged discord and dissension." In the present case it will be observed that the agreement is entirely one-sided. The parties who signed the paper merely gave away their expected rights to the whole estate of the testator, and got nothing in return. The children of the appellant had nothing to give, and did not agree to give anything. If the paper could be sustained as a gift, it would answer the purpose; but that cannot be, because the thing given had no existence, and as a gift, under all the authorities, it cannot be sustained. In Groves v. Hodges, 55 Pa. 519, Strong, J., said: "Mutuality of obligation is considered, perhaps, more frequently in courts of equity than in those of law. In bills to enforce the specific performance of contracts, which, of course, have to do with executory agreements, it is a constant inquiry what equities the defendant has against the complainant, and a chancellor will not enforce specifically a contract that is one-sided." In Bispham, Eq. 5th ed. p. 489, it is said: "It is essential to specific performance that the consideration should be valuable. A merely good consideration, such as natural love and affection or the performance of a moral duty, will not be sufficient. Moreover, it is necessary that the consideration shall be actual. A constructive consideration, such as that imported by a seal to a bond, will not do." In Kennedy v. Ware, 1 Pa. 445, 44 Am. Dec. 145; Gibson, Ch. J., said: "An equitable assignment of a chose in action is said by Mr. Butler (Co. Litt. 232b, note 1) to be a declaration of trust, with an agreement to permit the assignee to sue in the assignor's name. The contract, being consequently executory, must have a consideration to support it, without which equity would no more execute it than the law would make the breach of it a subject of compensation. . . . Consanguinity is sufficient to raise a use; but that it is not a consideration for an assignment like the present is shown by Brett v. J. S. Cro. Eliz. pt. 2, p. 756, where it was held that natural affection is not a sufficient consideration for an assumpsit to ground an action.

What, then, was the consideration of the assignment before us? Kennedy, whose executors are sued on a parol agreement to convey land to his son-in-law, Ware, assigned by the instrumentality of his son, to whom he had conveyed his estate in special trust, a judgment against Avery in advancement of his daughter, Ware's wife. The trust being subsequently revoked and the estate reconveyed, Kennedy promised to convey to Ware a particular lot of land in lieu of part of the judgment which was reassigned to him. The judge charged that the promise would sustain the action, but, according to the cases brought into view, the first assignment of the judgment, being in consideration of natural love and affection, was void; and as Ware had nothing in it to give back, Kennedy's promise to convey on the foot of it was also void. The partial rescission of the first assignment was not the compromise of a contested right; and there was therefore no consideration for the agreement on that or any other ground."

For the reasons stated, we are unable to regard the instrument in question as a family settlement, or as being founded upon any consideration. The only other point suggested in this connection is the proposition that, in consequence of the agreement, further efforts to obtain a codicil to the will of Mrs. Lennig were abandoned, and this may be regarded as a sufficient consideration to support the agreement as an equitable assignment. We find ourselves quite unable to assent to this contention. There is no evidence that we can discover of any agreement on the part of Mrs. John B. Lennig or her children to desist from further efforts to obtain from Mrs. Lennig the execution of a codicil in favor of the children; and, while it may be that no such further effort was actually made because of the agreement, that circumstances could not operate as proof of a restrictive agreement against further efforts. But, even if there had been a positive agreement to make no further efforts to obtain a codicil, we cannot regard such a stipulation as a valid condition, possessing the force of a valuable consideration. An agreement not to importune an aged and infirm invalid to make a testamentary disposition in favor of a party may be a very proper stipulation for the party to make, because such conduct would be reprehensible upon considerations of policy and sound morality; but that it can be held to be a valuable consideration for the conveyance of an expectancy in the estate of such a person is a very different proposition. While children may reasonably solicit their parents to make a testamentary disposition in their favor, they certainly should not do so at the risk of annoying and distracting such parents or other persons when in conditions of sickness and suffering. It would certainly be an evil policy for the courts to give countenance to such proceedings by recognizing them as the legitimate basis of a contract right. We cannot regard the argument or the inference of such a result in this case as the foundation of a lawful right to recover the estate of such a person when deceased, upon the theory that it constituted the basis of a valuable consideration for the assignment of an expectant interest in such estate. Entertaining these views, we are obliged to sustain the decree of the court below, while we would have been very glad to reach a different result if that were possible.

The decree of the court below is affirmed, and appeal dismissed, at the cost of the appellant.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Fayette County dismissing a bill filed to enjoin defendants from interfering with plaintiff's business and to recover damages for such interference. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear from the following report of the master, W. J. Johnson:

The testimony in this case is rather lengthy, and the controversy grows out of what is commonly called, or known, as a "strike," resulting from a difference of disagreement in the price of wages between the complainant as operator and the respondents as employees.

Before going on to find the facts in the case, a brief review of the pleadings will be made. Upon the 28th day of February, A. D. 1893, Margaret O'Neill, the plaintiff, filed her bill in equity, setting forth that she is the owner of certain coal works in Washington township, Fayette county, Pennsylvania, situate on the Monongahela river where she is engaged in the business of mining and selling bituminous coal; that in conducting said business she has for a long time past been giving constant employment to a large number of men; that on or about the 10th of September, 1892, the workmen employed by her with one consent and in a body without reasonable or just excuse and greatly to the injury and damage of her said business did cease and refuse and do still refuse to continue working in their said employment for her in conducting her said business; that these defendants were on and before the 10th of September aforesaid in her employ at said works, or employed in other occupations in the immediate neighborhood of said works; that since the 10th day of September aforesaid, solely because of the refusal of the men to work, the said works and business have been altogether interrupted and suspended, to her great inconvenience, injury, loss, and damage; that since that time she has made great efforts to replace the said strikers with other workmen who were willing and desirous to work for her in said business, and had procured a large number of men who attempted to go to work in said mines; that the strikers did on the 28th day of February, 1893, intimidate, overawe, and prevent eleven workmen from accepting and undertaking said work for her, besides large numbers of other workmen who were at other times so prevented and deterred; that the above-named defendants have unlawfully combined and conspired together to prevent any other persons from accepting employment from and working for her in said business; that in pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, they have prevented large numbers of workmen from assisting her in her said business, and for the purpose of preventing and deterring all persons from assisting her in her said business are engaged in collecting large, tumultuous, and disorderly crowds which maintain a threatening appearance and conduct, and address threats, menaces, and abusive language to the workmen who are willing to work, thereby putting them in fear of personal or bodily violence or injury to such an extent as to intimidate and prevent them from assisting her in said business; that the defendants are without means to enable them to respond adequately in damages, and that they are active participators in the violent and unlawful acts above mentioned.

She prays for a preliminary injunction, hereafter to be made perpetual, restraining and enjoining the said defendants from assembling and procuring other persons to assemble in large, disorderly, and threatening crowds at or in the neighborhood of the railway stations, steamboat landings, or other places of public travel, and from doing and saying anything whatsoever calculated or intended to overawe, intimidate, hinder, or prevent any person from accepting work and assisting her in her said business, and from in any manner interfering with her business or workmen; and also that an account be stated of the damages sustained by her by reason of said unlawful acts of defendants.

A preliminary injunction was granted as prayed for, and upon March 6, 1893, defendants filed their answer admitting that they are workmen in part, and that some of them were formerly employed as miners at said Fayette City coal works, and that others of them follow divers other occupations, but denying that they or any of them have been unlawfully combining and conspiring together as set forth in plaintiff's bill, or been engaged in collecting and encouraging the assemblage of large crowds of disorderly and turbulent persons at and near the coal works of said plaintiff, or elsewhere, or in encouraging crowds, or any body of men in any boisterous, menacing, or threatening conduct, or in addressing violent, threatening, and abusive language to persons desirous to work for her, and also denying that they did on the 28th day of February, 1893, or on any other day, join with or lead any crowd or persons in making threats, menaces, and assaults upon the workmen of said plaintiff, or that they at any time used or attempted to use any violence or threats or menaces to plaintiff or her workmen for the purpose of intimidating, deterring, and preventing them or any persons from accepting employment from and assisting her in her said business, and denying all allegations in her bill charging them with any unlawful conduct or acts in any manner.

It will be seen that the claims or allegations of plaintiff may properly be divided as follows: She claims that the workmen had not the right, without any reasonable or just excuse and greatly to her inconvenience, injury, loss, and damage, to quit and refuse to work for and assist her in her said business: Second. That these defendants together with other persons unlawfully combined and conspired together to prevent and altogether deter all other persons from accepting work from her and assisting her in her said business, and in pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy did engage in abusing, annoying, threatening, menacing, intimidating, deterring, and preventing workmen who were willing to assist her from accepting work. Third. That said defendants are liable to her in damages for losses sustained by reason of the stoppage of said works and business, and for expenses incurred by said strike.

From the testimony taken in the case the master reports the following findings of facts:

1. That the plaintiff, Margaret O'Neil, is one of the owners of certain coal works at Fayette City, Fayette county, Pennsylvania, situate on the Monongahela river, where she is engaged in the business of mining and selling bituminous coal, and in conducting the said business gives employment to a large number of men, about 250 or 300 at a time, the number employed when said works are running in full.

2. That on and before the 10th day of September, 1892, the said works were and had been for some time past running in full, giving employment to part of the defendants herein named and a number of other persons. On or about the 1st of September aforesaid plaintiff gave notice to her employees by posters and otherwise, that on and after the 10th of said month a reduction of one half of a cent on the bushel would be made for mining said coal, that is, instead of paying 8 cents per bushel only 2½ cents would thereafter be paid. This reduction was accordingly made but the miners refused to accept it and on the 10th of September all the employees at said works with one consent and in a body ceased and refused to continue working in their said employment for said plaintiff and continued so to refuse to work until the "strike", as it is called, was declared off on the 24th of March, 1893.

3. That only five of these defendants, Michael O'Neil, J. N. Furlong, Frank Lowers, Link Lowers, and Hugh McDonald, were in the employ of the said plaintiff on the 10th of September when the men quit work; that John H. Wilson, Charles Wilson, Jr., Robert I. Johnson, William Johnson, John Biles, Jacob Carr, James McPherson, and Frank Bruce had formerly been in her employ but were at that time employed elsewhere, and the other defendants, Noah Behanna, George Hupp, William T. Spalter, Thomas Haywood, James A. Jacobs, Charles Jacobs, Frank Jacobs, and Paul Lamak, had never been in her employ but were and had been engaged in various occupations in the immediate neighborhood of said works.

4. That said works and business were altogether interrupted and stopped on the 10th of September aforesaid by the men quitting and refusing to continue to work in their said employment for said plaintiff. After having been thus stopped no effort or attempt was made by plaintiff to start up said works and resume business until about the 1st of February, 1893, when she began to procure new men in and about Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and to bring them in to said works to take the places of the strikers. While the stoppage of said works and business was caused solely by the men quitting and refusing to work, yet the suspension until February 1 was not, as the plaintiff made no effort to resume operations. The new men were brought to said works in charge of plaintiff's agents, some on the cars, and others on the steamboats. The first squad of these men, about eleven in number, was brought in on the 1st or 2d day of February aforesaid, and after that various other different squads were brought in two and three times a week until the strike ended six or seven weeks afterwards on the 24th of March.

5. When new men arrived they were always met at the station and landings by some of the strikers, usually by one or more members of their committee which had been appointed by them to look out for new men, and prevailed upon not to go to work in their, the striker's places. Several of the above-named defendants, namely: Robert I. Johnson, William Johnson, Michael O'Neil, Charles Wilson, George Hupp, and Jacob Carr, were on this committee to solicit new men not to work. Some of the men in nearly every squad that was brought in refused to go to work and joined the strikers who furnished them meals and gave them money or tickets to go back home. On several occasions members of the committee went down the river on the lookout for new men and came up with them on the train and boats and talked to them and persuaded them not to stop at said works but to go on past. Crowds of considerable size frequently, in fact almost invariably, collected at the station and on the wharf and street corners when the trains and boats came in. This seems to be the custom of the place. These crowds were composed of strikers and citizens of the town in general, but were, perhaps, somewhat larger on account of the men being idle. Defendants were sometimes in these crowds and talked to the men and tried to persuade them not to go to work; not all of them at one and the same time, but some at one time, others at another. On two or three occasions there was hallooing and cheering of victory by some of these defendants and other strikers when new men were brought in and part of them went back, especially on one occasion after the entresquad of ten men joined the strikers a cheer of victory was given. In a few instances there were some pushing and shoving by plaintiff's agents to keep the strikers from talking to the men, and while some profanity was indulged in, yet there was no violence used by either party. In their efforts to get to talk to the men some of the strikers, and sometimes some of these defendants, would follow the men up from the river to their boarding houses. Printed notices were distributed by the strikers requesting that no men should work in the river mines and especially at Fayette City. Plaintiff had some special police officers or watchmen hired, and also, fearing that trouble or a riot might occur, applied to the sheriff for assistance, who responded by sending two deputies on the 12th or 13th of February and two more on the 20th, all of whom stayed there until the strike was declared off. The sheriff himself was there twice in the meantime but saw nothing indicating trouble. Some trouble or street rows and personal altercations occurred between the town policeman and the deputies and a few arrests were made. Plaintiff's manager admits that they were not troubled or interfered with in any way whatever by defendants and other strikers until they attempted to start up on February 1. Another fact which in the master's opinion is important in passing on this matter, is, that none of the men who were deterred and prevented from accepting work were called at the hearings to testify that it was the alleged unlawful acts of these defendants or other strikers that prevented them from working for plaintiff.

The master finds also that the weight and preponderance of evidence in this contention lie upon the side of the defendants, and from all the testimony is of the opinion and states here as facts that the defendants did not on the 28th day of February, 1893, intimidate and prevent eleven workmen from accepting work from plaintiff; nor did they deter and unlawfully prevent other workmen at any other time from working for her; nor did they unlawfully combine and conspire together to deter and prevent all persons from accepting employment from and working for her in her said business; nor did they annoy, disturb, intimidate, frighten away, deter, and prevent workmen from accepting employment from her, or attempt so to do, by collecting in or in aiding and assisting in collecting, large, tumultuous, and disorderly crowds of threatening appearance and conduct, and by addressing threats, menaces, and abusive language to said workmen, thereby putting them in fear of personal or bodily violence and injury as charged in the fifth and sixth paragraphs of her bill, but that they appealed to them and informed them of the situation, leaving them free to act upon their own judgment, and by peaceful solicitations persuaded them or some of them not to go to work.

6. Plaintiff claims to have sustained loss and damages by reason of the interruption of said work and business in loss of trade, damages to works and mines, and expenses incurred in procuring new men to the amount of at least $5,000, and offered testimony and itemized statements marked Exhibits "A," "B" and "C" attached to the testimony in the case, in support of said claim. The master is of the opinion, however, that having already found as a fact that defendants limited themselves to legitimate and peaceful means, and did not act in an unlawful manner, a finding of fact from the evidence on this matter is immaterial and unnecessary.

7. It is not clearly established whether defendants have sufficient means to enable them to respond adequately in damages or not, and is too uncertain to become the subject of a finding of fact, but it is believed by the master that they are without such means.

From the facts found from the testimony and from the pleadings, the master reports the following findings of law:

1. That these defendants had a right to quit and refuse to work for plaintiff, on the 10th of September, 1892, either as individuals or collectively, if in their opinion the wages paid were insufficient, or their treatment unjust. Act June 16, 1891.

Not being bound by contract or agreement to work for plaintiff a certain time, they were free to work for whom they pleased, or not to work at all if they so preferred.

In Com. v. Hunt, 4 Met. 183, 38 Am. Dec. 346, Chief Justice Shaw, in referring to a similar case, uses these words: "It acknowledges the established principle, that every free man, whether skilled laborer, mechanic, farmer, or domestic servant, may work or not work, or work or refuse to work with any company or individual, at his own option, except so far as he is bound by contract."

In the opinion of the master, these defendants, when they quit and refused to work for plaintiff, merely asserted and used a right and privilege to which they are lawfully entitled as workmen, and which the courts fully recognize in all proceedings, whether in civil actions or criminal prosecutions. Cote v. Murphy, 159 Pa. 420, 23 L. R. A. 185; Newman v. Com. (Pa.) 5 Cent. Rep. 497; State v. Glidden, 55 Conn. 46; Com. v. Hunt, 4 Met. 111, 38 Am. Dec. 346.

2. That defendants had a right to approach new men and advise them of the strike at said works and of its cause and by peaceful solicitations persuade and induce them not to work for plaintiff in their places as it would be thus working against all their interests. The act of assembly of April 20, 1876, authorizes workmen, having a lawful purpose, to hinder and delay others from working by any means other than the use of force, threats, or menaces of harm to persons or property.

In People v. Wilsig, 4 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 418, it is held that "they [the workmen] have a right to go to all their friends, make known their wrongs, and say to them, 'If you are a friend of labor, withdraw your patronage from the man who injures us or refuses us justice.'" To resist the proposed reduction of their wages was, in the master's opinion, a lawful purpose.

It is contended by counsel for plaintiff, however, that any united or concerted action on the part of defendants to quit and refuse to work for plaintiff and in any manner hinder and keep others who are willing to work for her from working, is an unlawful combining and associating together, and that any talking to, advising, solicitations, or inducements whereby workmen are dissuaded and kept from working for and assisting her in her said business is an unlawful annoyance, hindrance, and interfering with her workmen and business to her injury and loss, and contended further that said defendants did not limit themselves to quiet, peaceful means at all times. The case chiefly relied upon to support plaintiff's claims is the case of Brace Bros. v. Evans, 35 Pittsb. L. J. 899. The facts in that case differ very materially from those found by the master in the present case. As to the question raised by part of plaintiff's contention that case does not decide, for the court, Slagle, J., in delivering the opinion, says: "It is not necessary to say whether or not the defendants in this case might, individually or collectively, refuse to employ Brace Bros. and advise their friends and neighbors and such of their patrons as they could reach not to do so, or that they might not distribute circulars, giving a truthful account of plaintiffs' trouble with their employees. It is not necessary to a decision of this case." In State v. Glidden, 55 Conn. 46, it is said: "The law encourages combinations for good, and combinations by workmen to better their condition by legitimate and fair means are commendable and should be encouraged. It is certainly true that they had a right to have such a purpose [better their own condition, to fix and advance their rate of wages, and to further their own material interest] and to use all lawful means to carry it into effect. They had a right to request . . . [plaintiff] to discharge its workmen and employ themselves, and to use all proper arguments in support of their request." In Cole v. Murphy, 159 Pa. 420, 23 L. R. A. 185: "It is one of the indefeasible rights of a mechanic or laborer in this commonwealth to fix such value on his service as he sees proper, and, under the Constitution, there is no power lodged anywhere to compel him to work for less than he chooses to accept. But, in this case, the workmen went further; they agreed that no one of them would work for less than the demand, and by all lawful means, such as reasoning and persuasion, they would prevent other workmen from working for less. Their right to do so is also clear." They "agree upon what in their judgment is a fair price, and then combine in a demand for payment of that price; when refused, in pursuance of the combination, they quit work, and agree not to work until the demand is conceded; further, they agree by lawful means to prevent all others not members of the combination, from going to work until the employers agree to pay the price fixed by the combination. And this, as long as no force was used or menaces to person or property, they had a lawful right to do." These defendants quit and refused to work to resist a reduction of their wages, and to enforce their demand for the old price endeavored to prevent by lawful means others from working in their places. No force or menaces were used as the master finds from the testimony, but the strike was conducted in an orderly and a lawful manner.

8. That defendants are not liable to plaintiff for any loss or damages which she may have incurred or sustained. While there may have been losses and damages to plaintiff as claimed and offered at hearings, in this matter, they are not the result of illegal and unlawful acts of defendants and she is not entitled to recover, and no account of the damages need therefore be stated.

Messrs. R. P. Kennedy and Edward Campbell, for appellant:

The question as to the maintenance of a bill, and the granting of relief to a complainant, is to be determined by the status existing at the time of filing the bill. Rights do not ebb and flow. If they are invaded, and recourse to courts of justice is rendered necessary, it is no defense to the invasion of a right, either admitted or proved, that since the institution of the suit the invasion has ceased.

Messrs. Howell & Reppert and Boyd & Umbel, for appellees:

The appellees not only had the right to quit work either individually or collectively without in any way making themselves liable in damages to the appellant, but had the right by all lawful means, such as reasoning and persuasion, to prevent other workmen from working for less.

Cole v. Murphy, 159 Pa. 425, 23 L. R. A. 185.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are obliged to differ wholly from the view of the facts reported by the learned master. It is totally irreconcilable with the testimony, read in the light of experience and a knowledge of human nature. Nor can we agree entirely with the view of the court below, though it is more in accordance with the evidence and the law. The learned judge, in his opinion, says: "The testimony establishes the fact that certain of the defendants overstepped these bounds, and used annoyance, intimidation, ridicule, and coercion to prevent new men from engaging in work for the plaintiff. When the new men were followed, and importuned not to work, from their point of embarkation to their destination, and there met by the strikers in considerable numbers, and followed to their lodging places, all the time being pressed and entreated to return, and called 'scabs' and 'blacklegs,' and sometimes surrounded, and the effort made to pull them away, and unfriendly (at least) atmosphere about everywhere, it must be admitted that there was something more than mere argument and persuasion and the orderly and legitimate conduct of a strike. This was certainly serious annoyance, and well calculated to intimidate and coerce; and that effect was apparently produced on more than one occasion. Nor did such acts entirely end when the men imported actually began work, but such men were, on occasions, and in a less public manner, approached in a like manner in their intervals of labor and advised that there would be trouble there, and they had better leave. No actual violence, however, was employed." This is a mild and judiciously restrained statement of what the evidence clearly showed. The strikers and their counsel seem to think that the former could do anything to attain their ends, short of actual physical violence. This is a most serious misconception. The "arguments" and "persuasion" and "appeals" of a hostile and demonstrative mob have a potency over men of ordinary nerve which far exceeds the limits of lawfulness. The display of force, though none is actually used, is intimidation, and as much unlawful as violence itself.

An attempt is made to argue that the strikers only congregated at the place of arrival of the new men, in accordance with the custom at boat and train arrivals in small towns. But this disguise is too flimsy to hide the real purpose. If they desired in good faith to meet peaceably and lawfully for their own business, they should have selected another place, sufficiently remote to be free from the excitement and crowds which their own testimony admits attended the arrival of the new men, and also far enough away to avoid the intimidating effect of a hostile crowd on the newcomers. But, in truth, they did not desire to avoid that effect. On the contrary, that was what they were there for, and their presence indicates their real intentions too plainly for any verbal denials on their part to offset.

It is further urged that the strikers, through their committees, only exercised ("insisted on" is the phrase their counsel used in this court) their right to talk to the new men to persuade them not to go to work. There was no such right. These men were there presumably under contract with the plaintiff, and certainly in search of work, if not yet actually under pay. They were not at leisure, and their time, whether their own or their employer's, could not lawfully be taken up, and their progress interfered with, by these or any other outsiders, on any pretense or under any claim of rights to argue or persuade them to break their contracts. Even, therefore, if the arguments and persuasion had been confined to lawful means, they were exerted at an improper time, and were an interference with the plaintiff's rights which made the perpetrators liable for any damages the plaintiff suffered in consequence. But, in fact, their efforts were not confined to lawful means. The result of the evidence, as stated by the learned judge, is that the new men were "followed and importuned not to work, from their point of embarkation to their destination, and there met by the strikers in considerable numbers, . . . called 'scabs' and 'blacklegs,' and sometimes surrounded, and the effort made to pull them away." This view is quite sufficiently favorable to the defendants, and, as already said, a hostile and threatening crowd does not need to resort to actual violence to be guilty of unlawful intimidation. The acts of those defendants were an unlawful interference with the rights of the new men, and with those of the plaintiff. In Cote v. Murphy, 159 Pa. 420, 23 L. R. A. 135, it is said by our brother Dean that "it is one of the indefeasible rights of a mechanic or laborer in this commonwealth to fix such value on his services as he sees proper, and under the Constitution there is no power lodged anywhere to compel him to work for less than he chooses to accept," nor, as the same right may be stated with reference to this case, to prevent his working for such pay as he can get and is willing to accept. We regard the testimony as demonstrating that the defendants were guilty of an unlawful combination, which, while professing the intention and trying to maintain an outward appearance of lawfulness, was carried out by violent and threatening conduct, which was equally a violation of the rights of the new men who came to work for plaintiff, and of the plaintiff herself, and that they are liable in this suit for all the damages which plaintiff suffered thereby.

We have nothing at present to do with the acts of assembly from 1869 to 1891, which have modified the common law as to conspiracy. The question of their constitutionality was left open in Cote v. Murphy, 159 Pa. 420, 23 L. R. A. 135, and does not need to be considered here, as the evidence takes the case entirely out of their provisions.

The learned judge below found no damages against any of the defendants, but made a distinction between them as to liability for costs. We do not think the evidence sustains this distinction. The master reports that "all of the defendants are included in the term 'strikers,' as used by him in his report;" and the testimony is ample to show that all participated personally in the unlawful conduct, or in such combination as made them liable for the acts of the others done in pursuance of the common purpose.

The view taken by the master prevented him from considering the subject of damages, nor did the learned judge make any specific findings on them. In the absence of such findings, we do not enter on the discussion of the subject further than to say that the plaintiff has established her claim to some substantial damages, though her claim may be larger, and may start at an earlier date, than the proof will sustain. So far as yet appears, the defendants did nothing to make them liable prior to the attempt of plaintiff to resume operations, in February, 1893. But after that date the violation of her rights is clear. The case must go back for examination and ascertainment of the facts on this branch of it.

Not the least notable feature is the expression of surprise by the counsel, and even by the court, that the case was pushed after the strike was over. It appears to be a fact that the strike was less violent and disorderly than others which had preceded it, and a sentiment seems to have pervaded the community—even the court not being entirely exempt—that, the strike being over, the subject had better be dropped. This is not law nor justice. A plaintiff who might have been hurt worse than he was may be inclined not to push his claim for compensation for the injury actually received; but it is for him, and not for others, and especially not for courts, to make the choice, and there should be no judicial surprise if he insists on his rights, though other men may think discretion the better part of valor.

Decree reversed, bill reinstated, and damages directed to be ascertained in accordance with this opinion; costs to be paid by the appellees.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FIFTH CIRCUIT.

Edward EVEY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

MEXICAN CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY, Limited.

(51 Fed. Rep. 294, 53 U. S. App. 118.)

1. A transitory action for a personal tort accruing in Mexico is within the jurisdiction of a circuit court of the United States where one party is a citizen and resident of Texas and the other a citizen of Massachusetts.
2. The laws of Mexico defining negligence and the civil rights resulting therefrom are not too vague and indefinite to be administered by courts in this country.
3. Dissimilarity between the law of Mexico, where the cause of action for negligence arose, and the law of Texas, in which an action is brought therefor, will not preclude the maintenance of the action where the dissimilarity relates chiefly to matters of procedure, and does not involve any conflict with the settled public policy of Texas.
4. The fact that an action might be brought in Mexico for injuries received there by a railroad employee who lives in Texas, since the defendant owns and operates a railroad in Mexico, does not constitute a reason why he should not sue in Texas,—at least when the defendant railway company is incorporated in the United States and its road extends into Texas.
5. The right, under the law of Mexico, to recover additional damages in a new suit when they accrue after the first judgment for injuries caused by negligence is a matter of remedy only, and does not prevent a court in the United States from enforcing a liability for negligence occurring in Mexico.
6. The requirement of an endeavor to procure an agreement and a compromise, which is found in the Mexican Code, art. 318, relates merely to procedure, and the failure to comply therewith does not prevent an action in this country for negligence occurring in Mexico.
7. The fact that negligence may constitute a crime in Mexico does not make a civil action in this country for the negligence amount to the enforcement of a penal law of Mexico when the civil liability does not depend, under Mexican law, upon the criminal prosecution.
8. The provision of the law of Mexico giving extraordinary indemnity for negligence considering the social position of the party injured does not constitute any reason why a court in this country should not entertain an action for negligence occurring in Mexico, when it is not asked to give such extraordinary indemnity.

9. The question of international comity is controlled and decided by international law and custom, and the decisions of local courts thereon are not controlling in the courts of the United States.

(April 12, 1897.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Before Pardee and McCormick, Circuit Judges.

Statement by Pardee, Circuit Judge:

To make an intelligent statement of this case it is necessary to give plaintiff's first amended original petition and the defendant's special exceptions thereto in full, as follows:

"Now comes the plaintiff, Edward Evey, and, by leave of court first obtained, files this, his first amended original petition, in lieu of his original petition heretofore filed, and alleges that the plaintiff, Edward Evey, is a citizen of, and resides in, El Paso county, Texas, and that the defendant is a railway corporation duly incorporated under the laws of, and a citizen of, the state of Massachusetts, doing business in El Paso county, Texas, and has, and at all times hereinafter mentioned has had and maintained, an office and agent in El Paso county, Texas; and that the said defendant, the Mexican Central Railway Company, Limited, owns and operates, and at all times hereinafter mentioned has owned and operated, a line of railway from the city of Mexico, in the Republic of Mexico, to and into El Paso county, Texas, carrying on and conducting the ordinary business of a railway company, as a common carrier of goods and passengers for hire; that on the 12th day of July, 1895, and for a long time next prior thereto, plaintiff was an employee of said defendant, engaged in the employment of said defendant company as a locomotive engineer, and was engaged in the running of an engine to and fro over its railway for defendant upon the division known and commonly called the 'Mexico Division,' and which comprises that portion or section of defendant's railroad from the city of Mexico north of Danue station, in the Republic of Mexico. And plaintiff says that on said 12th day of July, 1895, and while so engaged in the service of said defendant, and in the discharge of his duties incident to said employment, and while running said engine under the direction of said defendant company, he was, by and through the negligence of said defendant company, its section boss, agents, and servants, seriously and permanently injured, without any fault or contributory negligence on his part. And he says that on the said 12th day of July, 1895, he was engaged, as an engineer, in running for defendant, and under its orders and directions, an engine known in railroad parlance as a 'helper engine,' which said engine was then and there under the direction and in the charge of one Phil J. Martin, as conductor thereof; that on said 12th day of July, 1895, plaintiff, under the direction of said defendant and its said conductor aforesaid, had assisted a freight train, with said helper engine from Tula station to Danue station, on said defendant's railroad; that plaintiff arrived at said last-named station, on the said helper engine, at about 7 o'clock P. M. on said 12th day of July, 1895; that, upon his arrival at said Danue station, plaintiff was ordered to return to said Tula station by defendant and its agents and its said conductor Phil J. Martin; that in obedience to the orders of defendant and its agents and said conductor, who was then and there present, and in charge of, and controlling the operation of, said engine, plaintiff started to return from said Danue station to said station of Tula, and that while he was so returning the engine upon which plaintiff was as aforesaid was derailed and wrecked by and through the negligence of said defendant company, its section master, agents, and servants, in this: that said railway track was obstructed by a push car, said push car being then and there on said railway track, and being then and there in such a position as to obstruct said railway track, by and through the negligence of defendant, its section master, agents, servants, and employees; that plaintiff did not know, and had no means of knowing, that the railroad of defendant was unsafe or so obstructed, and was not informed thereof by defendant, or defendant's said section master, agents, or employees, and said push car was not seen by the plaintiff in time for him to stop said engine and protect himself against injury, for the reason that said defendant, its officers, section boss, and agents, negligently failed to provide the said push car with a light, and negligently failed to have a man or some person in front of said push car with a signal light to give warning to the plaintiff and others who might be upon said helper engine. And the said defendant, its officers, section boss, agents, and employees, negligently allowed said push car to be out upon said railroad track after dark (it being already dark when the accident aforesaid happened), and the said defendant, its section boss, agents, and employees, negligently failed to inform plaintiff that said track was so obstructed, or that said push car was upon that section of said railroad where plaintiff was operating said engine as aforesaid, although said defendant then and there owed plaintiff the duty to keep said railroad track clear and free of all obstructions. And through such negligence upon the part of said defendant, its section boss, agents, and employees, plaintiff was injured as hereinbefore and hereinafter stated. Plaintiff alleges that, when said push car was struck by said engine, said engine was derailed and wrecked, and plaintiff was thrown from said engine and sustained serious and permanent injuries, to wit, his left foot was badly crushed and broken, three of plaintiff's ribs were crushed and broken and his left leg was also badly crushed and broken, and plaintiff was greatly bruised, wounded, and permanently injured in his back, shoulders, heart, and spine, and by reason of such injuries plaintiff became insensible, and remained insensible for a long space of time, to wit, for the space of two hours, and after he regained consciousness he suffered intense pain and agony for the space of twenty-four hours; that after so receiving said injuries he was, by reason of the negligence of said defendant and its agents, forced to lie in the rain, upon the ground, and without shelter, for the space of nearly five hours, without any effort or attempt upon the part of defendant, its agents, or servants, or any or either of them, to administer to him, or to in any way or manner alleviate plaintiff's great suffering. Plaintiff states that the injuries so received by him were occasioned solely by the negligence of the defendant, its section boss, agents, and employees, in not maintaining its roadway in a safe and secure condition for the passage of said engine over the same, and in negligently allowing said push car to be on said track at the time of said accident, and negligently allowing the same to be on said track without supplying the same with a proper and sufficient light, and in negligently allowing said push car to be operated upon the same without having a man with a signal light at a safe distance in advance of the same, or on plaintiff's side of the same, to warn plaintiff of danger, and to notify plaintiff that there was danger, and that the push car was upon that section of track and in front of him. And plaintiff says that had not defendant, its section boss, agents, and employees, been so negligent in those respects he would not have been injured. Plaintiff states that said injuries so received by him through the negligence of defendant as aforesaid are serious and permanent as aforesaid, and have rendered plaintiff a cripple and invalid for life, and by reason of said injuries plaintiff has ever since said 12th day of July, 1895, suffered great mental and physical pain, and now suffers, and will throughout the remainder of his life continue to suffer, such pain, and that by reason of said injuries plaintiff was forced to lie in a hospital in the Republic of Mexico for the space of two months, and for seven months afterwards plaintiff was unable to do any work or follow any employment. Plaintiff says that before said injury he was a sound, able-bodied, and vigorous man, but by reason of said injuries plaintiff's heart is permanently and dangerously affected, his nervous system shattered and permanently injured, and plaintiff's capacity to earn a living as a locomotive engineer has been destroyed, and his capacity to earn a living by any sort of means or employment has been seriously and permanently impaired; that at the time of and before said injuries the plaintiff was earning the sum of $120 per month in money of the United States of American, or its equivalent in money of the Republic of Mexico, and that, by reason of his experience as a railroad engineer, he would have been able to earn at least that amount afterwards; that in consequence of said injuries it will be impossible for said plaintiff in the future to secure any kind of permanent employment, and that, even if he succeeds in securing any kind of employment, he will not be able to make and earn more than $30 per month; that at the time of said accident plaintiff was thirty-four years of age.

"Plaintiff further alleges that by the laws of Mexico, which now exist, and which existed and were in force at the time and place of the happening of said injuries, through defendant's negligence as aforesaid he (plaintiff) has and had a right of action against defendant for his damages, and he says that the following were the laws of Mexico, and are now the laws of Mexico, applicable in this case, out of which his said right of action grew, and by virtue of which the same now exists in said Republic of Mexico, viz.:

"From the Federal Constitution of the Mexican United States:

"Art. 72. Congress has power: . . . (22) To enact laws governing the general lines of communication, and governing postoffices and mails."

"Art. 97. The Federal courts have jurisdiction: (1) Of all questions growing out of the execution and application of the Federal laws, except when the application of the law only affects interests of individuals, in which case the local judges and tribunals of the state shall entertain jurisdiction."

"From the Federal Penal Code of Mexico:

"Art. 4. A crime is the voluntary infraction of a penal law, doing that which it prohibits, or neglecting to do that which it commands."

"Art. 5. A misdemeanor is the infraction of police regulations or proclamations and good government."

"Art. 6. There are intentional crimes, and crimes resulting from neglect."

"Art. 11. Negligent crimes exist: (1) Where an act is done, or a duty omitted, which, although lawful in itself, is not so by reason of its consequences, if the accused fails to provide against such consequences, through negligence, want of reflection or care, by not making proper investigations, by not taking necessary precautions, or through unskillfulness in any art or science, the knowledge of which is necessary in order that the act done may not result in injury. Unskillfulness is not punishable when he who does the act does not profess the art or science necessary to be known, and acts when impelled by the gravity and urgency of the case. . . . (3) Where the question relates to an act which is punishable solely by reason of the circumstances under which it is done, or by reason of a circumstance personal to the party aggrieved: If the accused is ignorant of such circumstances, through not having previously made the investigation which the duty of his profession or the importance of his case demands."

"Penal Code, bk. 2, 'Civil Liability in Criminal Matters:'

"Art. 301. The civil liability arising from an act or omission contrary to a penal law consists in the obligation imposed on the party liable, to make (1) restitution, (2) reparation, (3) indemnification, and (4) payment of judicial expenses."

"Art. 304. Reparation comprehends: The payment of all the damages caused to the injured party, to his family or to a third person, for the violation of a right which is formal, existing, and not simply possible, if such damages are actual, and arise directly and immediately from the act or omission complained of, or there be a certainty that such act or omission must necessarily cause, as a proximate and inevitable consequence."

"Art. 305. Indemnification imports: The payment of damages, that is, of that which the injured party fails to enjoy as a direct and immediate consequence of an act of omission by which a formal, existing, and not merely possible right is attacked, and of the value of the fruits of the thing usurped and already consumed, in the cases in which the same should be done conformably with civil right."

"Art. 306. The condition required by the two preceding articles, that the damages and injuries should be actual, shall not prevent that the indemnification of subsequent damages and injuries be exacted by a new suit, when they shall have accrued: If they proceed directly from, and as a necessary consequence of, the same act or omission from which resulted the previous damages or injuries."

"Art. 307. The payment of judicial expenses solely embraces those absolutely necessary, which the injured party incurs for the purpose of investigating the act or omission which causes the criminal proceeding and to avail himself of his rights in such proceeding or in the civil suit."

"Art. 308. The civil responsibility cannot be declared except at the instance of the party entitled to recover."

"Art. 309. The judges who adjudicated upon the civil responsibility shall be controlled by the provision of this title, in so far as its provisions extend; on other questions, they shall follow, according to the nature of the suit, the provisions of the civil or of the commercial laws which may be in effect at the time of the happening of the act or omission causing the civil responsibility."

"Art. 310. The right to civil responsibility forms part of the estate of a decedent and descends to his heirs and successors; provided, it be not the case of the following article, or that it arise from injury or defamation, and that, the offended person having been able in his lifetime to bring his suit, he neither did so nor directed his heirs to sue; in such case the offense shall be understood as remitted."

"Art. 311. The action to enforce civil responsibility demanding support of a person guilty of homicide is personal, and belongs exclusively to the persons named in the end of article 815 as directly damaged. Consequently such action forms no part of the estate of the deceased, nor is it extinguished, although the latter pardon the offense in life."

"Art. 318. The judges who take cognizance of suits based upon civil responsibility shall endeavor that the amount and terms of payment be fixed by agreement of the parties. Failing in this, the provisions of the following articles shall be observed: . . ."

"Art. 321. In case of blows or wounds, from which the injured party does not remain crippled, lame, or deformed, he shall have the right that the responsible party pay all his expenses of cure, the damages he may have suffered, and that which he may fail to gain during the time which, in the opinion of competent persons, he may not be able to do the work by which he subsisted. But it is essential that the inability to work should be the direct result of the wounds or blows, or be a cause which is the immediate effect of such blows or wounds.

"Art. 322. If the inability of the injured party to devote himself to his accustomed work be permanent, from the moment in which he shall recover and can properly devote himself to other and different work, which may be lucrative and appropriate to his education, habits, social position, and physical constitution, the civil responsibility shall be reduced to paying him the sum which his ability to earn in his new employment falls short of his daily earnings in his former occupation.

"Art. 323. If the blows or wounds cause the loss of any member not indispensable for work, or the person wounded or struck remain otherwise crippled, lamed, or deformed, by that circumstance, he shall have the right, not only to the damages and injuries, but also to the sum which the judge may determine as extraordinary indemnity, considering the social position and sex of the person and the part of the body remaining crippled, lamed, or deformed.

"Art. 324. The gain which the injured party fails to earn during his inability to work shall be computed by multiplying the sum which he formerly earned per day by the number of days of his disability.

"Art. 325. The provisions of the foregoing articles for computing the civil responsibility for wounds or blows shall be applied to all other cases where, in the violation of a penal law, a person may cause the illness of another, or may have placed him under disability to work.

"Art. 326. No person can be charged with civil liability upon an act or omission contrary to a penal law unless it be proved: That the party sought to be charged usurped the property of another; that without right he caused, by himself or by means of another, damages or injuries to the plaintiff; or that, the party sought to be charged being able to avoid the damages, they were caused by a person under his authority.

"Art. 327. Whenever any of the conditions of the preceding articles are established, the defendant shall be civilly liable, without regard to whether he be absolved or condemned to criminal liability."

"Art. 330. In order that masters may be held civilly liable through their clerks and servants, according to the provisions of articles 326 and 327, it is an indispensable condition that the acts or omissions of the clerks or servants causing the liability shall occur in the service for which they were employed.

"Art. 331. Under the condition of the preceding article, those liable are: . . . railroad companies."

"Art. 363. Limitation: The various actions by which the civil responsibility may be demanded, or the execution of a final judgment declaring that such responsibility has been incurred by the accused may be asked, shall be extinguished according to the terms and in the manner provided by the Civil Code or the Commercial Code, according to the nature of the demand and the subject-matter treated of.

"Art. 364. Amnesty shall not extinguish the civil responsibility, nor the actions to exact it, nor the legal rights which third persons may have acquired. Nevertheless, when the responsibility may not yet have been made effective, and the demand is not for restitution, but for reparation of damages, of indemnity for injuries, or for payment of judicial expenses, the guilty person shall remain free from such obligations only when it is so declared in the amnesty and they are expressly left to the charge of the public treasury.

"Art. 365. A pardon shall in no case extinguish the civil responsibility, nor the actions to enforce it, nor the legal rights which third persons may have acquired.

"Art. 366. Limitation is interrupted by the criminal proceeding until final judgment is pronounced. This done, the term of limitation commences to run anew."

"Transitory Law, Pen. Code:

"Art. 26. Until it is determined in the new Code of Procedure what judges shall have jurisdiction and the mode of proceeding, in suits to enforce civil liability, the following rules shall be observed. . . . (5) Actions to enforce the civil liability may be brought before a court of civil jurisdiction, whether or not the criminal proceeding has been commenced; but while the latter is pending the proceedings in the former shall be stayed."

"From the Federal Civil Code:

"Art. 9. Against the observance of the law, disuse, custom, or practice to the contrary cannot be alleged."

"Art. 20. When a judicial controversy can be decided neither by the text nor by the natural meaning or spirit of the law, it must be decided according to the general principles of right, taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case.

"Art. 21. In case of conflict of rights and the absence of express law for the especial case, the controversy shall be decided in favor of him who seeks to avoid damages, and not in favor of him who seeks to obtain profit. If the conflict should be between equal rights or rights of the same species, it shall be decided, observing the greatest equality possible between the parties."

"Art. 1095. Limitation bars in three years: . . . (8) Civil responsibility for injuries, whether done by word or by writing, and that which arises from damage caused by persons or animals, and which the law imposes upon the representatives of such persons or the owners of the animals."

"Act of Congress of December 15, 1881:

"Article 1. The executive shall regulate the service of railroads, telegraphs, and telephones constructed, or which in the future may be constructed, upon Mexican territory, according to the following bases: (1) Railroads, telegraphs, and telephones which in the Federal district and territory of Lower California unite together two or more municipalities, or the Federal district and territory of Lower Cali-

California with one or more states; those which communicate two or more states with each other; those which touch at any point in the territorial boundary line of the Republic and foreign countries, or run parallel therewith within a region of 20 leagues, are known as general lines of communication within the meaning of fraction 23 of article 72 of the Constitution. (2) These general lines of communication and their branches shall be subject exclusively to the Federal legislature, executive and judicial powers, in their respective spheres, in all cases where any of the following matters are involved: . . . (g) Construction and repair of the works. Crimes committed against the security or integrity of the works or against the operations of the lines. (h) Security of the same works for which the companies are obligated, and crimes or misdemeanors of the companies through delays or obstruction, carelessness or fault in the service, and for accidents or mishaps in the operation.

"From the regulations for the construction, maintenance, and operation of railroads."

"Art. 52. The coaches and cars which enter into the make-up of a train shall have the drawheads of the same height, so that their centers will be opposite to each other.

"Art. 53. The conductor of a train en route is the person in command of all the train crew, including the engineer and fireman."

"Art. 121. Engineers shall communicate by means of a steam whistle with the agents charged with the duty of watching, and with the conductors of trains, using the following signal: . . . Three blasts or sounds of the whistle shall be the signal that the entire train is going to move backward."

"Art. 124. Companies [railroad] are liable for accidents which occur through the failure to observe the provisions of this chapter [chapter 7] respecting signals, and for employing people who do not have certificates showing that their sight and hearing are free from infirmity which does not permit them to recognize the signals."

"Art. 194. Companies [railway] are liable for all faults or accidents which occur through tardiness, negligence, imprudence, or want of capacity of their employees."

"Art. 298. All violations of this law, which companies [railway] commit shall be subject to punishment by the administration by fine up to $500 which the department of public works shall assess, reserving always the right of individuals, through indemnity, and the liability which the companies may have incurred through criminal acts or omissions committed by them."

"Plaintiff further alleges that by virtue of the general principles of right and justice, and by virtue of the laws of Mexico hereinbefore set forth, he had at the time of the occurrence of the accident hereinbefore mentioned, and now has, a right of action for his damages against the defendant in the Republic of Mexico, and the same now exists in said country as well as in the United States of America. And he says that the acts of negligence upon the part of the defendant, its section master, agents, and employees, complained of, were wrongful and actionable, as has been hereinbefore shown by the plaintiff, in the Republic of Mexico, at the time of the accident complained of, and are now so, and he says the same were then and are now wrongful and actionable in the United States of America and in the state of Texas. And plaintiff says that by reason of said injuries received by him he has suffered and sustained damages in the sum of $15,000 for which he sues. And, the defendant being in court, plaintiff prays that he have judgment for his damages aforesaid, costs of suit, and he prays for general relief."

"(1) And, for further special exception to said petition, defendant, by its attorneys, comes and says: That it excepts to said petition because the laws of the Republic of Mexico, as pleaded by the plaintiff, are so vague, uncertain, and dissimilar to the laws of this country that this court should not entertain jurisdiction herein and attempt to enforce said laws. That said laws have been passed up on by a decision of the supreme court of the state of Texas, to wit, in the case of Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Jackson, 89 Tex. 107, 81 L. R. A. 276; it being therein held that the courts of this state would not sit to adjudicate controversies like the one at bar, under the laws of the said Republic of Mexico, on account of their dissimilarity to our laws, and that the policy of this state and courts of this country would be not to interfere with the traffic of railroads having their lines in Mexico by adjudicating causes arising in Mexico. (2) That said petition shows that the injury sustained by plaintiff occurred in the Republic of Mexico, and any right of action he may have would be controlled by the laws of said Republic, and it appears that said defendant has ever since said injury maintained its line of railroad in said Republic, and continued to possess its property in said Republic, and there is no reason shown in said petition why plaintiff did not sue for damages for said injuries in said Republic, where the injury occurred, instead of bringing his suit in this court. (3) That it appears from the laws of Mexico, as set out in plaintiff's petition, that, if plaintiff has any cause of action, it would be controlled by the laws of the Republic of Mexico. That according to said laws, as set out in plaintiff's petition, that suit and adjudication of the rights of plaintiff and the awarding of damages to the plaintiff for the injuries sustained would not be a final determination of the rights between the parties, but that plaintiff, according to said law, would have the right to bring suits from time to time, and recover in said suits, if said injury is continuing or permanent. That said law is contrary to public policy. (4) That, according to article 813 of the laws of said Republic, the judge who takes cognizance of suits based upon civil responsibility shall endeavor to effect compromise, so that the amounts and terms of payment be fixed by agreement of the parties, that, according to said law, no right of action will accrue to the plaintiff until after the judge who took cognizance of the case shall endeavor to have the amount and terms of payment fixed by agreement of the parties; that said petition fails to show that the judge of this court, or any judge having cognizance of said matter, had endeavored to have the amount and terms of the payment for such injuries agreed upon between the parties. (5) That according to the laws of said Republic, as set out in said petition, said plaintiff would have no right in a civil suit to recover damages for his said injuries unless he shows that the acts of defendant which caused the injury constituted a crime under said laws of Mexico. That the recovery in such civil suit is penal in its nature. That this court cannot enforce the penal laws of the Republic of Mexico. That said laws so pleaded do not sufficiently define what acts are made penal under said laws to enable this court to judge whether or not said acts by which such injury was caused are penal within the meaning of said law, to entitle plaintiff to any recovery in a civil action therefor. (6) That, according to article 823 of the laws of said Republic of Mexico, a recovery may be had, not only for the damages sustained by the injury complained of, but the judge trying the case may award, as extraordinary indemnity, any sum that he may determine, considering the social position, etc., of the party injured. That said law is against natural justice and the policy of our law to discriminate in favor of or against a litigant according to his social position. (7) That the laws of the Republic of Mexico, by which plaintiff's cause of action will have to be tried, are so vague and indefinite that this court cannot properly and intelligently determine and administer the same. Wherefore defendant prays judgment of the court, etc."

The circuit court, on argument, sustained the said special exceptions, and, the plaintiff declining to amend, dismissed the action, to which the plaintiff excepted, and now prosecutes this writ of error.

Messrs. W. B. Brack and Millard Patterson, for plaintiff in error:

It is not necessary that a right of action should exist both by the lex fori and the lex loci, and objections for dissimilarity do not so readily arise in Federal courts.

Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 38 L. ed. 1123, and cases there cited; Northern P. R. Co. v. Babcock, 154 U. S. 198, 38 L. ed. 961; Greaves v. Neal, 57 Fed. Rep. 817; Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 81 Minn. 11, 47 Am. Rep. 771.

The cause of action was transitory, and while the right of action is governed by the lex loci, the remedy, and all that pertains to procedure, are governed by the lex fori.

Mere dissimilarity is no ground for refusing jurisdiction, by Federal courts at least. Our right is founded upon general and international law, and mere local policy of state courts in refusing jurisdiction is not binding, no state law being involved.

Greaves v. Neal, 57 Fed. Rep. 816.

The fact that a tort was committed in a foreign country where the defendant does business has never for the last one hundred years been thought to constitute any objection to the court entertaining jurisdiction, especially where both parties are its own citizens, and personal service can be had. Nor is it necessary in such cases to show reason why suit was not brought in the foreign country.

Smith v. Condry, 42 U. S. 1 How. 80, 11 L. ed. 35; McKenna v. Fisk, 42 U. S. 1 How. 242, 11 L. ed. 117; Mitchell v. Harmony, 54 U. S. 13 How. 116, 14 L. ed. 76.

The purpose of the act was to give the injured party full damages, and whether these are to be recovered in one or two suits is a matter pertaining to the procedure or remedy.

Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Jackson (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 230.

The duty of the judge who takes cognizance of suits based upon civil responsibility in Mexico to effect a compromise does not relate to the substantial right of the party cognizable everywhere in any court, but to the remedy.

Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Jackson (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 235.

The fact that by a law of Mexico, as contained in article 26, such negligence is also a crime, does not justify the proposition that defendant has no right to recover damages unless he shows that the acts of defendant constitute a crime.

Dennick v. Central R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 439; Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Jackson (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 233.

Messrs. T. A. Falvey and Waters Davis for defendant in error.

Pardee, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

As the plaintiff is a citizen of the state of Texas, residing in the western district of said state, and the defendant a citizen of the state of Massachusetts, the circuit court has jurisdiction ratione personae. As the cause of action shown by the petition is one for a personal tort (i. e., for injury to the person through negligence), it is transitory, and the circuit court has jurisdiction ratione materiae.

While the negligence complained of was committed in the Republic of Mexico, neither of the parties is a citizen of Mexico, but both are citizens of the United States; and therefore there ought to be no question of international comity in the case, further than to inquire whether the laws of Mexico give a right to the plaintiff to recover damages for such negligence, and the extent of such right. The laws of the Republic of Mexico create a civil liability in favor of a person injured by negligence, and give a distinct civil remedy therefor, in the nature of pecuniary damages. To the same effect is the law of the state of Texas. This action is not barred by any statute of the United States, of the state of Texas, or of the Republic of Mexico. "A right arising under, or a liability imposed by, either the common law or the statute of a state may, where the action is transitory, be asserted and enforced in any circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties." Dennick v. Central R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 439. Whether a law is a penal law, in the international sense, so that it cannot be enforced in the courts of another state, depends upon whether its purpose is to punish an offense against the public justice of the state, or to afford a private remedy to a person injured by the wrongful act. "The test is not by what name the statute is called by the legislature or the courts of the state in which it was passed, but whether it appears to the tribunal which is called upon to enforce it to be, in its essential character and effect, a punishment of an offense against the public, or a grant of a civil right to a private person. In this country, the question of international law must be determined in the first instance by the court, state or national, in which the suit is brought. If the suit is brought in a circuit court of the United States, it is one of those questions of general jurisprudence which that court must decide for itself, uncontrolled by local decisions. Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 33, 27 L. ed. 359, 365; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Cox, 145 U. S. 593, 608, 36 L. ed. 829, 833. Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 673, 683, 36 L. ed. 1123, 1129, 1133. "The statute of another state has, of course, no extraterritorial force, but rights acquired under it will always, in comity, be enforced, if not against the public policy of the laws of the former. In such cases the law of the place where the right was acquired, or the liability was incurred, will govern as to the right of action; while all that pertains merely to the remedy will be controlled by the law of the state where the action is brought. And we think the principle is the same, whether the right of action be ex contractu or ex delicto." Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. J. R. Co. 31 Minn. 11, 47 Am. Rep. 771, approved by the Supreme Court of the United States in Northern P. R. Co. v. Babcock, 154 U. S. 190, 38 L. ed. 958. The foregoing propositions are not exactly disputed by the learned counsel for the defendant in error, but we have thought best to state them, in order to relieve this case of some of the judicial fog which has settled on it.

The first special exception to the plaintiff's right of action is, in substance, that the laws of the Republic of Mexico, as pleaded by the plaintiff, are so vague, uncertain, and dissimilar to the laws of this country, that this court should not entertain jurisdiction thereon and attempt to enforce said laws. To pass upon this exception, it is pertinent to inquire to what extent the proper understanding and construction of the laws of the Republic of Mexico are material to the case made in the petition. According to the rule declared in Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. J. R. Co. 31 Minn. 11, 47 Am. Rep. 771, which rule, as we have seen, was approved by the Supreme Court of the United States in Northern P. R. Co. v. Babcock, 154 U. S. 190, 38 L. ed. 958, the law of Mexico is to be looked to to determine whether thereunder an employee of a railroad company, injured by and through the negligence of the company, has a right to recover in a civil action damages for such injury, and, if he has, what is the extent of such right. On this inquiry, we are of opinion that the law of Mexico, instead of being vague and uncertain, is clear and specific. Article 11 of the Mexican Federal Penal Code, and articles 301, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, and 326 of book 2 of the same Code, as pleaded, confer on any person injured by and through the negligence of another a right to recover in a civil proceeding all the actual damages sustained. Article 330 of the same Code provides that masters may be held civilly liable, through their clerks and servants, according to the provisions of articles 326 and 327, for the negligence of said clerks and servants within the scope of their employment. Article 184 of the act of Congress of December 15, 1881, declares that railway companies are liable for all faults or accidents which occur through tardiness, negligence, imprudence, or want of capacity of their employees. Certainly these laws, so clearly defining negligence and the civil rights resulting therefrom, ought not to be rejected as too vague and indefinite to be administered by intelligent courts and judges.

But it is excepted that these laws are dissimilar to the laws of this country (i. e., of Texas), and too dissimilar to be administered by the court. The alleged dissimilarity having such grave results is not pointed out in the exception. The brief of the learned counsel for the defendant in error is but little more specific, and that little by way of argument that the law of Mexico, as pleaded, requires a judicial determination of the infraction of the penal law of Mexico as a condition precedent to a suit for civil damages, and that such criminal proceedings have not been commenced, whereby all pending civil proceedings would be stayed, under article 26 of the transitory law of the Penal Code of Mexico; and, further, that the petition should show, but does not, that the judge who took cognizance of this suit endeavored to procure an agreement of the parties to a compromise of the controversy as required by article 313 of the Mexican Code before proceeding to adjudication hereof. Article 26 of the transitory law (Penal Code) and article 313 of the Penal Code, as pleaded, relate wholly to matters of procedure, and do not affect the right, nor even the remedy. Article 327 of the Penal Code provides that the civil liability shall exist without regard to whether the defendant be absolved or condemned to criminal liability; and article 298 of the act of Congress of December 15, 1881, expressly reserves the right of individuals through indemnity and the liability which the companies may have incurred through criminal acts or omissions committed by them. If, however, it should be conceded that there is dissimilarity between the law of Mexico giving the rights of action and the law of Texas, in which state it is sought to enforce the right, it does not appear that such dissimilarity extends so far as to conflict with the settled public policy of the state of Texas.

"But it by no means follows that, because the statute of one state differs from the law of another state, therefore it would be held contrary to the policy of the laws of the latter state. Every day our courts are enforcing rights under foreign contracts where the lex loci contractus and the lex fori are altogether different, and yet we construe these contracts and enforce rights under them according to their force and effect under the laws of the state where made. To justify a court in refusing to enforce a right of action which accrued under the law of another state, because against the policy of our laws, it must appear that it is against good morals or natural justice, or that, for some other such reason, the enforcement of it would be prejudicial to the general interests of our own citizens. If the state of Iowa sees fit to impose this liability upon those operating railroads within her bounds, and to make it a condition of the employment of those who enter their service, we see nothing in such a law repugnant either to good morals or natural justice, or prejudicial to the interests of our own citizens." Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 81 Minn. 11, 47 Am. Rep. 711. See also Higgins v. Central New England & W. R. Co. 155 Mass. 176.

In Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 670, 36 L. ed. 1128, the supreme court says: "In order to maintain an action for an injury to the person or to movable property, some courts have held that the wrong must be one which would be actionable by the law of the place where the redress is sought, as well as by the law of the place where the wrong was done. See, for example, The Halley, L. R. 2 P. C. 193, 204; Phillips v. Eyre, L. R. 6 Q. B. 1, 28, 29; The M. Morham, L. R. 1 Prob. Div. 107, 111; Wooden v. Western N. Y. & P. R. Co. 126 N. Y. 10, 13 L. R. A. 458; Ash v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 72 Md. 144. But such is not the law of this court. By our law, a private action may be maintained in one state, if not contrary to its own policy, for such a wrong done in another and actionable there, although a like wrong would not be actionable in the state where the suit is brought. Smith v. Condry, 42 U. S. 1 How. 28, 11 L. ed. 85; The China v. Walsh, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 53, 64, 19 L. ed. 67, 71; The Scotland, 105 U. S. 24, 29, 26 L. ed. 1001, 1003; Dennick v. Central R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 489; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Cox, 145 U. S. 593, 36 L. ed. 829."

The second special exception is that the petition does not show any reason why plaintiff did not sue for damages for said injuries in the Republic of Mexico, and this on the ground that the injury sustained by the plaintiff occurred in the Republic of Mexico, and any right of action which he may have is controlled by the laws of said Republic; and it appears that the defendant has, ever since the injury, maintained its line of railroad in said Republic, and continued to possess its property in said Republic. We are familiar with the exception of the pendency of another suit between the same parties on the same cause of action in another court of the same jurisdiction, but this is our first introduction to an exception that the plaintiff cannot maintain a cause of action in a court having jurisdiction ratione personæ and ratione materiæ, because the plaintiff could have instituted his action in some other court that would have had like jurisdiction. It has been conclusively shown that although the injury for which plaintiff sues occurred in the Republic of Mexico, and that his right to recover damages is controlled by the laws of said Republic, yet the plaintiff has a right to sue in the circuit court. That the petition shows that the defendant owns and operates a railroad in the Republic of Mexico does not appear to be a very good reason for the courts of Texas to decline jurisdiction, particularly where the same petition shows that the defendant owns and operates part of the same line of railroad in the state of Texas.

The third special exception is, in substance and effect, that a judgment in favor of plaintiff, awarding him damages for the injuries sustained, would not be a final determination of the rights between the parties, but that thereafter the plaintiff, under the law of Mexico, would have the right to bring suits from time to time, and recover in said suits, if his said injury is continuing or permanent. This exception appears to be based upon article 906 of the Penal Code of Mexico, which is as follows: "Art. 906. The condition required by the two preceding articles, that the damages and injuries should be actual, shall not prevent that the indemnification of subsequent damages and injuries be exacted by a new suit, when they shall have accrued: If they proceed directly from, and as a necessary consequence of, the same act or omission from which resulted the previous damages or injuries."

The purport of this article is that if damages accrue after the first suit, which damages proceeded directly from, and as a necessary consequence of, same negligence, such damages may be made the subject of a second suit; and the article clearly has reference only to damages which accrue after the first suit, and which were not known to exist at the time such suit was brought and determined. It was evidently intended to give a party injured through negligence full actual damages, although not known or contemplated at the time of the first suit. The adjudication under the Mexican law in the first suit is as final as to all injuries known to exist or existing at the time of the suit as is an adjudication in our courts. In this connection the following from the opinion of Chief Justice James in Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Jackson (Tex. Civ. App.) 82 S. W. 234, 235, is directly in point, and we agree with the reasoning and conclusion: "The well-established rule of law is that we are to look to the laws of Mexico for what pertains to the rights of the parties and to our laws and practice for what applies to the remedy. Northern P. R. Co. v. Bobcock, 154 U. S. 190, 38 L. ed. 953; Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 81 Minn. 11, 47 Am. Rep. 771; Knight v. West Jersey R. Co. 108 Pa. 250, 56 Am. Rep. 200. There is no fundamental difference as to the measure of damages. The actual damage the injured party has sustained and will afterwards sustain is sought to be arrived at and redressed in both jurisdictions. The end sought in both countries is compensation. The allowance of a new suit for injuries that develop later demonstrates the purpose of the Mexican law to secure to the injured party his right to complete and actual damages. The case is not like those in which it appears that the foreign law limits the amount of damages recoverable to a certain sum, where it is held that the domestic court will not render judgment in excess of such sum. The limit and standard in both countries is compensation, and the power to reduce the allowance in favor of defendant, and the right to a new suit in favor of plaintiff, for unconsidered damages, are all merely the means of attaining and enforcing actual damages. It is observed that exemplary damages were not asked or allowed in this case. Our opinion on this branch of the case is that the difference in the mode of arriving at and administering the damages is a matter that affects the remedy only, and therefore offers no obstacle to the exercise of jurisdiction by our courts. Story, Conf. L. § 807*d*. It was proper to proceed according to our law practice, as the court did in this instance, in ascertaining the entire damages and awarding execution."

The fourth special exception sustained by the court below is that the petition fails to show that the judge of the circuit court, or any judge having cognizance of the matter, had endeavored to have the amount and terms of the payments for plaintiff's injuries agreed upon between the parties as required of the judges in Mexico under article 318 of the laws of said Republic. We have already held that this article relates merely to procedure, and does not affect the right, nor even the remedy. The procedure provided for in said article 318 is, as we are informed, a practice enjoined in suits on contracts as well as torts, and is derived from the civil law.

The fifth special exception is that according to the laws of Mexico, as pleaded, the plaintiff has no right to recover damages in a civil suit unless he shows that the acts of the defendant which caused the injury constituted a crime under said laws of Mexico; that the recovery in said civil suit is penal in its nature; that the circuit court cannot enforce the penal laws of the Republic of Mexico, and that the laws of said Republic do not sufficiently define what acts are made penal under said laws to enable the court to judge whether or not said acts by which said injury was caused are penal within the meaning of the law, to entitle the plaintiff to any recovery in a civil action therefor. It appears from the laws pleaded that a civil action lies in the courts of Mexico for the negligent wrongs complained of, and although by the laws of Mexico the wrongful acts of the defendant, as alleged in the petition, may constitute a negligent crime, it does not appear that the liability of defendant to the plaintiff for the injuries complained of depends in any way upon the criminal prosecution or conviction of the defendant. Article 327, Mexican Code; articles 194, 298, Act. Cong. December 15, 1891. And see Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 670, 36 L. ed. 1128.

The recovery sought in this case is not penal, but is for the individual benefit of the plaintiff, and inures in no way to the benefit of the public. The court is not asked in this action to enforce any penal law of the Republic of Mexico, but merely to enforce the civil right of the defendant granted by the laws of Mexico, occasioned by an act of negligence such as gives a right of action under the law in any civilized country.

The sixth special exception is that, according to article 328 of the laws of the Republic of Mexico, a recovery may be had, not only for the damages sustained by reason of the injuries complained of, but the judge trying the case may award an extraordinary indemnity any sum that he may determine, considering the social position, etc., of the party injured; and the argument is that the said law is against natural justice, and that to discriminate in favor of or against a litigant according to his social position is against the policy of our law. Counsel for the plaintiff answers this exception as follows:

"There is no law requiring us to sue for extraordinary indemnity, and we have not done so; and the fact that we might have done so in the Republic of Mexico is no reason why we should not sue for, in this country, such damages as are otherwise permissible. . . . The fact that the defendant is sued in a forum where extraordinary damages cannot be recovered is a matter for which he ought to thank heaven, take courage, and say no more about it. He certainly cannot complain. Suppose the law of one country should give exemplary damages under circumstances such as that the laws of our country would not give? Could it be supposed that that was a reason for this court refusing to give such damages as are permissible under our laws? If the law of Mexico giving extraordinary indemnity considering the social position is against natural justice and the policy of our laws, that would be a good reason why the courts of this country should not give extraordinary indemnity. But certainly it is no reason why they should not give ordinary indemnity such as is consistent with natural justice and our policy."

This answer seems to dispose of the sixth exception conclusively.

The seventh special exception reiterates the charge of vagueness and indefiniteness of the Mexican law involved, and is disposed of by what has been said with regard to the first special exception.

To support the ruling of the circuit court sustaining the foregoing special exceptions, the learned counsel for the defendant in error relies solely upon a decision of the supreme court of the state of Texas in Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Jackson, 89 Tex. 107, 31 L. R. A. 276. That was a case in most respects similar to the one under present consideration; differing, however, in one or two important points, which will be hereafter noticed. The first propositions in Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Jackson, 89 Tex. 107, 31 L. R. A. 276, affecting the ruling here, are as follows:

"This is a transitory action and may be maintained in any place where the defendant is found, if there be no reason why the court whose jurisdiction is invoked should not entertain the action. The plaintiff, however, has no legal right to have his redress in our courts; nor is it specially a question of comity between this state and the government of Mexico, but one for the courts of this state to decide, as to whether or not the law, by which the right claimed must be determined, is such that we can properly and intelligently administer it, with due regard to the rights of the parties. Gardner v. Thomas, 14 Johns. 134, 7 Am. Dec. 445; Johnson v. Dalton, 1 Cow. 543, 13 Am. Dec. 564. The decisions of this court (well sustained by high authority) establish the doctrine that the courts of this state will not undertake to adjudicate rights which originated in another state or country, under statutes materially different from the law of this state in relation to the same subject. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. McCormick, 71 Tex. 860, 1 L. R. A. 804; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Richards, 68 Tex. 375. Many difficulties would present themselves in an attempt to determine the meaning of the Mexican law and apply it in giving redress to the parties claiming rights under it. We understand the Mexican courts are not governed by precedent, and we have no access to reports of adjudicated cases of those courts from which we could ascertain their interpretation of these laws."

It is to be noticed that the action was one in a court of the state of Texas brought by a citizen of that state against a foreign corporation, and that the suit before us is one brought in a court of the United States by a citizen of the United States against another citizen of the United States. In the Texas case the right to sue may be affected by comity. In our case the right to sue is specifically granted by the statute, and appears to be absolute. Gardner v. Thomas, and Johnson v. Dalton, cited above, were cases in which one British subject sued another British subject (both sailors) in the state of New York to recover damages for assault and battery committed on board a British ship on the high seas. In Gardner v. Thomas the court admitted jurisdiction, but refused to hear the case on motives of policy. In Johnson v. Dalton the court approved Gardner v. Thomas, but concluded that, as the plaintiff left or abandoned the vessel in the port of New York, the court ought to entertain jurisdiction. These two cases are not very persuasive in determining as to the right of a citizen of Texas to sue in his own court and before his own judge. The Texas cases cited were actions for damages caused by the death of the injured party, where it was held that the courts of Texas will not entertain such actions if founded upon a law which is materially different from the law of that state. The rule declared may be correct and binding on the courts of the state of Texas, but the rule in this regard binding on the courts of the United States is to the contrary, and is found peremptorily declared in Dennick v. Central R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 439. The difficulties which present themselves in determining the meaning of the Mexican law and in applying it to give redress to the parties claiming rights under it, we have already sufficiently considered. As to the Mexican courts not being governed by precedent, and having no reports of adjudicated cases, we concur with what Chief Justice Fly so well says in Mexican C. R. Co. v. Mitten (Tex. Civ. App.) 86 S. W. 232: "Dissimilarity of the laws, however, was not the sole ground upon which the aid of our courts was denied to Jackson, but other, and, to us, novel, reasons were given why the right should be denied; among the number being the difficulties that would beset Texas courts in determining the meaning of Mexican laws. On this point it is said: 'We understand the Mexican courts are not governed by precedent, and we have no access to reports of adjudicated cases of those courts from which we could ascertain their interpretation of these laws.' If it be true that the Mexicans have no precedents, and keep no record of adjudicated cases, it would seem that a Mexican court would be in no better position to follow in the track of the decisions than would an American court, and while 'it is well settled that, if one state undertakes to enforce a law of another state, the interpretation of that law, as fixed by the courts of the other state, is to be followed,' still it does not follow that where the other state has not interpreted its laws, or has failed to record its interpretations, this state should therefore refuse to extend a remedy for a wrong inflicted on a citizen within the borders of such foreign state. In many of the cases in which jurisdiction has been assumed or held to attach in the courts of one state when the wrong was perpetrated in another, the offending party had removed from the latter state; but we have found no case where the fact of removal was made the ground for assuming jurisdiction. Our courts either have jurisdiction of the class of cases we are discussing, or they have not; and the question of whether a man has voluntarily resorted to our courts, or been forced into them, or whether commerce between Mexico and Texas will be injured or protected by compelling the payment by a corporation of damages for the wrongs it has inflicted, or the condition of our dockets, can have no weight or force in determining jurisdiction. These are considerations that might possibly address themselves to the notice of legislatures, but not to the determination of courts. Courts are not at liberty to assume or decline jurisdiction upon speculative grounds, or for reasons of public policy. Percival v. Hickey, 18 Johns. 257, 9 Am. Dec. 210. We are not willing to subscribe to the doctrine that a citizen of Texas who has suffered wrongs, transitory in their nature, in a foreign country, at the hands of one who has his legal domicile in this state, before he can obtain redress at the hands of our courts must show that he has been refused aid in the foreign courts, and make it appear that he comes to the courts of his own country unwillingly and as a last resort. Jurisdiction of a cause should not be made to depend upon any such state of circumstances. If the construction placed upon the decision in the Jackson Case be the true one,—and some of its expressions would seem to justify the construction,—it is a practical denial of remedies for wrongs that may be inflicted by one of our citizens upon another in Mexico, by relegating him to a trial in the courts of a country where the laws are said to be enforced without precedent or authority, and which laws are claimed to be so uncertain and obscure that our courts cannot undertake to construe them. We are not willing to subscribe to such doctrine, and will not extend the scope of the decision referred to beyond the purview of the fact of that case. We hold that the petition showed a cause of action, and that the district court of El Paso county had jurisdiction of the case."

Following the above quoted propositions, the supreme court in the case cited elaborates in regard to the dissimilarity between Mexican law and the law of Texas, and holds that this dissimilarity is sufficient to warrant the courts of Texas in refusing to entertain jurisdiction. The court next finds that another reason for refusing to entertain jurisdiction exists in the fact that the Mexican National Railroad Company owns and operates a railroad in Mexico; and as a matter of comity to the people of Mexico, and as a matter of policy towards the growing commerce between Texas and Mexico, and out of consideration for the overburdened condition of the dockets of the Texas courts, the court holds the Texas courts ought not to entertain suits for negligence brought against railroad companies operating lines in Mexico, where the plaintiff chooses the Texas jurisdiction from convenience, and not from necessity. The petition in the case at bar shows a fact not appearing in the Jackson Case, i. e., that the Mexican National Railroad extends into and is operated in the state of Texas; and that being the case and as the plaintiff has a right to sue in the circuit court, we doubt if the locality of the defendant's railroad, given as sufficient for nonsuiting Jackson in the courts of the state of Texas, is sufficient to nonsuit the present plaintiff in the circuit courts of the United States sitting in Texas. The question of international comity is controlled and decided by international law and custom, and the decisions of local courts are not controlling in the courts of the United States. Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 670, 36 L. ed. 1128; Greaves v. Neal, 57 Fed. Rep. 816. Clearly the opinion and decision of the supreme court of the state of Texas ought not to, and do not, control in the proper decision of the questions here involved. Our lengthy discussion of the case comes from our high appreciation of the acknowledged ability of the judges of that court, and in deference to our learned brother of the circuit court, who appears to have followed the same.

Having considered the important questions presented in this case in the light of the numerous authorities cited by counsel, and many others within our reach, we conclude that neither in reason nor on authority are the special exceptions to the amended original petition well founded.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to overrule the special exceptions, and thereafter proceed in the trial and determination of the case according to law.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

PIONEER SAVINGS & LOAN COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

1. An application for a policy of insurance in Minnesota on property located in Washington which is delivered by the company on a certain day in the latter state will be held to have been before a transfer of the property which took place two days before the policy was delivered, for the purpose of determining the truthfulness of a statement as to the title to the property.
2. A violation of the ordinary stipulation in a mortgage clause on an insurance policy that the mortgagee will notify the insurer of a change of title to the property is not a ground for forfeiture of the policy, but is merely a breach of contract for which an action for damages will lie if the insurer is injured.
3. Change of title by deed from mortgagor to mortgagee in the interval between the application by the mortgagee for insurance on the property and delivery of the policy will not render the insurance void for false description of the property as belonging to the mortgagor if the facts of the existence of the mortgage and the pendency of foreclosure proceedings are stated in the application.
4. A conveyance from the mortgagor to mortgagee prior to the date of the fire, which is not accepted until after that date, will not avoid a policy of insurance on the property for change of title, since the mortgagee may keep his mortgage alive and prevent its merging in the title if it is to his interest to do so.

(June 18, 1897.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Mark F. Mendenhall, for appellant:

The application for insurance being true as to title when made, and defendant's agents rewriting the insurance some time later, with full knowledge of the foreclosure suit, and without making any further inquiries as to the title at the time of rewriting the insurance, the agents' acts bound the defendant; they had full power to approve risks and write and deliver policies, and the burden was on defendant to inquire as to any mutation in the title in the interim between August 14 and August 30, 1893; and defendant is now estopped to deny its liability and take refuge behind the oversight of its agents.

The truth or falsity of the representation as to ownership and title in the land and buildings cannot affect plaintiff's right to recover; the mortgage plaintiff had an insurable interest in the property, wholly independent of the owner, and the courts have been always liberal to protect an insurable interest, although misstated.

Richardson*, 29 Minn. 330; Bell v. Western Marine & F. Ins. Co. 5 Rob. (La.) 428, 89 Am. Dec. 546.

The mortgage clause when attached to the policy forms a distinct and separate contract with the mortgagee, whose interests cannot be jeopardized or invalidated by any acts of the mortgagor. The insurance as to the owner may be absolutely void from the beginning on account of false representations material to the risk, or may become void by subsequent acts of the owner; but the mortgagee cannot be prejudiced as to his security.

Hastings v. Westchester F. Ins. Co. 78 N. Y. 141; Foster v. Equitable Mut. F. Ins. Co. 2 Gray, 216; Syndicate Ins. Co. v. Bohn, 27 U. S. App. 564, 65 Fed. Rep. 165, 37 L. R. A. 614; *Carpenter v. All representations are not material to the risk, and if immaterial they do not avoid the policy. The test is,—the title being represented in an uncertain, shifting condition, or momentarily liable to change, and the insurance company being willing to write its policy on that information, but in fact the title was in plaintiff, the mortgagee, thus increasing its equitable interest to an absolute one,—if this latter state of the title had been disclosed to the insurer, would it have been less willing to write the insurance or have demanded an enhanced premium? Most emphatically, "No," to either question.

Messrs. Graves, Wolf, & Graves, for respondent:

Celinda Newsom was insured from the 80th day of August, 1893, against loss or damages by fire, and there was an express provision in the policy that it should not be valid until countersigned by the agents of the company at Spokane, Washington, and such policy was actually signed and delivered on August 30, and therefore nothing can be considered by the court except as to the condition of the title and the representations made thereof on such date.

McWilliams v. Cascade F. & M. Ins. Co. 7 Wash. 50.

The parties to this policy have asserted that the representations as to the ownership of this property were material; it was only on condition of the ownership being as therein stated that they entered into this contract. The court will never hear evidence as to whether such matters are material or not; it is a question that the parties to the contract have settled by their agreement.

There can be no such thing as a conditional delivery to a grantee. It matters not what parol conditions may be attached to such delivery, when a deed is executed and delivered to a grantee title absolutely passes, and the parol conditions amount to nothing.

Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 815; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. p. 817.

Reavis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action at law to recover on a fire insurance policy. The plaintiff procured a policy of insurance from the defendant against loss by fire, in the amount of $1,500, upon a store building in the town of Post Falls, Idaho. The policy ran directly to Celinda Newsom, and the contract of insurance was for the term of one year from the 80th of August, 1893, at noon, on the 30th of August, 1894, against all direct loss or damage by fire. The application for the insurance was made by the plaintiff as mortgagee of the property owned then by Celinda Newsom and her husband. It contained the stipulation, "Loss, if any, payable to the plaintiff named as mortgagee or trustee, per mortgage clause attached" which mortgage clause contained, among other things, the following provisions: "It is hereby agreed that this insurance, as to the interests of the above-named mortgagee or beneficiary in the trust deed only therein, shall not be invalidated by any act or neglect of the mortgagor or owner of the property insured, nor by the occupancy of the premises for purposes more hazardous than are permitted by the terms of this policy, nor by any change in title or possession, whether by legal process, voluntary transfer, or conveyance of the premises; provided, that the mortgagee or beneficiary shall notify this company of any change of ownership or increase of hazard which shall come to the knowledge of said mortgagee or beneficiary, and shall have permission for such change of ownership or such increased hazard duly indorsed on this policy." On October 1, 1893, the buildings were totally destroyed by fire. Notice was given and tender of proof of loss made by the plaintiff to the defendant within reasonable time thereafter, and claim for payment of loss. Defendant denied all liability under its contract of insurance, and plaintiff began this action. At the trial of the cause, objection was interposed by defendant to the introduction of testimony because the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court sustained this objection, and upon motion of defendant, directed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant, and entered judgment thereon. Previous to the trial a general demurrer had been interposed by defendant to the complaint, and overruled by the court.

It will be observed that the question presented here is upon the sufficiency of the pleadings by the plaintiff. The complaint sets out the corporate capacity of the plaintiff and the defendant, and that Newsom and wife were the owners of the property covered by the policy of insurance, and as such owners executed and delivered a mortgage of $1,800 to the plaintiff, for a valuable consideration, and that the mortgagors agreed to keep the premises insured against loss by fire, and the policy to have a mortgage clause attached, with the loss, if any, payable to plaintiff, and that, in case of failure of the mortgagors to keep up the insurance, then the mortgagee to take out the insurance and pay the premiums, and the mortgage was to be security for the premiums paid; that, for a breach of the conditions of the mortgage, plaintiff commenced a foreclosure suit about the 2d day of August, 1893, in the district court of Kootenai county, Idaho, and immediately served the defendant with summons; that during the pendency of the foreclosure suit, about August 23, 1893, Newsom and wife made, executed, acknowledged, and delivered their deed, thereby intending to convey the mortgaged premises to plaintiff, and at the same time it was expressly understood between defendants Newsom and plaintiff that title should pass to plaintiff only on condition that said title be approved by plaintiff's attorneys, and upon the further condition that the foreclosure suit be dismissed and the mortgage debt satisfied and discharged by plaintiff as against Newsom and wife; that about the 21st of September, 1893, plaintiff's attorneys, on behalf of the plaintiff, filed a motion in the Idaho court to dismiss the foreclosure suit, and the motion to dismiss the suit was heard and order of dismissal thereon entered by the court on the 6th of November, 1893; that, during the pendency of the foreclosure suit in accordance with the provisions of the mortgage, plaintiff, upon the — day of August, 1893, at Minneapolis, Minnesota, applied for and procured from defendant insurance on the premises, and paid the premium of $87.50 therefor; and that defendant, by its agents duly authorized thereto, on August 30, 1893, at Spokane, Washington, made the policy of insurance in writing and insured the premises as the property of Celinda Newsom in the sum of $1,500 against loss by fire. After the demurrer was overruled, defendant answered, in substance, denying information sufficient to form a belief as to the formal matters alleged in the complaint, and affirmatively alleging that at no time prior to the date of the fire did the plaintiff, or Newsom or wife, or any other party, notify defendant of any change of ownership which had come to the knowledge of either of the parties, nor did plaintiff obtain permission for such change of ownership, or obtain permission for the execution of the deed from Newsom and wife to plaintiff, or concerning the approval of the title of the mortgaged premises, or concerning the pendency or dismissal of the foreclosure suit, and that at the time of the fire, and when the policy of insurance was made, plaintiff was the owner in fee simple of the mortgaged premises. The answer further alleges that the policy described in the complaint contained the following covenant: "That said policy should be void if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership, or if the subject of the ownership of the insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple, or if any change other than by the death of the insured should take place in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of the insurance, whether by legal process or judgment, or by voluntary act of the insured or otherwise." Plaintiff replied, denying the absolute sale by Newsom and wife to it on August 28, and also alleging that plaintiff's officers could not notify the defendant of the settlement of the foreclosure suit, and that notice was given of the pendency of the foreclosure; alleging that by reason of the necessary lapse of time in procuring the abstract of title and in approving said title, and the time necessarily consumed by the transmission of the United States mails to and from the city of Minneapolis, plaintiff's officers could not and did not have any notice or knowledge of the foreclosure suit at the time of making application for the policy of insurance, or at the time of the fire; and the plaintiff also alleges that it notified defendant of the pendency of the foreclosure suit, and defendant issued the policy of insurance with full notice and knowledge of the suit. Besides the covenant above mentioned in defendant's answer relative to the ownership of the property, which was in the policy, there was also another stipulation as follows: "If, with the consent of this company, an interest under this policy shall exist in favor of a mortgagee or of any person or corporation having an interest in the subject of insurance other than the interest of the insured as described herein, the conditions hereinbefore contained shall apply in the manner expressed in such provisions and conditions of insurance relating to such insurance as shall be written upon, attached or appended hereto."

1. Plaintiff, under the terms of its mortgage, when the mortgagors had failed to procure insurance for the buildings on the mortgaged premises, applied to defendant, a Minnesota corporation in Minneapolis, for a fire insurance policy, as a mortgagee, and paid the premium at the time of $87.50. The policy was forwarded to be countersigned at the agency of defendant at Spokane, Washington. The allegation of the complaint is that this application was made and the premium paid on the — day of August, 1893. We think it may reasonably be inferred that the premium was paid upon the application made at Minneapolis at least three days before the policy was delivered in Spokane. At the time the application was made Newsom and wife, the mortgagors, were the owners of the premises insured. If, as maintained by the defendant, the presumption exists that plaintiff made a representation of the title in its application for insurance to defendant, then such statement of title was at that time true. In contemplation of both parties, the premises were mortgaged, and a mortgage foreclosure might be made and a change of title occur; and, in such change of title, plaintiff, mortgagee, might become the owner. Indeed, the contract of insurance with the plaintiff, the mortgagee, provided that no change of title or possession, etc., should affect the contract. We believe the rule supported by the better authority is that the contract of insurance with a mortgagee by an insurance company is a separate, distinct contract from that of the owner of the property, and that it is in contemplation between the parties to the contract that a change of title may occur, and that a third person or the mortgagee may become the owner, and that the ordinary stipulation in insurance policies in such contracts, that the mortgagee shall notify the insurance company of a change of title, is one not a substantive part of the contract, for violation of which a forfeiture will lie, but is simply a subsequent breach of the contract, for which damages may lie if the insurance company is injured. Such being the rule, we would have no difficulty in adjudging the defendant liable for the loss, if, after the delivery of the policy, such change of title had occurred, although defendant was without notice of the same. But the change of title in the case at bar evidently occurred in the interval between the application and payment of premium at Minneapolis and the delivery of the policy to the plaintiff at Spokane. May on Insurance (vol. 1, 3d ed. § 276c), discussing foreclosure, says: "If, however, the policy expressly provides that the commencement of foreclosure proceedings shall avoid it, the condition will be enforced. But where an application truly stated that no foreclosure proceedings had been begun, and the policy stipulated that the commencement of any foreclosure proceedings shall immediately render this policy void, and no such proceedings were begun after the policy was issued, but there were such begun between the date of the application and the date of the policy, it was held that the company was bound, and the policy was not forfeited. The insurer must stipulate for the intervening period, if he would cover it." This question has also been directly before the supreme court of Iowa in a case in which the facts are very similar to those in the one now under consideration here. In that case the application for insurance was made February 23, and stated that no proceedings had been commenced to enforce a mortgage on the property, which statement was true at that time. The application also provided that no liability should attach until it should be approved by the company. It was approved and the policy issued March 3. The policy provided that the commencement of foreclosure proceedings against the property should render it void. Foreclosure proceedings were in fact begun between the dates of the application and the issuance of the policy, and the court held that the policy was not void because of such foreclosure proceedings. The court said: "Upon the 3d of March it relied upon what the insured said about the property on the 23d of February. The company knew that the condition of the property was liable to change in the interval, and employed no means to inform itself. We think it took its own risk in regard to such change. When it issued its policy on the 3d day of March, it seems to us that it undertook to insure the property as it then was. We do not think that the policy can be understood as meaning that foreclosure proceedings commenced before that time would render the policy void. No one can read the provision against the commencement of foreclosure proceedings without being impressed that it was designed to provide merely for the future." Day v. Hawkeye Ins. Co. 72 Iowa, 597. This court, in the case of Dooly v. Hanover F. Ins. Co. 16 Wash. 155, held that a policy of insurance containing a stipulation similar to the one in the case at bar, that if the ownership was not sole, unconditional ownership in fee, it was void, and where at the time the policy was written and delivered the insured was not such owner, and where the insurance company had no knowledge of the title, and no false representations had been made by the insured, was not vitiated. In effect, it was decided that the insurance company must inquire or inform itself about the title, or else it will not be material. In the policy before us, as usual in fire insurance policies, there are numerous printed stipulations in large and small type, and that they are not always closely noticed by either the insurer or the insured is obvious from a reading of this policy. The stipulation that exists in the printed portion of this policy, "or if any change other than by the death of the insured should take place in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of the insurance, whether by legal process or judgment, or by voluntary act of the insured or otherwise," was not eliminated by the defendant or its agents when they delivered the policy, yet it is absolutely inconsistent with the contract which it specially made with the plaintiff as mortgagee, and which was attached to the policy, the latter contract stipulating that such changes should not vitiate the policy. This illustration is mentioned that it may be seen, when the strictness of a forfeiture is claimed by the insurance company because of a stipulation perhaps first noticed by the insured after loss, it will be closely scrutinized before forfeiture is declared. Nothing will be inferred in favor of the forfeiture.

2. But another phase of the contention for a forfeiture of the contract by the defendant may here be examined. It is true that the execution and delivery of a deed by grantor to grantee estops the grantor from afterwards setting up a conditional delivery, or qualifying it in any way. This rule has its reason, which is that in so important a matter as the conveyance of title to real estate the door for the introduction of parol testimony to contradict the delivery of a deed when once made will not be opened. But this estoppel upon the grantor does not always conclude the grantee. The plaintiff here was the mortgagee. It did not agree to, and did not in fact, dismiss the foreclosure proceeding or satisfy the mortgage until after the loss occurred by fire. The rule is that a mortgagee taking a conveyance of the fee by a deed does not always and necessarily merge the mortgage in the title, but, on the contrary, if it is to the interest of the mortgagee to still maintain the mortgage, he may do so. It would be but an ordinary precaution, when a deed was tendered by the mortgagor, to examine the title before acceptance of the deed. There might be intervening encumbrances which would make it necessary to maintain the mortgage intact, and conclude a foreclosure, and derive title through a judicial sale, rather than to retain the ownership by deed from the mortgagor. Evidently here it was to the interest of the plaintiff to maintain its mortgage after the loss by fire occurred, and it did so for some time; and, if it were in any sense a mortgagee when the loss occurred, the liability of the defendant was at that date fixed, because its contract is to pay such loss as the mortgagee sustained and as its interest appeared. The defendant seems to have retained the $67.50, and refused to pay the loss under its contract of insurance.

In conformity to the views heretofore expressed, the judgment of the Superior Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Wilson E. PALMER, Respnt.,

v.

Seymour VAN SANTVOORD et al., Receivers, etc., of Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Machine Company, Appts.

(158 N. Y. 612.)

A person employed at a salary of $100 per month by a mowing machine company to go from place to place and fix and set up machines and unpack and repack them when necessary, as well as to sell or solicit sales, is an employee, within the meaning of Laws 1885, chap. 376, giving a preference to claims of wages of "employees, operatives, and laborers" of corporations.

(Bartlett J., dissent.)

(October 5, 1897.)

A PPEAL by defendants from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming an order of a Special Term for Rensselaer County directing defendants to pay a claim of petitioner for wages out of funds in their possession. Affirmed.

Statement by Andrews, Ch. J.:

The respondent was employed by the Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Machine Company, a domestic corporation, prior to the appointment of the appellants as its receivers. The nature of his employment is stated in the case as follows: Wilson E. Palmer "was employed by the said Walter A. Wood Company to set up machines and to take them down, and to fix the same when out of repair; to go from place to place and fix and set up the machines of said company for farmers to whom the machines had been sold; to unpack the machines, and to repack them and ship same to company when necessary; also to sell or solicit sales of the machines of said corporation,—and did, in the discharge of his duties as the employee, operative, and laborer of said company, sell machines for them, and that as such operative, employee, and laborer he set up and repaired machines for said company while in their employ as aforesaid, going from place to place so to do, took the machines from the railroad, unpacked same, bolted together and screwed together the same, and did all necessary work to make said machines work, bolting them together and fitting them so they would work, and that he performed manual labor as well as the labor of selling machines, and obeyed and carried out the instructions, orders, and directions given to him by said corporation through its officers and servants." His compensation was $100 per month. The question submitted is whether he was an "employee, operative, or laborer," and his claim for wages against said company entitled to a preference under the provisions of chapter 376, Laws 1885, which enacts that "where a receiver of a corporation created or organized under the laws of this state and doing business therein, other than insurance and moneyed corporations, shall be appointed, the wages of the employees, operatives, and laborers thereof shall be preferred to every other debt or claim against such corporation, and shall be paid by the receiver from the moneys of such corporation which shall first come to his hands."

Mr. G. B. Wellington, for appellants:

The respondent was not an employee, operative, or laborer within the meaning of that act. People v. Remington, 45 Hun, 329, affirmed 109 N. Y. 631.

In cases of statute liability created against stockholders, such statutes are always strictly construed.

Where stockholders were made liable for all debts that may be due and owing to their laborers, servants, and apprentices for services performed for such corporation, it was held that the services referred to are manual or menial services.

Wakefield v. Fargo, 90 N. Y. 217; Short v. Medberry, 29 Hun, 89.

A clerk in the mayor's office, and other employees of the city, are not within the terms of chapter 368 of the Laws of 1890.

People v. Buffalo, 57 Hun, 577; Gurney v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 367.

Mr. Amasa J. Parker, for respondent:

There is no reason why any person who comes within the terms of the statute should be excluded from its beneficent protection. The statutes prescribe no distinction between different classes of employees, and the person employed to keep the books labors with his hands, and contributes no more skill or experience than many skilled laborers.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The work which the claimant was employed to perform was in part the work of a mechanic, and in part that of an agent for the sale of machines manufactured by the corporation. His duties involved both the performance of manual labor, and the exercise of tact and skill as a sales agent of the company. He was while acting in either capacity an employee of the company, within the general and etymological meaning of the word. The word is defined in the Century Dictionary as "one who works for an employer; a person working for salary or wages; applied to anyone so working, but usually only to clerks, workmen, laborers, etc., and but rarely to the higher officers of a government or corporation, or to domestic servants." It is insisted, however, on the part of the receivers, that he was not an "employee, operative, or laborer," within the meaning of the statute of 1885. It must be conceded that the word "employees" was not used in the statute in its broadest sense. This as well by reason of the words "operatives and laborers," with which it is associated, as of the decisions upon this and cognate statutes. If the legislature intended by the act of 1885 to prefer all debts owing by a corporation (other than an insurance or moneyed corporation), of which a receiver should be appointed, to "employees," using the word in its largest sense, the words "operatives and laborers," with which it is associated, are superfluous. The use of these associated words indicates that the word "employees," by which they are preceded, was used in a restricted and limited sense, and was not intended to comprehend all who were employed by the corporation, irrespective of the nature of their service and the relation which they held to the company. This restricted meaning was given to the word in the learned and able opinion of Judge Follett in the case of People v. Remington, 45 Hun, 329, which was affirmed by this court upon his opinion. 109 N. Y. 631. The case of People v. Remington arose under the statute of 1885, the same statute involved in the present case; and it was there decided that neither the superintendent of a corporation employed at an annual salary, nor an attorney employed to render professional services for the corporation, nor a foreign agent for the sale of the goods of the corporation in China, who was to receive a commission on sales made by him in addition to an annual salary of $2,000 were "employees," within the statute, and that their earnings were not "wages of employees" entitled to preferential payment. In construing the 18th section of the general manufacturing corporation act, which imposes liability upon stockholders in corporations for debts owing to "laborers, servants, or apprentices," the courts have confined its application to persons occupying subordinate positions, and have excluded from its protection the officers and managers of corporations, on the ground that they were not laborers or servants, within the meaning of the act. Coffin v. Reynolds, 87 N. Y. 640; Dean v. De Wolf, 82 N. Y. 626; Hill v. Spencer, 61 N. Y. 274; Wakefield v. Fargo, 90 N. Y. 218.

We must assume (under the case of People v. Remington) that the words "employees," in the act of 1885, is not to be accorded its widest lexicographical meaning; and it is difficult, if not impracticable, to define with precision the line of separation. The intention of the lawgiver is to be sought first in the words of a statute, and if they are obscure, in the occasion of the enactment and in the policy which dictated it, when that can be legitimately ascertained. Prior or contemporaneous legislation on the same general subject may be resorted to in aid of the interpretation, but not to control the clear language of subsequent statutes. Words are not to be rejected as superfluous when it is practicable to give to each a distinct and consistent meaning. "The good expositor," says Lord Coke, "makes every sentence have its operation to suppress all the mischiefs. He gives effect to every word of the statute."

He does not construe it so that anything should be vain and superfluous, nor yet make exposition against express words, but so expounds it that one part may stand agreeable with the other, and all may stand together." Coke Rep. pt. 8, 810. There is much difficulty in giving full force to the word of Lord Coke in the construction of many modern statutes, in view of the diffuseness and inaccuracy of the language used, but they furnish a useful guide, and suggest a needed caution. When the words of the statute do not perfectly express the intention, they are to have a rational interpretation, to be collected from the words and the policy which may be reasonably supposed to have dictated the enactment; and the interpretation may be rigorous or liberal, depending upon the interests with which it deals. Ruth. Inst. p. 104. "Except," says Bronson, J., in Waller v. Harris, 20 Wend. 561, 32 Am. Dec. 590, "in relation to a few old statutes which were long since overwhelmed by commentaries and decisions, the current of authority at the present day is in favor of reading statutes according to the natural and most obvious import of the language without resorting to subtle and forced constructions for the purpose of either limiting or extending their operation." The word "employees" in the statute of 1885 is a word of larger import than the words "operatives and laborers," which follow it. Gurney v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 859. And, while it may embrace the latter classes, it is not confined to those who perform manual labor only; and to construe it in the narrowest sense, as embracing those classes only, would violate one of the accepted canons of construction to which we have referred,—that each word used in an enumeration in a statute of several classes or things is presumed to have been used to express a distinct and different idea. It is doubtless true that, from the lack of technical accuracy and precision in the framing of statutes, a word of large import is often followed by words of narrower meaning, expressing what is included in the larger term, but this does not justify a restriction of the scope and meaning of the larger term to what is expressed in the words which follow, unless the context points to such a construction. A larger word interjected between words of limited meaning in an enumeration of persons or things may furnish a reason for confining the broader term to persons or things of the same relative kind and importance as in the preceding and subsequent words, because the larger term would naturally be the first to be used if it was intended to have a broader sense than those with which it is associated. Wakefield v. Fargo, 90 N. Y. 218. The principle that particulars are naturally mentioned in the order of their importance, and that larger particulars are not to be deprived of meaning by subsequent enumeration of things which may be included in the primary word, does not apply to general words following particular ones, for there the rule is to construe them as applicable to persons or things ejusdem generis. Sandiman v. Breach, 7 Barn. & C. 96; People v. New York & M. B. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 565. An early example of this construction is found in 2 Coke Rep. 46, where it was held that a statute treating of "deans, prebendaries, parsons, vicars, and others having spiritual jurisdiction," did not extend to bishops. But this rule is not without exception. The statute of Marlbridge (chap. 19) makes provision "touching essoignes in counties, hundreds, or in courts baron or in other courts of record, and it was held to extend to the King's courts of record at Westminster; for otherwise the general words would be void, for there were no lower courts than those specified. 2 Inst. 18d.

The contention that the word "employees," in the statute of 1885, should be confined in meaning to persons occupying a strictly subordinate position, as day laborers and the like, is urged in part upon the view that the statute was intended to protect that class of laborers only who, as a rule, are dependent upon their daily wages for subsistence, and who enter upon their employment with no view of giving credit to the corporation for their wages, and, expecting prompt payment, had no occasion to rely on its credit or solvency. The courts have given a strict construction to acts imposing liability upon stockholders in corporations for debts owing to "laborers, servants, and apprentices." The rule of strict construction has been applied to those acts upon the ground stated by Chief Justice Shaw in Gray v. Coffin, 9 Cush. 199: "To create any individual liability of members for the debt of a corporation, a body politic, created by law, and regarded as a legal being, distinct from that of all the members composing it, and capable of contracting and being contracted with as a person, is a wide departure from established rules of law, founded in considerations of public policy, and depending solely upon provisions of positive law. It [the statute] is therefore to be construed strictly, and not extended beyond the limits to which it is plainly carried by such provisions of statute." Cited in Chase v. Lord, 77 N. Y. 1. See also Church, Ch. J., Gurney v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 358. It may perhaps be doubted whether the principle of strict construction has not been carried too far in some of the cases exempting stockholders from liability under the manufacturing corporations act of 1848. But the act of 1885 proceeds, we think, upon a broader policy, as to the persons to be protected, than has been attributed to the acts imposing liability upon stockholders. The act deals with the distribution of the assets of insolvent corporations, or corporations in the hands of receivers. The purpose of the act is that the debts of the corporation for the wages of employees, including in the designation all who in common understanding held that relation to the corporation, should be the first charge on the assets, and that business debts should be postponed thereto. The act of 1885, in this respect, was supplementary to, and in pari materia with, the act (chapter 828 of the Laws of 1884) which amended the general act of 1877, regulating general assignments by insolvent debtors so as to provide "that in all assignments made in pursuance of this act the wages and salaries actually owing to the employees of the assignees or assignors shall be preferred before any other debts." Formerly incorporated companies in this state were by statute disabled from making a general assignment in contemplation of insolvency. Sibell v. Remsen, 38 N. Y. 95. Whether this rule has 88 L. R. A.

not been changed by recent legislation may admit of question. See § 27 of the assignment act of 1877; stock corporation law, as amended by chapter 688, Laws 1892, § 48. But at least the amended act of 1884 covered the case of insolvent assignments by natural persons, and prescribed that debts due to employees of the assignor should be preferred. The act of 1885, now in question, enacted substantially the same rule of preference in case of domestic corporations in the hands of a receiver,—a situation generally due to insolvency. In People v. Remington the claims of the superintendent, of the attorney, and of an agent, for the general management of the foreign business of the corporation in China, to a preference under the act of 1885, were disallowed on the ground that they were not "employees," within the common acceptance and meaning of the word. The superintendent was substantially an officer. The attorney was engaged in an independent business, and his debt arose in the prosecution of that business. The case of the foreign agent is the one which might admit of a difference of opinion. The mere fact of the employment being such as might be designated an agency would not alone, we conceive, take the case out of the protection of the act. Bookkeepers or persons employed to make sales of merchandise or of property manufactured by the corporation are, we think, "employees," within the meaning of the act, and their compensation earned is "wages," whether such persons are employed by the day or month or year, and whether the compensation is denominated "salary" or "wages" in the contract of employment.

We think the order below was correct, and it should therefore be affirmed.

O'Brien, Haight, Martin, and Vann, JJ., concur. Gray, J., absent.

Bartlett, J., dissenting:

This case involves the intention and policy of the legislature when it sought to prefer "the wages of the employees, operatives, and laborers" of insolvent corporations (Laws 1885, chap. 376). If the word "employee" is to be treated as the correlative of "employer," absolutely and without restriction, it then follows that the words "operatives and laborers" in the statute are mere surplusage, and every person employed by a corporation on a salary is preferred. In construing a statute, force must be given to all its provisions if possible. In the case at bar the use of the word "wages" is significant and restrictive, and excludes fixed salaries which are not properly described as wages. Furthermore, some effect must be given to the words "operatives and laborers," which follow the word "employees" in the statute. I think they qualify the latter word, and, taken in connection with the word "wages," limit its general meaning. It is not every employee, in the broad, general sense, who is preferred; but the employee, operative, or laborer who receives wages as such, whose services are menial or manual, and who depends upon his daily wage for present support. In the case before us the employee received compensation at the rate of $100 a month from a mowing-machine company. It was his duty to go from place to place and sell or solicit sales of machines, to take them down, fix, and set them up for the purchasers. I am of opinion claimant was a traveling salesman on a salary, and only performed such duties as are common in the sale of machines or instruments of complicated design. This monthly salary is no more wages, as it seems to me, than the salary and commissions of the salesmen sent to China by E. Remington & Sons. People v. Remington, 45 Hun, 829, 842. Affirmed on opinion of the general term, 109 N. Y. 681.

The order appealed from should be reversed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SECOND CIRCUIT.

George F. UNDERHILL, Plff. in Err.,
v.

José Manuel HERNANDEZ.

(26 U. S. App. 573, 65 Fed. Rep. 577.)

1. The acts of a commander of revolutionary forces in charge of a captured city of another country, causing injury by assault and false imprisonment to a citizen of the United States, does not render him liable in a civil action in the United States,—at least after the revolutionary government has been established and recognized by the United States government, even if the acts complained of were performed before the revolution became successful.
2. The expression of an erroneous opinion will not require the reversal of a decision which makes a proper disposition of the case.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of New York to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for assault and false imprisonment alleged to have been committed by defendant on plaintiff. Affirmed.

Before Wallace, Lacombe, and Shipman, Circuit Judges.

The facts are restated in the opinion.

Mr. Salter S. Clark, with Messrs. Logan, Demond, & Harley, for plaintiff in error:

Under the civil law of Venezuela there is a civil action against the defendant for damages for imprisonment or violence to the person corresponding to our actions of false imprisonment or assault and battery.

Hernandez could have been sued civilly on this cause of action in Venezuela. Torts follow the person, and can be sued upon wherever the defendant may be found.

Hernandez's treatment of Underhill was malicious and unnecessary, and so not within any military right.

The existence of civil war in Venezuela in 1892 was never recognized by our government. Therefore our courts must consider the ancient state of things as continuing, and Hernandez a private party, without any right of war.

The recognition or nonrecognition of a state of civil war in a foreign country is for the executive department, and until the executive has acted the courts must decide on the basis of the old state of things.

Where a military force, in the prosecution of a war, gains and holds possession of a part of the territory of a state, such territory is necessarily governed by the person in command of the force having possession, and his government is recognized by public law as a government de facto, to which all the inhabitants of the district owe obedience.

Ford v. Surget, 97 U. S. 594, 24 L. ed. 1018.

Wallace, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error by George F. Underhill, the plaintiff in the court below, to review a judgment for José Manuel Hernandez, the defendant, entered upon the verdict of a jury pursuant to the direction of the trial judge. The suit was for false imprisonment and assault and battery of the plaintiff, committed by the defendant at the city of Bolivar, Venezuela. The acts complained of consisted in the detention of the plaintiff at his own residence in the city of Bolivar under a guard of soldiers stationed near the house, from August 13, to October 18, 1892, by the authority of the defendant, during which time the plaintiff was not permitted to leave the house without an escort of soldiers, and was several times refused a passport to leave the city, for which he made application to the defendant. During this period the defendant was in command of the city as a military officer. A revolution had been organized against the government of Venezuela, and an army had been mustered against the adherents of the recent president, whose term of office had expired, and who, it was claimed by the revolutionists, no longer represented the legitimate government. The principal parties to this conflict were those who recognized Palacio as their chief and those who followed the leadership of Crespo. The defendant belonged to the revolutionary party, and commanded its forces in the vicinity of Bolivar. Early in August an engagement took place between the forces of the two parties near Bolivar; the revolutionists prevailed, and on August 18 the defendant entered Bolivar at the head of his forces and assumed command of the city. From that time until the plaintiff was permitted to leave Bolivar the defendant was the civil and military chief. Early in October the revolutionary party prevailed generally, and took possession of the capital of Venezuela; and on the 26th day of October, 1892, the Crespo government, so called, was formally recognized as the legitimate government of Venezuela by the government of the United States, pursuant to instructions from the state department to our minister to recognize the new government provided it was "accepted by the people, in the possession of the power of the nation, and fully established." Foreign Relations of U. S. 1892, p. 635.

The plaintiff was a citizen of the United States, who had constructed a waterworks system for the city of Bolivar under a contract with the government, and was engaged in supplying the place with water. He also carried on a machinery repair business. The evidence upon the trial indicated that the purpose of the defendant in his treatment of the plaintiff was to coerce the plaintiff to operate his waterworks and his repair works for the benefit of the community and the revolutionary forces; it was not sufficient to have warranted a finding by the jury that the defendant was actuated by malice or any personal or private motive. The trial judge ruled at the request of the defendant that upon these facts the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and directed a verdict for the defendant against the exceptions of the plaintiff.

The important question presented by the assignment of error arises upon the exception to the direction of a verdict for the defendant. This ruling proceeded upon the ground that because the acts of the defendant were those of a military commander, representing a de facto government in the prosecution of a war, he was not civilly responsible therefor.

Considerations of comity, and of the highest expediency, require that the conduct of states, whether in transactions with other states or with individuals, their own citizens or foreign citizens, should not be called in question by the legal tribunals of another jurisdiction. The citizens of a state have an adequate redress for any grievances at its hands by an appeal to the courts or the other departments of their own governments. Foreign citizens can rely upon the intervention of their respective governments to redress their wrongs, even by a resort, if necessary, to the arbitrament of war. It would be not only offensive and unnecessary, but it would imperil the amicable relations between governments and vex the peace of nations to permit the sovereign acts or political transactions of states to be subjected to the examination of the legal tribunals of other states. Influenced by these reasons, and because the acts of the official representatives of the state are those of the state itself, when exercised within the scope of their delegated powers, courts and publicists have recognized the immunity of public agents from suits brought in foreign tribunals for acts done within their own states in the exercise of the sovereignty thereof. In Moodalay v. Morton (1 Bro. Ch. 469) the master of the rolls, while retaining jurisdiction of a suit which involved the private transactions of the East India Company, said: "They have rights as a sovereign power, they have also duties as individuals; if they enter into bonds in India, the sums secured may be recovered here. . . . I admit that no suit will lie in this court against a sovereign power for anything done in that capacity."

In Nabob Arcot v. East India Co. (4 Bro. Ch. 180) the answer to a bill in equity alleged that all the transactions mentioned in the bill were of a political nature and matters of state, and the court dismissed the suit on that ground. In Duke of Brunswick v. King of Hanover, 6 Beav. 1, the master of the rolls concluded an elaborate discussion of the liability of the defendant to a suit in chancery with the opinion that the King of Hanover, although a subject of Great Britain, was exempt from all liability to be sued in the courts of that country for any acts done by him as King of Hanover. Upon an appeal from his judgment dismissing the cause to the House of Lords (2 H. L. Cas. 1), that tribunal decided that the defendant, notwithstanding he was a British subject and was in England exercising his rights as such when sued, could not be made to account to the court of chancery for acts of state, whether right or wrong, done by him abroad in virtue of his authority as sovereign. The decision was put, not upon the personal immunity of the sovereign from suit, but upon the principle that no court in England could sit in judgment upon the act of a sovereign effected by virtue of his sovereign authority abroad. The Lord Chancellor said that "a foreign sovereign coming into this country cannot be made responsible here for an act done in his sovereign character in his own country;" and that "the courts of this country cannot sit in judgment upon an act of a sovereign effected by virtue of his sovereign authority abroad, an act not done as a British subject, but supposed to be done in the exercise of his authority vested in him as sovereign." In Hatch v. Baez, 7 Hun, 596, the New York supreme court decided that an action could not be maintained in the courts of the state against the former president of the Dominican Republic for acts done by him in his official capacity, although he had ceased to be president when the suit was brought. The court said: "We think that by the universal comity of nations and the established rules of international law, the courts of one country are bound to abstain from sitting in judgment on the acts of another government done within its own territory. . . . To make him amenable to a foreign jurisdiction for such acts would be a direct assault upon the sovereignty and independence of his country. . . . The fact that the defendant has ceased to be president of St. Domingo does not destroy his immunity. That springs from the capacity in which the acts were done, and protects the individual who did them, because they emanated from a foreign and friendly government."

The law officers of the United States have uniformly advised the executive department that individuals are not answerable in foreign tribunals for acts done in their own country in behalf of their government by virtue of their official authority.

In 1794 one Collet, lately the French governor of Guadeloupe, was arrested in this country in an action brought against him for the seizure and condemnation of a vessel. The matter having been brought to the attention of our government, it was referred to the Attorney General, and he advised that, the defendant being subject to process, the government could not then intervene, but added his opinion that if the seizure of the vessel were admitted to have been an official act, done by the defendant by virtue or under color of the powers vested in him as governor, it would of itself be a sufficient answer to the plaintiffs' action; and that the defendant ought not to answer in our courts for any mere irregularity in the exercise of his powers, and that the extent of his authority can, with propriety or convenience, be determined only by the constituted authorities of his own nation. Suits against Foreigners, 1 Ops. Atty. Gen. 45, 46. In 1797, in the Case of Sinclair, the Attorney General expressed the opinion "that a person acting under a commission from the sovereign of a foreign state is not amenable for what he does, in pursuance of his commission, to any tribunal of the United States." Actions against Foreigners, 1 Ops. Atty. Gen. 81. In 1871, in the Case of the Pacific Steamship Company, the Attorney General advised the Secretary of State as follows: "It has often been laid down that before a citizen of one country is entitled to the aid of his government in obtaining redress for wrongs done him by another government, he must have sought redress in vain from the tribunals of the offending power. The object of this rule plainly is to give the offending government an opportunity of doing justice to the injured party in its own regular way, and thus avoiding all occasion for international discussion." New Granadian Passenger-Tax, 13 Ops. Atty. Gen. 547, 550. In 1872, in the case of The Tipitapa, the Attorney General advised the Secretary of State in a case where an officer with a party of armed men, acting under an order of the judicial officer of the port of Granada, had seized an American vessel at that port, the seizure having been made for the purpose of enforcing a supposed legal right, "that this government ought not to make reclamation in behalf of the owner, as it is presumable that, if the proceedings were illegal, the judicial tribunals of Nicaragua would afford redress." 18 Ops. Atty. Gen. 554.

Conspicuous among the acts which are sheltered by this principle of international law are those of military officers in command of the armed forces of the state. According to one of the most recent commentators upon international law (Hall, International Law, § 102), officers in command of armed forces of the state, and their subordinates and soldiers, are not, in any case, amenable to the civil or criminal laws of a foreign state in respect to acts done in their capacity as agents for which they would be punishable or civilly responsible if done in their private capacity. This doctrine was sanctioned by our own government, in 1841, in the case of McLeod, who was under indictment for murder in a state court of New York. He had been engaged as a member of the colonial forces in repelling an attack made upon Canada by an armed force of the United States, and had assisted in the destruction of a vessel moored on the American shore of the Niagara river, during which an American citizen was killed. The British government, through its minister at Washington, demanded his release upon the ground that the destruction of the vessel was a public act of persons in her Majesty's service obeying order of the superior authorities, and, therefore, according to the usages of nations, could only be the subject of discussion between the two governments. Mr. Webster, then Secretary of State, acceded to this view, stating that "the government of the United States entertains no doubt that, after the avowal of the transaction as a public transaction, authorized by the British authorities, the individuals concerned in it ought not, by the principles of public law and the general usage of civilized states, to be held personally responsible in the ordinary tribunals of law for their participation in it." [Webster's Works, vol. 5, p. 126 (Little, Brown, & Co. ed. 1890).] The courts of New York refused to release McLeod at the intervention of the general government, and he was tried, but acquitted on proof of an alibi. The episode led to the enactment by Congress, on August 29, 1843 (5 Stat. at L. 539, chap. 257, § 1) of the provision, now § 753, United States Revised Statutes, by which the courts of the United States are authorized to issue a writ of habeas corpus where a person "being a subject or citizen of a foreign state, and domiciled therein . . . or in custody . . . for . . . any act done or omitted under any alleged right, title, authority, privilege, protection, or exemption, . . . claimed under the commission, or order, or sanction, of any foreign state. . . . or under color thereof . . . the validity and effect whereof depend upon the law of nations."

Upon principle it cannot be important whether the acts of military authorities, when called in question, are done by the authority of a de jure or titular or of a de facto government. In either case if they are done in the legitimate exercise of belligerent powers, they are not ordinarily attended with civil responsibility. This principle has been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States in cases in which the civil liability of confederate soldiers for acts done as members of the insurgent forces during the Rebellion was under consideration. Ford v. Surpet, 97 U. S. 594, 24 L. ed. 1018; Freeland v. Williams, 131 U. S. 465, 33 L. ed. 198.

As was decided in Williams v. Bruffy, 96 U. S. 176, 24 L. ed. 716, the government of the confederate states was a de facto government of an inferior class. "It never represented the nation; it never expelled the public authorities from the country, it never entered into any treaties, nor was it ever recognized as that of an independent power."

Ford v. Surget was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover the value of certain cotton destroyed during the war of the Rebellion in the state of Mississippi; and the court held that the defense that it was destroyed by the defendant acting under the orders of the military authorities of the confederate states was a good justification. Freeland v. Williams was a bill in equity to invalidate a judgment of the court of the state of West Virginia obtained against the defendant for a tort committed by him as a soldier of the confederate army. One of the questions discussed was whether the judgment was void inasmuch as it proceeded upon the ground that the defendant was civilly responsible as a trespasser for an act done by him as a confederate soldier in accordance with the usages of civilized war. In the prevailing opinion the court said: "The case as it is now presented to us shows that the trespass for which the original judgment was rendered was of that character, and it is argued with much force that the court which rendered that judgment had no jurisdiction of the case, or, at all events, had no jurisdiction to render such a judgment, and that it is therefore void. It follows from this view on the subject that the court in which it was originally rendered had jurisdiction to set it aside or annul it without the aid of the constitutional provision of the state of West Virginia, and that, on that ground alone, the decree we are called upon to review must be affirmed. In this view of the subject some of the judges of this court concur. Again the court says: 'If it be true that, when the original action was presented to the circuit court of Preston county, the thing complained of was found to be an act in accordance with the usages of civilized war, during the existence of a war flagrant in that part of the country, that court should have proceeded no further, and its subsequent proceedings may be held to have been without authority of law. While it is not necessary to hold that the judgment as presented by the record is absolutely void, it may be conceded that a court of equity in a proper case can prevent the enforcement of it.' In a dissenting opinion Mr. Justice Harlan insisted that the judgment was not void but conceded that the complainant was not civilly responsible if his act was one of legitimate warfare as a soldier in the confederate army.

The acts of the defendant as a military commander of the revolutionary forces in the civil war in Venezuela, although performed before the revolution became successful, are sheltered by the same immunities that would surround them if they had been performed subsequently. The organization of which he was a part represented that kind of a de facto government, which is described in Williams v. Bruffy, p. 186, "such as exists where a portion of the inhabitants of a country have separated themselves from the parent state and established an independent government. The validity of acts, both against the parent state and its citizens or subjects, depends entirely upon its ultimate success. If it fail to establish itself permanently, all such acts perish with it. If it succeed and become recognized, its acts from the commencement of its existence are upheld as those of an independent nation." By its success the revolutionary party vindicated its claim to recognition as the legitimate government of Venezuela, and achieved a justification in the estimation of foreign governments and their legal tribunals for the acts of its military forces as complete and ample as though those forces had been employed by any sovereign power. After the recognition of the new government by the United States, the courts of this country must accord to those who throughout the progress of the civil war acted as the agents of the people of Venezuela, the position of official representatives of the state. The act of recognition by our government neither added to nor detracted from the responsibility of the people of Venezuela for any prior injuries which citizens of the United States may have suffered on her soil from the hands of her de facto authorities, but these responsibilities, in our judgment, are to be adjudicated by the two governments by international action, according to the principles of international law applicable to such cases.

For these reasons we conclude that the acts of the defendant were the acts of the government of Venezuela and as such are not properly the subject of adjudication in the courts of another government.

The various requests made to the court on behalf of the plaintiff for instructions to the jury either involve propositions of law, which, according to views we have expressed, were properly refused, or propositions for the submission of questions of fact, as to which there was no conflict of evidence, and which, therefore, the trial judge was not required to submit to the jury. If the trial judge, in directing a verdict for the defendant, enunciated a rule which to its full extent may not obtain, because it implies that the defendant would not be civilly responsible, even in a court of Venezuela, for any act done by him as a military commander, his disposition of the case was nevertheless proper, and the result is not affected by his expression of an erroneous opinion.

The judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Peter CAMPBELL et al., Appts.,

v.

Amalie COON, Resp't.

(149 N. Y. 554.)

1. That a contract for materials to be delivered "at and for" a building in New York was made and payable in another state does not prevent the materialman from obtaining a lien therefor, under N. Y. Laws 1885, chap. 342, providing that "any person" may have a lien who has furnished any materials which have been used in the erection of any building within the state.

2. A lien for materials furnished to the principal contractor who abandons the contract, filed before the owner assumes to complete the work in accordance with a provision of the contract, attaches after the completion to the extent of the difference between the cost of completion and the amount unpaid when the lien was filed.

3. An architect's certificate that a building has been actually completed, provided for in the building contract, need not be obtained by

NOTE.—Mechanic's lien under contract made or performed in another state.

CAMPBELL v. COON is in line with the great weight of authority upon this question. In fact, the cases are practically unanimous that the mere fact that the contract was made in another state does not prevent the lien from attaching. The only conflict is in cases where the title had passed in the other state and the material was brought into the state where the lien is claimed by the owner of the building or his representative.

Although in the lower court it was held that the right to the lien did not exist, upon the ground that the contract was to be performed in the foreign state so that the title to the materials would there pass out of the vendor. Campbell v. Coon, 8 Misc. 284.

Immaterial where contract is made.

The fact that the contract is made out of the state does not defeat the lien.

In case of a contract between nonresidents that one of them shall come into the state and do work on property located here, a mechanic's lien may be enforced against the property upon which the work is done. Dahlonega Gold Min. Co. v. Purdy, 65 Ga. 496. The court says this was not a suit to enforce a contract made in New York, but was for damages upon breach of a contract. The plaintiff resided in Georgia, did the work in Georgia, by his skill repaired and improved the property of the company, and was entitled to have this statutory remedy employed in his behalf.

A citizen of Alabama doing work or furnishing materials in Georgia has the same remedies as a citizen of Georgia for like work done or materials furnished, and may enforce his lien therefor. Although the contract as to the price of materials may have been made in the foreign state if the material was to be delivered in the state where the building was to be erected, the law of the latter state controls with respect to the remedies for the enforcement of the contract. Thurman v. Kyle, 71 Ga. 323.

In Footman v. Pusey, 45 Ga. 561, which was an attempt to enforce a mechanic's lien on a steamboat, one of the grounds of defense was that the claimant was not a citizen or resident of the state, and that the materials were sent in from another state; but the court did not notice this defense, there being another reason for defeating the lien.

A lien for materials furnished for the erection of improvements on lands in Kansas may be maintained where the contract is entered into in Missouri as well as if it were made in Kansas. United States Invest. Co. v. Phelps & B. Windmill Co. 54 Kan. 144.

In Gaty v. Casey, 15 Ill. 189, where the action was to enforce a lien for material furnished out of the state, the objection was made that as the contract was made out of the state no lien could arise under the statute which could not operate extraterritorially. But the court said it is not the contract which creates the lien under the statute, but it is the use of the material furnished upon the premises, the putting of them into the building and attaching them to the freehold, which entitles the party furnishing the materials to a lien; and the court held that the objection was not well taken.

In Atkins v. Little, 17 Minn. 342, it is said there is nothing in the objection that the plaintiffs are non-residents and that the contract was made out of the state. A mechanic's lien is a statutory security to which the term "remedy" would be misapplied as it would be in respect to a mortgage.

There is nothing in the Missouri act restricting the right to a lien to those who perform work or furnish materials within the limits of the state. If a part of a railroad lies without the state a lien may be enforced for work upon it on that part which lies within the state. St. Louis Bridge & Constr. Co. v. Memphis, C. & N. W. R. Co. 72 Mo. 604.

And that ruling was recognized in Ireland v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 79 Mo. 572.

In Baeder v. Carnie, 44 N. J. L. 208, it was held that under the statute giving a lien on a vessel for materials or articles furnished in the state for the repair of the vessel, it did not matter where the contract was made.

In Stedman v. Patchin, 34 Barb. 218, which was the case of a seizure of a steamboat for materials furnished in repairing it, the court held that if the statutes under which the vessel was seized were valid as to the citizens of the state, they were equally valid as to all persons litigating in the courts of that state in proceedings founded upon them, no matter where the parties resided.

In Wethered v. Garrett, 140 Pa. 224, the lower court charged the jury that there is nothing to be drawn in this case against the plaintiffs from the fact that they are New Yorkers, and this is made the subject of an assumption of error; but the court on appeal does not notice that point, so that the reporter states that it seems that one who is a citizen of another state may file a mechanic's lien against a building within this state for materials furnished by him.

Statutes giving a mechanic's lien upon a building for the value of their labor or materials apply as well to nonresidents as to those who reside within the state. The court says that a refusal of a lien in favor of nonresidents would be against that comity and liberality that does and should exist between us and our sister states. Greenwood v. Tennessee Mfg. Co. & Agri. School, 2 Swan, 130.

In Patten v. Northwestern Lumber Co. 73 Wis. 223, which was a claim for lien for supplies furnished in getting out logs, it appeared that the claimant had his residence and place of business in a county different from that where the lien was filed; but the court says that the residence of the person furnishing the supplies, or the place where one who furnished materials to the contractor, where the latter abandons the work and the owner finishes the same in accordance with a provision of the contract.

(June 16, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas for the City and County of New York reversing a judgment entered upon the report of a referee in favor of plaintiffs in a suit brought to enforce a mechanic's lien. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James J. Allen, for appellants:

The plaintiffs are entitled to a lien for the amount of their claim against the interest of the defendant Coon in the premises described in the complaint.

Van Clief v. Van Vechten, 130 N. Y. 571; Foshay v. Robinson, 127 N. Y. 134.

The plaintiffs furnished materials for a building within this state within the meaning of the statute.

Stevens v. Ogden, 130 N. Y. 182; Tipton v. Fietner, 20 N. Y. 425; Curtis v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 74 N. Y. 116, 30 Am. Rep. 271.

Messrs. Robert L. Harrison and Herbert H. Gibbs, for respondents:

The plaintiffs cannot recover because at the time their lien was filed there was nothing due under the contract from the owner to the conthey are delivered to the person using them, is wholly immaterial; language broad enough to include residence in another state and cases of non-residence are cited to sustain the ruling.

In Phoenix Furniture Co. v. Put-in-Bay Hotel Co. 66 Fed. Rep. 683, the question was as to the proper county within which to file the lien, whether that where the plans were prepared or that where the building was erected, and a decision was rendered in favor of the latter place.

In Wood v. St. Paul City R. Co. 42 Minn. 412, 7 L. R. A. 149, it was held that the affidavit to the claim might be sworn to before an officer in another state.

And that case was recognized in Hickey v. Colom, 47 Minn. 565.

But in one case it was held that the Georgia acts giving the owners of steam saw mills liens for lumber furnished for structures on lands of other persons provides a lien only in case the mill is located in that state; and as the act is to be strictly construed a person seeking to enforce the lien should allege that his mill is so located. Porter v. Lively, 45 Ga. 159.

Where title passes in other state.

There is a strong tendency on the part of the courts to hold that if the title has passed before the property is brought into the state no lien can be claimed.

In Tyler v. Currier, 13 Gray, 184, which was an attempt to enforce a lien for materials furnished for building a ship, it appeared that the materials were sold and delivered in another state and were brought into the state by the shipowner, and it was held that no lien could be claimed for the reason that the contract was completely executed in the other state.

In McDonald v. The Nimbus, 187 Mass. 360, which was a claim for a lien on a vessel, it was held that no lien could be maintained in one state for materials furnished for use in a vessel in another state.

If the materials are delivered to the owner of the property in the foreign state so that they become his property there and are brought into the state by him, there can be no lien for them under a statute giving a lien to one furnishing materials within the state. Birmingham Iron Foundry v. Glen Cove Starch Mfg. Co. 73 N. Y. 81.

In Stout v. Sawyer, 37 Mich. 315, where a mill wheel was sold and delivered in another state, the court held that a lien could not be enforced for it in Michigan. The ruling was placed upon the ground that the wheel might be used anywhere, and that since it was not attached to the building by the vendor, and was not in fact bought with reference to the building in which it was placed, it was a mere chattel for which a lien would not lie.

But several courts with the above decisions before them have refused to apply the exception which they contain, and adhere to the general rule even when the title has passed in the other state. Of course the wording of the statutes may have some influence on the decisions, but the exceptional cases have not been followed as a rule because they construed the provisions of the statutes too strictly.

In Texas the lien exists although the materials were sold and delivered beyond the borders of the state. Fagan v. Boyle Ice Machine Co. 65 Tex. 324. The court says that the question of the passing of title is immaterial since the law and not the contract of the parties gives the lien. That the fact that one or all of the facts from which the law evolves the lien transpired beyond the limits of the state cannot affect the validity of the law. And the case of Birmingham Iron Foundry v. Glen Cove Starch Mfg. Co. 73 N. Y. 20, is disapproved.

The fact that an agreement for the furnishing of materials is made out of the state, and the agreement is complied with and the materials are delivered there, does not defeat the right to the lien if the materials were delivered for a specified object and purpose, and were designed for the structure in which they are incorporated. Thompson v. St. Paul City R. Co. 45 Minn. 13.

The fact that the materials to be used in a building were sold and delivered in another state does not impair the right to a lien. Mallory v. La Crosse Abattoir Co. 80 Wis. 170.

Compliance with an agreement to manufacture at plaintiff's factory in Kansas and deliver to defendant at the depot in Atchinson certain machinery for defendant's elevator in Nebraska, is a furnishing of the same in Nebraska within the meaning of the Nebraska lien law. The judge says: I do not think that either the letter or spirit of the statute requires that the machinery should be actually laid down at the site of the building by the lienor, but if his labor, skill, or capital produced it and set it in motion for that destination, and it finally reached it and was attached to the building for the purpose intended, then it was furnished there by him without regard to the name in which it was shipped or other matters connected with its transportation. Great Western Mfg. Co. v. Hunter Bros. 15 Neb. 83.

A person furnishing materials for the construction of a railroad under a contract made in another state where the materials are actually delivered to the contractor may have a mechanic's lien upon the road within the state when the materials are used there. Carnegie v. Lancaster & H. R. Co. 1 Ohio N. P. 300. And the court disapproved of the case of Bender v. Stettinius, 19 Ohio L. J. 163, in which it was held that to entitle any person to a lien under the statutes the materials must be furnished for the labor performed within the state, and that goods consigned from another state to the head contractor do not entitle the consignor to a lien as a materialman. H. P. F.

tractor, and nothing became due prior to the commencement of this action.

Ringle v. Wallis Iron Works, 85 Hun, 279; Leigne v. Schwarzer, 10 Daly, 547; Bailey v. Johnson, 1 Daly, 67.

The plaintiffs as subcontractors are subrogated to the rights of the contractor, nothing more and nothing less, and these rights are to be determined by its contract.

Herbert v. Herbert, 57 How. Pr. 338; Schneider v. Hobbin, 41 How. Pr. 232; Hoffgang v. Meyer, 2 Abb. N. C. 111; Cheney v. Troy Hospital Asso. 65 N. Y. 282; McMillan v. Seneca Lake Grape & Wine Co. 5 Hun, 12; Crane v. Genin, 60 N. Y. 127; Gibson v. Lenane, 94 N. Y. 183; Sullivan v. Brewster, 1 E. D. Smith, 684.

The contractor and these appellants, plaintiffs, claiming under it by subrogation were not entitled to recover without the production of the architect's certificate or proof that it was unreasonably withheld.

Beecher v. Schuback, 4 Misc. 54; Smith v. Brady, 17 N. Y. 175, 72 Am. Dec. 442; Nolan v. Whitney, 83 N. Y. 650; Bowery Nat. Bank v. New York, 63 N. Y. 333; Schilling Fire Proof Cement & A. Co. v. Arnott, 66 Hun, 182.

The contract of plaintiffs as subcontractors was made outside of this state, and was performed outside of this state, and was between nonresident plaintiffs and a foreign corporation, and no lien attaches under the statute.

Birmingham Iron Foundry v. Glen Cove Starch Mfg. Co. 78 N. Y. 81.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The learned judges of the general term below have reversed the judgment recovered by these plaintiffs in their action for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien, and have ordered a dismissal of the complaint, upon the ground, as we find in the opinion, that "the right to a lien pursuant to the provisions of the mechanic's lien law [chap. 842, Laws 1885] does not extend to contracts made and to be performed out of this state." I think that their conclusion was erroneous, and that a consideration of the case fails to disclose any ground for the reversal of the plaintiff's judgment. It appears from this record, following the findings of facts, that the defendant, Amalie Coon, contracted with the Vanderbeck Iron Work Company, a corporation created by the laws of the state of New Jersey, to furnish and erect the iron work in a certain building she was about constructing in the city of New York. That company then made a contract with the plaintiffs, who were also residents of the state of New Jersey, by which the latter agreed to make certain iron lutes and iron separators, at an agreed price, and in accordance with the contract between the company and Mrs. Coon, and to deliver the same to the iron-work company "at and for the building" in question. The plaintiffs performed their agreement, and the materials called for in their agreement were delivered to the iron-work company "at the city of Hoboken, in the state of New Jersey, and at No. 368 Greenwich street, in the city of New York" (that being the place where the building was being erected); and all of them "were actually used in the construction of the building, with the knowledge and consent" of Mrs. Coon. It is perfectly clear, therefore, in the first place, that, under their contract, the plaintiffs were required to deliver the materials which they had agreed to furnish to the iron-work company "at and for the building in the city of New York;" and, in the second place, that those materials were actually used in its construction. And is there any satisfactory reason for denying to them the protection of the statute because the contract or agreement was one made without the state, and between nonresidents of the state? I see no reason for so narrowly construing the provisions of the mechanic's lien law. By its terms, "any person" may have a lien who shall have furnished any materials which have been used in the erection of any building within any of the cities or counties of this state. Undoubtedly, the statute has no extraterritorial force, and was intended for the protection of those furnishing materials within the state; as it was held by this court in the case of Birmingham Iron Foundry v. Glen Cove Starch Mfg. Co. 78 N. Y. 80, a case cited and and relied upon in the opinion of the general term. The facts, however, in that case, were quite other than those before us. There the defendant, a New York corporation, ordered the construction of a steam engine by the Woodruff Company, a Connecticut corporation, and the bed plate for the engine the Woodruff Company ordered of the plaintiff, also a Connecticut corporation. Under the contract between the defendant and the Woodruff Company, the engine was to be delivered to the defendant at Hartford, in the state of Connecticut, and the bed plate for the engine, under the subcontract with the plaintiff was also to be delivered at that city. The delivery of the engine complete was in fact made to the defendant at Hartford, and the defendant brought it into this state and to its factory. Under these circumstances, it was very properly decided, inasmuch as, when the engine was brought into this state, it belonged to the defendant, that the plaintiff "furnished no materials in this state," and therefore could not claim the benefit of the statute. In this case the fact was (and such was the finding by the referee) that, under the plaintiffs' agreement, they were to deliver the materials at and for the building in New York city, which the defendant was to put up, and they performed their agreement in that respect, and their materials were actually used in its construction.

In the opinion of the general term, stress is laid upon the fact that no place of payment was specified, and that it was reasoned that because the state wherein the contract was made and the contracting parties resided was, in legal contemplation, the place for payment, no right could be deemed to exist under the statute entitling the plaintiffs to a lien upon the building for their security. That proposition again assumes for the statute a purpose which, in our judgment, is not conveyed by its language. The operation of the mechanic's lien law does not depend upon such incidents of the contract with the materialman as relate to its character or to the place of payment, but solely upon the fact that the materialman has performed labor upon, or furnished materials to, any building within the state. The very case to which the general term opinion refers, and which we have cited above, rested in its decision, upon the fact that the plaintiff had really furnished no materials in this state. The language of this act is very broad, and we perceive no limitation in its language, nor any good reason for reading one into it, by which the mechanic is required to be a resident of the state, and to make his contract here. The materials must have been furnished and used in the erection of a building within a city or county of this state; and, when that is the case, the right of the materialman to a lien follows, if the provisions of the statute are otherwise complied with.

The respondent, however, further argues that the plaintiffs could not recover, because, at the time their notice of lien was filed, there was nothing due under the contract from Mrs. Coon to the contractor, the iron-work company, and nothing became due prior to the commencement of this action. With respect to that point, the case shows that under the contract between Mrs. Coon and the iron-work company, if the contractor, during the progress of the work, refused or neglected to supply a sufficiency of materials or workmen, she had the power to provide them, after three days' notice in writing being given, and to finish the work herself, deducting the expense from the amount of the contract. Mrs. Coon, after making a first payment of $1,000 under the contract, had occasion to enforce this provision, and did proceed to complete the iron work of her building herself. At the time when she assumed to complete this work, the plaintiffs had already performed their agreement, and had furnished the materials called for by it, and their notice of lien had been filed. While it is true that at that time nothing was due from Mrs. Coon to her contractor, nevertheless when she had completed the work called for by the contract between them, there remained a balance of $654, after deducting from the contract price of $3,250 the cost of completing the work (a sum of $1,596) and the $1,000 previously paid to the contractor. To that balance in Mrs. Coon's hands, on account of the contract, the plaintiffs' lien attached. In Van Clief v. Van Vechten, 130 N. Y. 571, although there was nothing due upon the contract there depended upon, when the lien was filed, the judgment which the plaintiffs, as subcontractors, had recovered, was upheld, upon the principle, as stated in the opinion, that "if nothing is due to the contractor pursuant to the contract when the lien is filed, and he abandons the undertaking without just cause, but the owner completes the building according to the contract and under a provision thereof permitting it, the lien attaches to the extent of the difference between the cost of completion and the amount unpaid when the lien was filed." The authority of that case is direct.

The further point taken by the respondent, with respect to the absence of the architect's certificate, is clearly untenable. We need only say of it that this provision of the contract had its application only under the condition that the contractor was performing his contract. Its purpose was to furnish the owner of the building with authentic evidence that the work certified had been performed. Weeks v. O'Brien 141 N. Y. 199. In this case, as the owner completed the work, no architect's certificate was called for.

The order and judgment appealed from should be reversed, and the judgment entered upon the report of the referee should be affirmed, with costs to the appellants at the general term and in this court.

All concur.

v.

CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL.

(.....Mass.....)

An action against a hospital for an autopsy performed upon the dead body of a child without the consent of the father, who was the natural guardian and who intrusted the child to the hospital for treatment, does not fail on the ground that there was no right of property in a dead body.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court for Suffolk County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful performance of an autopsy on the body of plaintiff's child. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Ralph W. Gloag, for appellant:

The plaintiff, as the father and natural guardian, having the care and custody of the child, is the proper party suing; he is the person whom the law compels to bury the remains.

Reg. v. Vann, 2 Den. C. C. 325.

The first requirement of a sound body of law is, that it should correspond with the actual feelings and demands of the community, whether right or wrong. If people would gratify the passion of revenge outside the law if the law did not help them, the law has no choice but to satisfy the craving itself, and thus avoid the greater evil of private retribution.

Holmes, Common Law, 41, 42.

Assuming that there cannot be property in a corpse in the sense of title to or ownership in such, yet the right to be let alone and free from interference with one's dead, the right of custody or the right of unimpaired possession, like the right to vote, constitute a res, that is, broadly speaking, property.

Messrs. Hutchins & Wheeler, for appellee:

No such action has ever been maintained in this commonwealth or in England, and it has been repeatedly laid down that there is no property in a dead body, and that no civil action can be maintained for disturbing it.

Meagher v. Driscoll, 99 Mass. 281, 96 Am. Dec. 759; Driscoll v. Nichols, 5 Gray, 438; Weld v. Walker, 130 Mass. 422, 39 Am. Rep. 465; Williams v. Williams, L. R. 20 Ch. Div. 659; Reg. v. Sharpe, Dears. & B. C. C. 160.

The burial of the cadaver that is coro data terribus is nullis in bonis, and belongs to ecclesiastical cognizance, but as to the monument, action is given (as hath been said) at the common law for defacing thereof.

3 Co. Inst. 202; 2 Bl. Com. 429.

For the very reason that no civil action lies for disturbing a body, the court has enforced the criminal law against persons removing bodies unlawfully from their place of burial.

Reg. v. Sharpe, Dears. & B. C. C. 160.

A court of common law does not recognize sufficient right of property in a dead body to support an action of tort against a carrier for nondelivery of it.

Driscoll v. Nichols, 5 Gray, 438.

The furthest extent to which this court has gone in taking jurisdiction over dead bodies has been in assuming to decide in equity controversies between relatives as to the place of burial.

Weld v. Walker, 130 Mass. 422, 39 Am. Rep. 465; Pierce v. Proprietors of Swan Point Cemetery, 10 R. I. 227, 14 Am. Rep. 667.

In Young v. College of Physicians & Surgeons, 81 Md. 358, 31 L. R. A. 540, the autopsy was held to be justifiable.

Lathrop, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The demurrer in this case is a general one, and the question is whether the father of a child, who is its natural guardian, and who has intrusted the child to a hospital for treatment, can maintain an action against the hospital for an autopsy performed on the dead body of his child without his consent. The sole contention of the learned counsel for the defendant in support of the demurrer is that the action cannot be maintained because there is no right of property in a dead body. 2 Bl. Com. 429; 3 Co. Inst. 202. Even in England, before a dead body is buried, while there is no right of property in it, there is a right of possession for the purposes of burial or other lawful disposition of it. Thus, in Reg. v. For, 2 Q. B. 246, where a prisoner in jail on execution died, and the jailer refused to deliver the body to the executors of the deceased unless they would satisfy certain claims made against him, the court of Queen's bench issued a mandamus peremptory in the first instance, commanding that the body should be delivered up to the executors. So, in Williams v. Williams, L. R. 20 Ch. Div. 659, while it was held that there is no property in a dead body, it was also held that the executors had a right to the possession of the body, and that it was their duty to bury it.

In this commonwealth the precise question before us has not been passed upon. It is, however, apparent from the decisions that a right of possession is recognized, which is vested in the husband or wife or next of kin, and not in the executors. In Lakin v. Ames, 10 Cush. 198, the defendants were sued in trespass for tearing down a horseshed. The defense was that the shed was on the public common of the town, and was erected in front of a tomb lawfully on the burying ground, adjoining the common, so as to obstruct the entrance thereto, and that the first named defendant, having the legal right to open the tomb, and deposit the body of his deceased brother therein, peaceably removed the shed, doing no unnecessary damage. Liberty given by the town to a man to build a tomb was held to be a grant to the man and his heirs. The first named defendant had no legal interest in the tomb, nor had he express authority from his mother, one of the heirs of the former owner. But it was said by the court: "The law will imply a license from the nature and exigencies of the case, the relation of the parties, and the well established usages of a civilized and Christian community." In Durrell v. Hayward, 9 Gray, 248, 69 Am. Dec. 284, it was held that a husband who had buried his wife in a public burying ground was not liable as a trespasser for removing a grave stone, since placed at her grave by her mother, without injuring the stone, and for the purpose of substituting another. It was said by Mr. Justice Bigelow: "The plaintiff had no right to erect a stone at the grave of the defendant's wife without his knowledge or consent. The indisputable and paramount right, as well as duty, of a husband to dispose of the body of his deceased wife by a decent sepulture in a suitable place, carries with it the right of placing over the spot of burial a proper monument or memorial in accordance with the well known and long-established usage of the community." In Meagher v. Driscoll, 99 Mass. 281, 96 Am. Dec. 759, it was held that, if the plaintiff owns the lot in which the body of his child is buried, he may maintain an action of tort in the nature of trespass quare clausum fregit for the unlawful removal of the body; and, in measuring damages, the jury may take into consideration the injury to the plaintiff's feelings, if it appears that the defendant acted in wilful disregard or careless ignorance of the plaintiff's rights. In Weld v. Walker, 130 Mass. 422, 39 Am. Rep. 465, the right of a husband to bury his wife was again recognized, and it was held that if he had not freely consented to the burial of her body in the lot owned by another person, with the intention or understanding that it should be her final resting place, a court of equity would permit him, after such burial, to remove her body, coffin, and tombstones to his own land. In Driscoll v. Nichols,

5 Gray, 488, cited by the defendant, the plaintiff was a stranger in blood to the deceased. The action was in contract or tort for not carrying the dead body. The case was decided on the ground that the plaintiff had no legal interest in the dead body by reason of which he could maintain the action against the carrier without proof of a special contract with himself. The case differs widely from the case at bar. In Rhode Island it was held that there is a quasi right of property in a dead body which the law will protect. Thus, in Pierce v. Proprietors of Swan Point Cemetery, 10 R. I. 237, 237, 14 Am. Rep. 667, it is said by Mr. Justice Potter: "That there is no right of property in a dead body, using the word in its ordinary sense, may well be admitted. Yet the burial of the dead is a subject which interests the feelings of mankind to a much greater degree than many matters of actual property. There is a duty imposed by the universal feelings of mankind to be discharged by someone towards the dead, a duty, and we may also say a right, to protect from violation; and a duty on the part of others to abstain from violation. It may therefore be considered as a sort of quasi property, and it would be discreditable to any system of law not to provide a remedy in such a case." So, in Hackett v. Hackett, 18 R. I. 155, 19 L. R. A. 558, it was held that there was a quasi right of property in a dead body, and that, as a general rule, a widow had the primary right to control the burial of her husband, dependent, however, upon the peculiar circumstances of the case, or the waiver of such right by consent or otherwise.

In the case at bar there was no executor, and there could be none, as the deceased was a minor. The father, as the natural guardian of the child, was entitled to the possession of its body for burial. Being entitled to the possession of the body for the purposes of burial, is not his right against one who unlawfully interferes with it, and mutilates it, as great as it would be if the body was buried in his lot, and was thence unlawfully removed? That an action may be maintained in the latter case we have already seen, and we are of the opinion that it may be in the former. This is so held in a well-considered case in Minnesota, where, in an action brought by a widow for the unlawful dissection of the body of her dead husband, an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint was affirmed. Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 307, 14 L. R. A. 85. This was followed in a similar case in New York, — Foley v. Phelps, 1 App. Div. 551, where the right to possession was defined thus: "The right to the possession of the corpse in the same condition it was in when death supervened. It is the right to what remains when the breath leaves the body, and not merely to such a backed, hewed, and mutilated corpse as some stranger, an offender against the criminal law, may choose to turn over to an afflicted relative." See also Renshan v. Wright, 125 Ind. 536, 9 L. R. A. 514; Young v. College of Physicians & Surgeons, 81 Md. 858, 81 L. R. A. 540, 19 Am. L. Rev. 251, 10 Alb. L. J. 71, 4 Am. Law Times, 127, 8 Chicago Leg. News, 378; Perley, Mortuary Law, 26 et seq.

The question has not been argued by the defendant whether the nature of the defendant hospital is such that an action against it cannot be maintained for the alleged illegal acts of its officers and servants, and we express no opinion upon it. Nor do we need to inquire under what circumstances an autopsy is justifiable, as this question has also not been argued. These questions can better be determined when the facts are before us after a trial of the case. All that we need now to decide is whether the objection raised by the defendant is valid or not. As we are of opinion that it is not valid, the order sustaining the demurrer, and directing a judgment for the defendant, must be set aside.

The powers of a receiver can be no greater than the statute authorizes. When a receiver's powers are prescribed by statute he cannot exceed them.

The nature of the remedy prescribed by §§ 5905-5911 in favor of a creditor, and its exclusive character, as well as the functions of a receiver, under these sections and the whole chapter, were characterized in the same way as in—

Allen v. Walsh in Walther v. Seven Corners Bank, 58 Minn. 434; Klee v. E. H. Steele Co. 60 Minn. 355; and International Trust Co. v. American Loan & T. Co. 62 Minn. 501.

The proceedings in this case did not vest in the receiver authority to enforce the liability of stockholders.

Minnesota Linseed Oil Co. v. Maginnis, 32 Minn. 193.

A receiver has no powers except such as are conferred upon him by the order by which he is appointed.

Beach, Receivers, § 249; Kerr, Receivers, 196; Yeager v. Wallace, 44 Pa. 294; Singely v. Fox, 75 Pa. 112; Grant v. Davenport, 18 Iowa, 179; Hooper v. Winston, 24 Ill. 353; Verplanck v. Mercantile Ins. Co. 2 Paige, 438.

If the complaint had shown a cause of action against stockholders such power could not be conferred on a receiver, because the appointment of a receiver is not required in a proceeding to enforce the liability of stockholders until assets shall arise from the enforcement of this liability.

Walther v. Seven Corners Bank, 58 Minn. 434; Klee v. E. H. Steele Co. 60 Minn. 355; International Trust Co. v. American Loan & T. Co. 62 Minn. 501.

The receiver cannot supersede the proceeding of appellants.

First Nat. Bank v. Harper, 61 Minn. 375; State v. Bank of New England, 55 Minn. 139; Walther v. Seven Corners Bank, 58 Minn. 434.

The receiver cannot in this action institute a proceeding to enforce the liability of stockholders nor supersede the proceeding initiated by appellants because his complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action and because it is deficient in other respects.

The showing of the receiver's complaint is not of debts which the stockholders are liable for, but of liabilities. The liabilities the stockholders are not liable for unless they are debts.

Messrs. Harlan P. Roberts and Victor J. Welch, for respondent:

The position occupied by the creditor coming into the main action in such case as this, and for such a purpose as this, is not that of an intervenor in any proper sense.

McKusick v. Seymour, 48 Minn. 158.

This ought to be enough to show that the provisions of chapter 68, relating to practice in ordinary suits, have no application to the case in hand.

Very little can be obtained upon the proper practice in this state by decisions outside of our own state.

McKusick v. Seymour, 48 Minn. 158, would seem to settle the whole matter in dispute here.

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was originally commenced against the defendant bank alone, on January 15, 1896, under the provisions of Gen. Stat. 1894, chap. 76, for the sequestration of its assets, and the appointment of a receiver. On the following day, the appellants herein filed their cross bill or complaint, as creditors of the bank, seeking thereby to enforce the double liability of its stockholders for its debts, alleging therein a cause of action against them, and naming them as parties defendant. The appellants then moved the court for an order joining the stockholders as defendants, and requiring them to answer the cross bill. The trial court denied the motion, without prejudice, and with leave to renew it, upon the ground that it was not advisable to proceed against the stockholders until it became apparent that the assets of the corporation would not pay its debts in full. On January 23, 1896, David C. Bell was appointed receiver of the property and assets of the defendant corporation, and to take charge of its property and effects, with power to collect, sue for, and recover the debts and the property that belonged to the defendant. On March 30, 1896, it was apparent that the assets of the corporation were insufficient to pay its debts, and the appellants renewed their motion to bring in the stockholders to answer their cross bill. Thereupon the court made its order requiring the bank and the receiver to show cause on the 4th day of April, 1896, why the motion should not be granted. On April 3, 1896, the receiver filed what is designated as a "supplemental complaint" (it is difficult to classify it) asking that the stockholders be made parties to the action, and to answer his complaint wherein he sought to enforce their individual liability. Upon the hearing of the motion of the appellants, on the next day, the receiver opposed it, and claimed that the stockholders should be made parties, and required to answer his complaint, and not that of the creditors. The court thereupon made its order denying the motion of the appellants, and its further order directing the stockholders to be made parties on the application of the receiver, and to answer his complaint. The appellants appealed from each order. Their motion was denied, on the sole ground that the receiver was the proper party to enforce the personal liability of the stockholders. If such is the case, and he is authorized by law to enforce the liability of the stockholders for the debts of the corporation, then the order should be affirmed. We say "order," because, practically, there was but one; for the refusal to bring the stockholders in on the appellant's cross bill, and ordering them joined on the receiver's petition or complaint, might properly have been included in one order. The only question, then, in this case is: Has a receiver of a corporation appointed in sequestration proceedings under Gen. Stat. 1894, chap. 76, authority to enforce the personal liability of stockholders for the debts of the corporation? We answer the question in the negative. This is not a mere question of practice, which does not affect the substantial rights of the appellant, as claimed by the respondents. While it is true, as claimed, that the time when, and upon whose cross bill or complaint, stockholders shall be brought into the action, where the plaintiff has omitted to make them parties, rests largely in the discretion of the trial court, and that when stockholders are once legally made parties, and required to answer a complaint stating a cause of action against them on account of their individual liability, no other creditor or party is entitled to file such cross bill, yet each creditor has the legal right, where the corporate assets are insufficient to pay the debts, to have the stockholders made parties to the action, upon a complaint which they are bound to answer. Therefore, if the receiver is not authorized to enforce the liability of the stockholders, they are not bound to answer his complaint, and may demur or move to dismiss it, and have judgment accordingly.

We do not deem it necessary to enter upon any extended general discussion in support of our conclusion, that the receiver in this case was not empowered to enforce the personal liability of stockholders for the debts of the defendant bank, for the reason that such conclusion necessarily follows from the previous decisions of this court. It is clear that the provisions of chapter 76 do not expressly or impliedly confer upon receivers the power here in question. On the contrary, the language used as to the powers of receivers and the rights of creditors unmistakably indicates that the liability of stockholders for the corporate debts cannot be enforced by the receiver, and that it must be enforced on the application of creditors, or by one in behalf of all; and such has been the practice in all former cases reaching this court.

In the case of Allen v. Walsh, 25 Minn. 548, it was held that the stockholders' liability was for the equal benefit of all creditors, and all had an equal right to enforce it, and that Gen. Stat. chap. 76, provided an efficient and sole remedy for such enforcement, in a single action in which all persons interested should be joined, and their respective rights, equities, and liabilities finally settled and determined. This case was followed in Johnson v. Fisher, 30 Minn. 173, wherein it was held that the liability could only be enforced by or in behalf of all creditors; and against all of the stockholders upon whom the liability rested. The case of Minnesota Thresher Mfg. Co. v. Langdon, 44 Minn. 87, which holds that the right to recover capital withdrawn and refunded by the corporation to its stockholders, as a gratuity, passes to the receiver, is not out of step with the cases holding that the stockholders' liability for the corporate debts can be enforced only by creditors, because such capital was at one time the property of the corporation, and its return to stockholders without consideration was a fraud as to creditors. The right of the receiver, representing the creditors, to recover the capital so given away, rests upon the same basis as does his right to recover any other property disposed of by the corporation in fraud of creditors. But there is no analogy between such an action by the receiver to reclaim assets at one time belonging to the corporation, which it has fraudulently transferred, and an action to enforce the individual or double liability of the stockholder for the debts of the corporation. Such liability sustains the relation of surety for the debts of the corporation; hence, from its very nature, it is not, and never can be, an asset of the corporation. In the last case cited, the court simply holds (following Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Minneapolis Engine & Mach. Works, 35 Minn. 548), that a receiver appointed under the provisions of Gen. Stat. 1894, chap. 76, has the same powers and functions as a receiver upon a creditors' bill, or upon proceedings supplementary to execution. Everything becomes assets in the hands of such a receiver which are still assets of the corporation or debtor as to creditors. Among the rights which pass to him as the representative of creditors is the right to recover property of the corporation conveyed in fraud of creditors, or capital refunded, without consideration, to stockholders; that is, his powers and functions relate only to what is or was at some previous time, and still is, as to creditors, the property or estate of the corporation. In Arthur v. Willius, 44 Minn. 409, it was held that the individual liability of stockholders for the corporate debts might be enforced upon the application of any creditor who is a party to the proceedings, though the plaintiff creditor did not demand in his complaint any such relief. McKusick v. Seymour, S. & Co. 48 Minn. 158, relied upon by the respondents to sustain their contention that a receiver is empowered to enforce the individual liability of a stockholder, does not support the claim, except by an obiter dictum to the effect that the liability could be enforced on the complaint of the receiver, and that, ordinarily, such would be the most appropriate mode of procedure. But two questions only were involved and decided in this case: (a) That § 8 of article 10 of the Constitution, imposing the liability, was self-executing; (b) that such liability could be enforced after the appointment of a receiver in an action brought under Gen. Stat. 1894, chap. 76, for the sequestration of the corporate assets, on the application of a creditor. It was not decided that a receiver could enforce the liability. The case of St. Louis Car Co. v. Stillwater Street R. Co. 53 Minn. 129, is also relied on by the respondents. The question in this case was whether a creditor could have the assets of a corporation sequestered, and a receiver appointed, under Gen. Stat. 1894, chap. 76, where a receiver of the corporation in a foreclosure action had already been appointed, and it was held that he could. This was all that the case decided. But in the opinion the difference between the powers of a receiver in a foreclosure suit and a receiver under chapter 76 was set in contrast, and, in speaking of the powers of the latter, this language was used: "Everything becomes assets in his hands which are assets as to creditors, although not [then] assets as to the corporation, as, for example, property conveyed in fraud of creditors, capital withdrawn without provision for the payment of corporate debts, the personal liability of stockholders." The examples were simply illustrations of a general proposition. The first two were in point, and a correct statement of the law, but there is, as already pointed out, no analogy between the last example and the first two. The last one was inadvertently added by the writer of the opinion. Re People's Live-stock Ins. Co. 56 Minn. 180, was a proceeding under Gen. Stat. 1894, §§ 8430-8485, inclusive, to dissolve the corporation, and it was held that unpaid stock subscriptions were corporate assets, and might be recovered by the receiver. But it was further said: "The constitutional or statutory liability is directly to the creditors. The corporation cannot enforce it. It is no part of its assets." See, on this last point, Olsen v. Cook, 57 Minn. 552. The rule that it is a right belonging to creditors to have the stockholders brought into the action, to the end that their liability for the debts of the corporation may be ascertained and enforced by the court, was expressly recognized in the case of National German-American Bank v. St. Anthony Park N. R. E. Improv. Co. 61 Minn. 359; and again, in the case of Pioneer Fuel Co. v. St. Peter Street Improv. Co. 64 Minn. 886; also, in Palmer v. Bank of Zumbrota (Minn.) 67 N. W. 893, which further holds that a judgment in an action by a creditor, under Gen. Stat. 1894, chap. 76, to sequester the assets of a bank, and for the appointment of a receiver, where the plaintiff in his complaint did not ask to have stockholders made parties, was erroneous in so far as it directed the receiver to sue the stockholders upon their liability for the corporate debts, for the reason that the receiver could not maintain such actions.

It appears from this summary of the decisions of this court that unpaid stock subscriptions, property transferred by the corporation in fraud of its creditor, and capital fraudulently withdrawn, are assets in the hands of the receiver as to creditors, though not as to the corporation except as to the first, and he may recover them, because they were at one time assets of the corporation, and as to creditors they remain so; but that, as to the liability of stockholders for the corporate debts, it is not, and never was, a corporate asset, for it is due directly to creditors; and that the receiver cannot enforce it, in the absence of a statute authorizing him to do so. This conclusion is also supported by the authority of the text-writers. Morse, Banks & Banking, § 696; Thompson, Liability of Stockholders, § 842; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 218; 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 869.

The action of the receiver in this case in seeking to enforce the liability of the stockholders was gratuitous, and the stockholders were not bound to litigate the question of their liability with him. If it be desirable in order to secure a speedy, economical, and practical method of enforcing the liability, to invest the receiver with such power, it must be done by statute. This has already been done in cases where the receiver of an insolvent banking corporation is appointed on the application of the superintendent of banks. Such a receiver is expressly authorized to enforce the individual liability of stockholders. Laws 1895, chap. 145, § 20. While the liability of the stockholders must be enforced on the application of creditors, and not on that of the receiver, except in cases where the statute otherwise provides, yet it does not follow that the trial court has not the same control of the litigation as if it was conducted by the receiver. The creditor who first takes action to have such liability enforced, whether he is plaintiff or subsequently comes into the action, has no exclusive right to control the litigation; and, whenever the stockholders are once brought into the action, the trial court should so far control the conduct of the litigation as to conserve and protect the rights and equities of both creditors and stockholders. Whether it may not be feasible in this case to substitute the appellants' complaint for that of the receiver, and let the answers of the stockholders stand as answers to the substituted complaint, whereby a saving of time and expense may be made, is a question we are, for obvious reasons, not in a position to determine, and leave the matter for the consideration of the trial court. If it shall be impracticable or illegal to make the substitution, then the district court will make its order, bringing in the stockholders to answer the cross bill or complaint of the appellants.

Orders reversed, and case remanded, with instructions to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

v.

CHICAGO, ST. PAUL, MINNEAPOLIS, &
OMAHA RAILWAY COMPANY, App't.

(.....Wis.....)

1. A passenger on a railway train which is stopped for some time by tanks of burning oil upon the track, and who from motives of curiosity and pleasure leaves a place fixed as a temporary station at a safe distance from the burning oil and goes within 85 feet of the same and remains there for several minutes, is guilty of such contributory negligence as will prevent a recovery for injuries caused by an explosion of a tank by which burning oil is thrown upon him.
2. A burning tank of oil on a railroad track the flames from which ascend several feet into the air is sufficient notice of the danger of an explosion to a passenger on a train temporarily stopped by the fire to render unnecessary any caution to him from the company not to approach too near the tank.
3. No recovery can be had for personal injuries by one whose own negligence contributed to the result.
4. A railroad company is not required to restrain by physical force a passenger on a railway train which is temporarily stopped by a burning tank of oil on the track from unnecessarily exposing himself to danger from an explosion of the tank by approaching too close to it.
5. The relation of carrier and passenger exists between a railroad company and a passenger on a train which is temporarily stopped by a burning tank of oil on the track during which time the passengers on the train were taken to a place some distance from the tank while waiting for a train to receive them on the other side of the obstruction.

6. A railway company is required to exercise only ordinary care and prudence towards a passenger, who is temporarily prevented from continuing his journey by a burning tank of oil on the track while waiting for a train to come from the other side of the tank to receive him.
7. A material finding in favor of plaintiff cannot be stricken from the record and a judgment rendered for defendant where there is any evidence to support it.
8. Judgment non obstante veredicto cannot be given for either party where the special verdict is inconsistent and contradictory until the conflicting portions of it are set aside.

(March 16, 1897.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pierce County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Pinney, J.:

This action was brought for the recovery of damages sustained by the plaintiff while a passenger on its easterly bound train of cars from Ellsworth to Marshfield, Wisconsin, by reason of the alleged negligence of the defendant. A part of the western-bound freight train of the defendant, consisting of a car load of coke, three metal tanks, two of which were filled with naphtha, and one with kerosene oil, and the caboose in the rear, had been separated from the rest of the train, and had been wrecked early in the morning, and the said cars were on fire, and in a dangerous condition, on the defendant's track between said places, about 3 miles east of the station called Roberts, and west of Hammond. The defendant carried the plaintiff on its passenger train to Roberts, where the fact that such wreck had occurred was made known to the plaintiff and other passengers. When the passenger train arrived within about 400 feet of the wreck, the passengers were directed to retain their places in the cars until such time as a train might arrive to carry them on their journey, and to which they would be transferred on the east side of the wreck. The forward tank, containing naphtha, exploded soon after the wreck, and everything in the rear of it, as well as the coke car in front, caught fire. This was quite a violent explosion, and portions of the tank were thrown a considerable distance, and the tank containing naphtha next to it was so broken as to permit much of the contents to run out. The kerosene tank in the rear was thus set on fire, and continued to burn from that time until nearly 11 o'clock, a considerable part of the time with great violence, and producing a loud, roaring noise, with flames shooting up. A wrecking train and car had arrived at about 8 o'clock in the morning, and were operating upon the wreck, and had hitched to the tank of kerosene oil, and attempted to draw it out, scatter the burning coke, and thus clear up the track. Attempts to remove it opened the seams in the tank, and it began to burn more violently. The wreck occurred in a farming country, and the right of way was 100 feet wide, extending through cultivated fields on either side. A gap was opened in the right of way fence on the south side, 257 feet west of the tank, and another in the wire fence, running through the fields at right angles with the road, at a point 95 feet south of the right of way, but 147 feet from the burning tank, and the third gap was opened in the right of way fence 256 feet east of the burning tank, in order to transfer the baggage, express matter and mails. Efforts were unavailing to keep the passengers in the cars. A large number of them had got out, and thereupon it was concluded to transfer them, through the gaps, around the wreck, to a point east of the east gap, where they were to take the other train, and they were transferred accordingly, as well as the baggage, mail, and express matter; the latter being deposited about opposite the east gap, and the passengers occupied, in groups, a considerable space east from the east gap, along the right of way, for a distance of over 100 feet. The plaintiff, with other passengers, walked around said wreck, through said gaps, to the place where the eastern gap was opened, and said mail matter, baggage, etc., had been deposited, to wait for a train to continue his journey. The injury complained of occurred about an hour after the passenger train arrived at the scene of the wreck, and when the plaintiff had approached to, and was standing, about 85 feet east of the burning tank, or one third of the distance from said tank to where the east gap had been opened. The plaintiff was standing at said place for about half or three quarters of an hour before the explosion occurred; having left the eastern gap, and walked westward, towards the burning oil tank. At the time of the explosion the flame from the burning tank ascended about 100 feet or more, and, as one witness said, there was nothing but fire in the sky. Just before the explosion the flames were burning quite high—from 3 to 5 feet,—right in the middle of the tank, and kept rising and going down. The plaintiff received his injuries from the burning oil, cast on him by the explosion. It was contended by the plaintiff that the defendant was guilty of negligence in not warning him of the danger to which he was exposed by said burning wreck, and in not providing a safe place, and in designating an unsafe one, for the plaintiff and other passengers to wait for the train designed to carry them eastward, and in not warning the plaintiff of the danger to which he was exposed at the place he was waiting, and in allowing him to leave said train, and go to said place and there remain, and in allowing said train wreck to be and remain in a dangerous and unsafe condition. The defendant denied all allegations of negligence, and alleged and gave evidence tending to show that, by its officers and agents, it directed the plaintiff and other passengers to a place at the east gap, and eastward thereof, designed as a temporary station, to wait for the train to carry them eastward, which was a sufficient distance from the wreck to insure safety from any injury on account thereof, or the subsequent explosion. The plaintiff, in his complaint, alleged that the defendant directed the plaintiff to go around said wreck to a point east and south thereof, and he accordingly walked around the same to a point on defendant's right of way, designed by the defendant as a temporary station, to wait for said train to carry said passengers eastward. A special verdict was taken. By this it was found, among other things, in substance, that the plaintiff understood that he was to wait with the other passengers at or near the east gap for the train to carry him on his journey; that, after passing "around through the gaps to a point at or near the east gap, the plaintiff unnecessarily, and from motives of curiosity and pleasure, went from there to a place much nearer the burning tank," but not "for the purpose of boarding the outgoing train, or supposing that was the proper place to do so," and "that the plaintiff's injuries were caused by his going nearer the burning tank," and that he "would not have been seriously injured if he had remained at or near the east gap;" further, that "a reasonable and prudent man, under the circumstances, situate as the plaintiff was, and with his means of knowledge, would not have anticipated that there was danger of an explosion of the burning oil tank, or that it might explode, and that there was danger in being so near it when he was injured;" that he "was not guilty of any want of ordinary care that contributed to his injury," but that "the defendant's officers and agents, by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence, would have anticipated that the explosion might occur;" that they "did not exercise reasonable care and prudence in designating a safe place where the plaintiff and other passengers were to take the train east;" that they "were guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries, and did not give the plaintiff any warning whatever with respect to the danger to which he was exposed by virtue of the burning tank;" and, among other things, that "the defendant's officers, in the exercise of reasonable care, ought to have anticipated the plaintiff would leave the east gap, or near there, and go back nearer to the tank, and thus incur unnecessary danger; that the defendant, its officers or agents, knew, or, in the exercise of ordinary prudence should have known, of the plaintiff's position in time to warn him of the danger which threatened on account of the burning tank." The jury found the plaintiff's damages at $2,500. The defendant moved for judgment on the verdict in its favor, which was denied. It then moved to set aside the verdict, and for a new trial, on the grounds, among others, of error in the charge to the jury, and in refusing instructions requested by the defendant's counsel, and that the verdict was adverse to, and not sustained by, the evidence; but the motion was denied, and judgment entered thereon against the defendant, from which it appealed.

Messrs. Thomas Wilson and L. K. Luse for appellant.

Messrs. J. W. Hancock, O. A. Turner, and E. A. Jaggard for respondent.

Pinney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The carrier owes to its passenger, while that relation exists, the duty of providing reasonably safe stations, whether permanent or temporary, where he may await the arrival of trains, as well as the duty to seasonably warn him, when reasonably necessary, of any existing or apprehended danger which may interfere with or imperil his personal safety. The defendant contends it performed towards the plaintiff the full measure of its duty, and that the proximate, or, at least, a contributing, cause of the plaintiff's injury was his own negligence in unnecessarily exposing himself to danger. The point to which the plaintiff and his fellow passengers were directed to go by the defendant's agents, and to which he went as a temporary station, as thus directed, to wait for the train which was to convey him and his fellow passengers eastward to their respective destinations, was the gap opened about 16 rods east of the burning wreck, and at and east of which the mail, express matter, and baggage had been deposited. The wreck and remaining bapthra and the kerosene oil in the oil tank were burning fiercely, and flames were shooting from the joints in the oil tank or car, and flashed up to the height of many feet, making at times a loud, roaring noise. The gaps opened in the right-of-way fence, on the south side of the railway, by which a way had been opened around the burning wreck, diverged to the south, in order to avoid it. The details of the entire scene, about which there is no material dispute, were open and obvious, even to a casual observer, and gave clear and emphatic warning to the humblest intelligence of impending danger from the burning tank of oil. The situation spoke for itself, and in no uncertain tones. The plaintiff had nothing to do but to observe these facts as they appeared before him, and to consult his own safety. His actual transit as a passenger had been interrupted, and, until the train arrived from the east, he was free to go and come as he chose; and the company had no power to restrain him in the least.

1. Whether the company had performed its entire duty towards him, under the circumstances, or not, it was his duty to exercise ordinary care and caution to secure his own safety. The railway company was not an insurer of his personal safety, and it is familiar law that, under the circumstances stated, the duties of the plaintiff and of the defendant to observe proper care and caution are reciprocal. If the plaintiff failed to exercise ordinary care and caution, and by reason of such failure he sustained the injuries complained of, he was guilty of contributory negligence, and must be held to have assumed the consequent risk or danger of injury. Assumption of risk in such cases is a species of contributory negligence. Darcey v. Farmers' Lumber Co. 87 Wis. 249; Nadav v. White River Lumber Co. 76 Wis. 120-131. The plaintiff was in the open country, and under no restraint. Whatever of danger there was, in consequence of the alleged negligence of the defendant, he was free and able to avoid it. It is not a question of what he thought or believed would be safe and prudent, under the circumstances, for him to do. If he unnecessarily exposed himself to a danger, obvious to a person of ordinary care and prudence, and was injured in consequence, he cannot recover. He was an adult, and must be held bound to the exercise of the same care and prudence as a person of ordinary care, intelligence, and judgment. The defendant, on the other hand, had a right to assume that the plaintiff would act with reasonable care and caution, and occupy the position or situation to which he had been conducted; and we are unable to perceive anything in the case to warrant the inference that the defendant had any reason to apprehend that the plaintiff would expose himself to, or incur, unnecessary danger. The actual transit of the plaintiff in the defendant's passenger train having been interrupted, its duty required that it should exercise towards the plaintiff at the temporary station, as it is called, to which he had been directed, such reasonable and proper care as one of ordinary care and prudence would exercise, under the circumstances. The plaintiff appears to have disregarded all the plain and obvious warnings of danger suggested by the facts and circumstances, and which could not have failed, it would seem, to arrest the attention of a person of ordinary intelligence, care, and prudence. The special verdict finds that, if the plaintiff had remained at the place designated, "he would not have been seriously injured," but that he "unnecessarily, and from motives of curiosity and pleasure, went from there to a place much nearer the burning tank," as already indicated, and where he remained twenty minutes, and up to the time of the explosion from which he received his injuries; that "the plaintiff's injuries were caused by reason of his so going nearer the burning tank." It is true that it is found that the defendant, its officers, etc., "in the exercise of ordinary prudence, should have known of the plaintiff's position in time to warn him of the danger which threatened on account of the burning tank," and that in the exercise of reasonable care they ought "to have anticipated that the plaintiff would go nearer to the burning tank, and thus incur unnecessary danger;" and they found that the defendant gave the plaintiff warning with respect to the danger to which he was exposed by virtue of the presence of the burning tank, but that "it was insufficiently or negligently given." The jury acquitted the plaintiff "of any want of ordinary care that contributed to his injury," and found that he was "not guilty of any want of ordinary care, however slight, in so going much nearer the burning oil tank," and that "a reasonably prudent man, under the circumstances, situate as the plaintiff was, with his means of knowledge, would not have anticipated that there was danger of an explosion of the burning oil tank." The verdict finds that the defendant's officers, etc., "by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence, would have anticipated that an explosion might occur," and "did not exercise reasonable care and prudence in designating a safe place where the plaintiff and other passengers were to take the train which was to carry them east," and that, through its officers, etc., it was "guilty of negligence, which was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries."

The verdict is inconsistent and contradictory on vital points, and no judgment should have been entered on it. It was the duty of the defendant to give proper and sufficient warning of actual or apprehended danger; but the evidence tends to show quite clearly that the plaintiff had ample notice, from the situation and circumstances, of the danger to be apprehended from the burning wreck and tank of kerosene. A considerable number of witnesses on the part of the defendant gave evidence tending to show that its agents and servants gave reasonable warning of danger, and indicated where the passengers were to remain; but the plaintiff denied that he heard anything of the kind, and so did two others who testified in his behalf. Aside from this, there was little or no material dispute as to the facts. The question is as to the proper inferences to be drawn from them. The highly inflammable and dangerous character of kerosene is a matter of common knowledge. Its irregular and rapid combustion from a lamp in an ordinary room justly conveys alarm and an immediate sense of danger. Here was an entire tank or car of it; upon a burning wreck, and in a highly heated condition, and flames escaping from joints in the tank. It was liable at any time to explode with great violence and serious injury. It would seem that no notice that could be given would convey more clearly a sense of impending danger than the actual situation, open and obvious to anyone who would make a reasonable use of his senses.

2. The plaintiff cannot recover for injuries caused by the defendant's negligence if he himself failed to exercise proper care, and his own negligence contributed to the result. In Hickey v. Boston & L. R. Co. 14 Allen, 429, the rule we think applicable to the case is stated: That if an injury has happened while a party is occupying a place provided for the accommodation of passengers, nothing further is ordinarily necessary to show due care on his part; but when the evidence shows that he left the place assigned for passengers, and was occupying an exposed position, and "that the injury was due in part to the fact of such position, he must necessarily fail, unless he can also make it appear that by some ground of necessity or propriety his being in that position was consistent with the exercise of proper care or caution on his part." All the adjudged cases agree that a person who seeks to recover for a personal injury sustained by another's negligence must not himself be guilty of negligence which substantially contributes to the result. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Houston, 95 U. S. 697-702, 24 L. ed. 542, 543; Indermaur v. Dames, L. R. 1 C. P. 274, L. R. 2 C. P. 813; Reynolds v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 243, 252. A passenger is not justified in incurring risks unnecessarily, however rare the chances may be that he will suffer by it (Todd v. Old Colony & F. R. R. Co. 8 Allen, 18, 80 Am. Dec. 49); and, "if passengers voluntarily take exposed positions, with no occasion therefor caused by the managers of the road, except a bare license by noninterference or passive permission of the conductor, they take the special risks of that position on themselves." Sweeney v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 868, 87 Am. Dec. 644; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Zebe, 38 Pa. 818-827; Coleman v. Second Ave. R. Co. 114 N. Y. 609, 612, 613. The plaintiff in this case voluntarily, and out of mere curiosity, and for his own pleasure, took an exposed position, not intended or pointed out for passengers, and he cannot hold the defendant liable for injuries to which such act contributed. Torrey v. Boston & A. R. Co. 147 Mass. 412, 418. The defendant and its agents were not bound, under the circumstances of this case, to restrain the plaintiff by physical force, in order to keep him out of manifest danger, which was as obvious to him as to them. It was not negligence on their part that they did not restrain him by physical force from unnecessarily exposing himself to danger from the burning tank of oil. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Zebe, 38 Pa. 827; Hickey v. Boston & L. R. Co. 14 Allen, 433.

3. The relation of carrier and passenger we think existed between the plaintiff and defendant at the time of his injury, although his actual transit as such had been interrupted for the time being, and he had been directed, and had proceeded, to a place on the defendant's premises, to await the arrival of another train upon which to complete his journey. He had not abandoned his right to complete it in the defendant's cars. He had merely taken up, it is claimed, an exposed and dangerous position with reference to the burning tank of oil on the defendant's right of way, which may perhaps, disentitle him to recover on account of the injuries he received.

4. The defendant did nothing, either expressly or by implication, to invite, entice, or allure the plaintiff to the position of danger he appears to have voluntarily and unnecessarily assumed. Neither the impending danger, nor its cause, was concealed. He was not a child of immature years, but an adult, and, as we must assume, of reasonable intelligence, judgment, and prudence. With a full knowledge of the facts, or the means of knowledge before him, he took this position of danger, and kept it for twenty minutes before the explosion, watching the tank and its surroundings, to gratify his curiosity. The case does not come within the rule of Bennett v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 102 U. S. 577, 26 L. ed. 235, and cases there cited. Here there was no pitfall or trap, nor had there been any invitation to the plaintiff, express or implied, to occupy the position he did. He was still under obligation to use reasonable care on his part for his own safety. Nor is the case, for the reason stated, governed by the principles upon which the cases of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745; Keefe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207-211, and Union P. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 282, 38 L. ed. 434,—much relied on by the plaintiff, were decided.

5. In respect to the alleged negligence of the defendant, the court erroneously charged the jury "that it was the duty of the carrier to exercise extraordinary vigilance, aided by the highest skill, and to exercise the highest degree of care, to prevent the interposition of any obstacle to expose the plaintiff to danger while waiting for the train to arrive;" although the court correctly said elsewhere in the charge that the duty the defendant owed to the plaintiff, to protect him from injury from the burning oil tank, was "only that of ordinary care and prudence, and no greater, under like circumstances, than the obligation the plaintiff was under to protect himself from such danger and consequent injury." The charge upon this material point was contradictory and misleading, and constitutes reversible error. A railroad company is held to the highest degree of care in respect to the condition and management of its engines and cars, for negligence in that respect involves extreme peril to passengers, against which they cannot protect themselves. Moreland v. Boston & P. R. Corp. 141 Mass. 81; Morris v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 106 N. Y. 678; Kelly v. Manhattan R. Co. 112 N. Y. 443, 3 L. R. A. 74; Pulmer v. Pennsylvania Co. 111 N. Y. 488, 2 L. R. A. 252. The plaintiff was under no restraint, and was free to adopt such precautions as might seem necessary to protect himself from injury, and the defendant was bound to the exercise of only ordinary care and prudence, in view of the situation and existing circumstances.

6. The questions of negligence on the part of the plaintiff, as well as of the defendant, were, in this case, we think, for the jury in the first instance, under proper instructions from the court. What may be negligence under some circumstances and conditions may not be under others. It is to be inferred from the facts and circumstances given in evidence, and is for the jury, where the conclusion is debatable, or rests in doubt. Langhoff v. Milwaukee & P. du C. R. Co. 19 Wis. 499. If the jury arrive at conclusions wholly unwarranted, the court, in the exercise of sound discretion, may set aside the verdict, and grant a new trial. Valin v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 82 Wis. 5, 6, and cases cited. Judgment could not be given for either party on the verdict, by reason of its being inconsistent and contradictory, or upon the uncontradicted evidence, until the verdict, or the conflicting portions of it, were set aside. The defendant could not have judgment non obstante veredicto. Sheehy v. Duffy, 89 Wis. 18. The defendant, in order to render its main contentions available in this court, should have moved the trial court to set aside the parts of the special verdict not sustained by the evidence, and for judgment on the remainder, and on the uncontradicted evidence. This practice was held proper in Menominee River Sash & Door Co. v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 91 Wis. 447-458. In Schweickhart v. Stuewe, 75 Wis. 160, where the previous cases were cited, it was said that the "utmost extent to which this court has gone in authorizing the trial courts to disregard the special verdict rendered by a jury, when such verdict is wholly unsupported by the evidence, is to set aside such verdict, and then, in its discretion, and not as an absolute duty, to enter judgment in accordance with the undisputed evidence in the case, or to set aside the verdict entirely, and grant a new trial." J. & H. Otagens Co. v. Silber, 87 Wis. 357; Murphey v. Weil, 89 Wis. 150, 151. It is only where there is no evidence to support a material finding that it can be set aside or stricken from the record, but, where it is against the decided preponderance of the evidence, upon setting it aside, there should be a new trial. Sheehy v. Duffy, 89 Wis. 18; Ohtweiler v. Lohmann, 82 Wis. 198; Dahl v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 65 Wis. 371; Annas v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 67 Wis. 60, 58 Am. Rep. 843. This court has no original power to correct or to set aside any part of a special verdict. Its jurisdiction of such matters is appellate only. All applications for that purpose must be made to the trial court. For the reasons stated, there must be a new trial.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST COMPANY,
Respt.,

v.

OREGON PACIFIC RAILROAD COM-PANY et al.,

R. H. Graham et al., Petitioners, Appts.

(.....Or.....)

A railroad mortgagee is not liable for unpaid wages or other obligations incurred by a receiver appointed at the mortgagee's instance in a foreclosure suit, although the trust fund is insufficient to pay them, unless such responsibility was imposed by the court as a condition to the appointment or the continuance of the receiver in office.

(May 1, 1897.)

APPEAL by petitioners from an order of the Circuit Court for Benton County refusing to compel plaintiff to pay their claim for services rendered to a receiver appointed in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage which had been instituted by plaintiff. Affirmed.

Statement by Bean, J.:

This is an appeal from an order of the circuit court of Benton county denying the petition of certain employees of the receivers of the Oregon Pacific Railroad Company for an order requiring the plaintiff in the foreclosure suit in which such receivers were appointed to pay the wages of the petitioners. On October 28, 1890, the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, as trustee for the bondholders of the Oregon Pacific Railroad Company and the Willamette Valley & Coast Railroad Company, commenced a suit in the circuit court of Benton county to foreclose a mortgage on the franchise and property of the defendant corporations, to secure the payment of the bonded indebtedness thereof, amounting, as alleged, to $15,000,000, and, on its motion T. Egerton Hogg, the president of the corporation, was appointed receiver, and clothed by the court with authority to operate the railroad, and receive the income and earnings thereof, and to that end he was empowered from time to time to employ and discharge all needful assistants, managers, clerks, servants, agents, and employees, at such salaries and compensation as he might deem advisable. Under this appointment, Hogg operated the road as a receiver until March 6, 1893, when he was removed, and one Hadley appointed in his place, who continued in the operation thereof, until January 6, 1894, when he was also removed, and another receiver appointed. Under the management of Hogg and Hadley, the earnings of the road were wholly insufficient to pay the expenses of the receivership, and, as a consequence, the wages of the employees were allowed to fall greatly in arrears, so that, at the time of Hadley's removal, there was due the petitioners herein a very large sum for wages, and no funds whatever in the hands of the receiver with which to pay it; and we take it (although not directly averred in the petition) that the receiver had exhausted his power to float receivers' certificates.

Prior to this time, several unsuccessful attempts had been made to dispose of the road under the decree in the foreclosure suit rendered on the 27th of April, 1891. In this condition of affairs some of the employees, despairing, and with reason, as the sequel showed, of ever being able to obtain payment of their wages from the earnings or the corpus of the mortgaged property, filed a petition on January 26, 1894, setting out substantially the facts hereinbefore detailed, and praying an order of the court requiring the plaintiff in the foreclosure suit to deposit in court sufficient money for the payment of their wages. This petition was denied, and hence this appeal.

Mr. George G. Bingham, for appellants:

The receiver is an officer of the court, and his possession is the possession of the court; and the expenses of the receivership as between the parties are disbursements, and these payments are to be provided for in the same manner as other disbursements.

The receiver having been appointed on the petition of respondent to preserve the property for the benefit of respondent as between respondent and the petitioner in this proceeding, respondent is liable for the payment of the expenses of the receivership.

The amounts sought to be recovered here are necessary expenses incurred at the instance of respondent, and respondent is liable in the first instance.

The general rule as to costs, both at law and in equity, is that they shall be adjudged to the successful and against the unsuccessful party.

Radford v. Folsom, 55 Iowa, 276.

The fact that respondent and defendants are great corporations will not change the rules of law applicable to the liability of either of them to pay costs.

Allowances may be made from time to time during the receivership.

Special Bank Comrs. v. Franklin Inst. for Savings, 11 R. I. 557.

NOTE.—As to the liability of a mortgagee for wages of receiver's employees during foreclosure when the assets are insufficient to pay them, the above case is believed to be one of first impression.

For some cases as to the payment of running expenses out of the assets, see note to Decker v. Gardner (N. Y.) 11 L. R. A. 480.

This proceeding is the same as that sanctioned in—

Mitchell & L. Co. v. Downing, 23 Or. 448; Schneider v. Sears, 18 Or. 76; City Bank v. Tucker, 7 Colo. 220; Hill's Code, §§ 554, 555; Outter v. Pollock, 4 N. Dak. 205, 25 L. R. A. 377.

Messrs. Turner, McClure, & Rolston, J. R. Bryson, and H. C. Watson, for respondent:

The commission and expenses of a receiver must be paid out of the fund, and cannot be taxed against the complainant.

Hembree v. Dawson, 18 Or. 474.

When the fund is not sufficient to pay these debts, no one of the parties can be said to be benefited by the receivership, unless, indeed, it be those very claimants, whose rights arose out of the receivership, but for whose existence they would have had no claims.

Quincy, M. & P. R. Co. v. Humphreys, 145 U. S. 97, 36 L. ed. 637; Texas & St. L. R. Co. v. Rust, 17 Fed. Rep. 275; Central Trust Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 803; Ames v. Union P. R. Co. 60 Fed. Rep. 966; New York, P. & O. R. Co. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 58 Fed. Rep. 278.

The character of receivers is really two fold: Firstly, they take charge of the property, to hold it pending the litigation. In this respect they resemble a sheriff, and their custody is in the nature of an equitable execution. Secondly, they operate the property, as the railroad company would have had to do, for the protection of the rights of public and parties alike. In this latter respect their position is peculiar. They are sui generis, and so are their contracts.

Vanderbilt v. Central R. Co. 43 N. J. Eq. 669.

Their debts incurred in the operation of the property are chargeable as a lien upon it.

Wallace v. Loomis, 97 U. S. 162, 24 L. ed. 901.

But beyond the giving to these receivers' debts a lien upon the property, the court cannot go.

Bean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is, so far as we can ascertain, the first recorded instance in the judicial history of railroad receiverships in which the trust fund was insufficient to pay the employees of the receiver engaged in the operation of the road; and hence we are unaided in the determination of the question before us by any judicial decision directly in point. The contention of the petitioners seems to be that a receiver of a railroad appointed in a suit to foreclose a mortgage on the road, and clothed with authority to operate it, is as much the representative of the plaintiff as a sheriff who levies upon property under a writ of attachment, and that the operating expenses incurred by him are costs or fees of the litigation, and, like the fees of the sheriff in the case referred to, are collectible from the plaintiff. But this argument is based upon an entire misapprehension of a railroad receivers' position and duties. He is not, like a sheriff in an attachment action, the agent of the plaintiff in the litigation, nor does the plaintiff have any control or authority over him whatever. He is agent and executive officer of the court, which, by virtue of its high prerogative powers, lays its judicial hand upon the property which is the subject of controversy and controls and operates it for the use and benefit, not of either of the parties to the litigation, but for the public and whomsoever in the end it may concern. His acts and possession are the acts and possession of the court. His contracts and liabilities in contemplation of law are the contracts and liabilities of the court. The parties to the litigation have not the least authority over him; nor have they any right to determine what liabilities he may or may not incur. His authority is derived solely from the act of the court appointing him, and he is the subject of its order only. "A receiver of a railroad," says Mr. Justice Caldwell, is a person appointed to receive and preserve the property of a railroad company, and is clothed with authority to operate the railroad and receive the earnings and income therefrom during the pendency of the foreclosure suit. In contemplation of law, the railroad is in the custody of, and operated by, the court appointing the receiver. The receiver is the agent of the court. He is an officer of the court and his possession of the property is the possession of the court. He is not the agent of either party to the suit, and neither party is responsible for his contracts or for his malfeasance or misfeasance in office. . . . The liabilities incurred by the receiver in the operation of the road are, strictly speaking, the liabilities of the court appointing the receiver." 30 Am. L. Rev. 161. And in Quincy, M. & P. R. Co. v. Humphreys, 145 U. S. 82, 36 L. ed. 632, the court, speaking of the Wabash receivers, said: "They were ministerial officers appointed by the court of chancery to take possession of and preserve pendente lite, the fund or property in litigation; mere custodians, coming within the rules stated in Union Nat. Bank v. Bank of Kansas City, 136 U. S. 223, 236, 34 L. ed. 344, 346, where this court said: 'A receiver derives his authority from the act of the court appointing him, and not from the act of the parties at whose suggestion or by whose consent he is appointed; and the utmost effect of his appointment is to put the property from that time into his custody as an officer of the court, for the benefit of the party ultimately proved to be entitled, but not to change the title, or even the right of possession in the property.'" So, also, in the case of New York, P. & O. R. Co. v. New York, L.

E. & W. R. Co. 58 Fed. Rep. 268, it is said: "Receivers are but officers and agents of the court. While necessarily much is committed to their judgment and discretion, yet their power depends upon the decrees and directions of the courts appointing them. Receiverships of railroad properties are in a large part peculiar appointments. Railroads, as public carriers, are charged with great public duties, and the public are interested that their operation shall be continuous. Creditors are likewise interested that there shall be no cessation in their maintenance as going concerns, because their value as property depends upon the active use of the line. These considerations have developed the present well-settled proposition that such receivers are the mere custodians of the property, and hold for and as mere agents of the court. Speaking of the character of such trustees, and the effect of such holding upon the interests procuring the appointment, Chief Justice Waite said: "The possession taken by the receiver is only that of the court, whose officer he is, and adds nothing to the previously existing title of the mortgagees. He holds, pending the litigation, for the benefit of whomsoever in the end it shall be found to concern, and in the meantime the court proceeds to determine the rights of the parties upon the same principles it would if no change of possession had taken place." Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 251, 25 L. ed. 343; Quincy, M. & P. R. Co. v. Humphreys, 145 U. S. 82, 36 L. ed. 632. A receiver represents no particular interest or class of interests. He holds for the benefit of all who may ultimately show an interest in the property. He stands no more for the creditor than the owner. They are not assignees, and the principles of common law applicable to assignees do not define or determine the character of a receiver's possession, or its effects upon the rights of those interested in the property in their possession. Receivers ought not to be appointed to represent the peculiar interests of one class." To the same effect, see Texas & St. L. R. Co. v. Rust, 17 Fed. Rep. 275; Central Trust Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 863; Ames v. Union Pac. R. Co. 60 Fed. Rep. 966; and Union Trust Co. v. Illinois Midland R. Co. 117 U. S. 455, 29 L. ed. 970.

A railroad receiver is therefore more than a mere custodian of the property, like a sheriff holding under a writ of attachment or execution. He is, in effect, the hand of the court, which holds the property while it operates the road pending the litigation for the benefit of the general public, as well as the creditors of the insolvent corporation. It is for this reason that the expenses of the receivership are chargeable as a lien upon the property superior to all other liens. The plaintiff, at whose instance the receiver is appointed, thereby consents to the absolute control and management of the mortgaged property by the court and its agents and to the priority of claims for the expenses incurred in its operation and management; but it is not perceived upon what ground it can be claimed that, because the expenses of the receivership are allowed without any fault of his to exceed the value of the mortgaged property thus entirely destroying his security, he must, in addition to the loss of his debt, be compelled to make good the deficit, unless the order of appointment was made upon that condition. He has no control over the acts of the receiver, and if, without his consent, he is to be held responsible therefor, he is liable to absolute bankruptcy and ruin. Such a rule would render the plaintiff's position so uncertain and precarious as practically to preclude him from any protection whatever through the appointment of a receiver pending the foreclosure suit. But the inquiry is made, Shall not a railroad mortgagee who applies for and obtains the appointment of a receiver, with authority to operate the road, be held responsible for the liabilities incurred by such officer when they cannot be made out of the property itself? We think not, unless such responsibility was imposed as a condition to the appointment or the continuance of the receiver in office. The appointment of a receiver in a suit to foreclose a railroad mortgage is not a matter of strict right, but rests in the sound judicial discretion of the court; and it may, as a condition to issuing the necessary order, impose such terms as may, under the circumstances of the particular case, appear to be reasonable, and, if not acceded to, may refuse to make the order. 80 Am. L. Rev. 161; Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 255, 25 L. ed. 399. If, therefore, upon an application for the appointment of a railroad receiver, it appears probable that the income and corpus will prove insufficient to pay the expenses and liabilities thereof, we have no doubt that the court may require the plaintiff, as a condition to such appointment, a guaranty of the payment of the expenses of such officer. And if, at any time after the appointment has been made, it becomes apparent to the court that it will be unable to pay and discharge the present or future liabilities incurred by its executive officer and manager, it should refuse to continue the operation of the road under the receiver, unless its expenses are guaranteed. No court is bound or ought to engage or continue in the operation of a railroad or any other enterprise without the ability to promptly discharge its obligations, and, unless it can do so, it should keep out, or immediately go out of the business. But, unless such terms are imposed as a condition of the appointment or continuation in office of the receiver, his employees must look to the property in the custody of the court and its income for their compensation. They have no claim whatever on any of the parties to the litigation. They are the employees and servants of the court, and not of the parties. Their wages are in no sense costs of the litigation; and, although incurred during the progress of the suit, they are not incurred in the suit. They are neither expenses of the plaintiff, nor of the defendant, and are not fees or costs which can be charged against the successful party to the litigation, as is sought to be done in this case.

It follows that the order appealed from must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

WEST MEMPHIS PACKET COMPANY

et al., App'ls.,

v.

B. WHITE.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. A charge is not erroneous because of generalization and abstractions which lead up to the statement of the law determining the rights and responsibilities of the parties on the issues of fact involved.
2. The lawfulness of the act of a passenger on an excursion boat in using his gun with a loaded shell will not excuse the owners of the boat from liability for an injury resulting in such passenger's negligence or lack of caution, provided his action is such as to excite apprehension in a reasonably prudent person.
3. The owner of a steamboat is required to exercise the utmost vigilance and diligence in protecting its passengers from injuries from another passenger by the negligent and careless use of a loaded gun exhibited by him, where under all the circumstances such owner or his officers and agents might reasonably have expected or anticipated the injury.
4. An instruction in an action against a steamboat company for personal injuries to a passenger, that the evidence must satisfy them that the boat was being run by and in the interest of defendant at the time of the injury, sufficiently presents the theory that the excursion during which plaintiff was injured was an individual affair of a third person for which the company was not liable.
5. A verdict for $3,500 for an injury to a laborer who is shot in the finger and through his thumb, and whose right arm is perforated with shot from the shoulder to his hand, many of which are never extracted, and whose right leg also receives several shot by which his capacity for lifting is permanently affected, is not excessive.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Shelby County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William M. Randolph & Sons,
for appellants:

The motion to exclude the plaintiff's evidence from the jury was proper.

The issues of fact passed upon by a jury in a civil case will not be considered in the supreme court, unless the error assigned is that there is no evidence to sustain the verdict.

Kirkpatrick v. Jenkins, 96 Tenn. 87.

In order to impeach the verdict successfully on the ground that there is no evidence, the complaining party must take as true the strongest legitimate view of the testimony against him, and show that it affords no support for the finding of the jury.

The evidence is fatally defective in two particulars: (1) It does not show that the defendants, or either of them, were in charge of or operating the steamer Golden Gate, when the injury was done the plaintiff, or were in any way chargeable for the misconduct of the steamboat, or those managing it when that injury occurred. (2) There is no evidence whatever that any officer, agent, or servant or employee of the steamboat Golden Gate brought about or participated in the particular act which resulted in the injury to the plaintiff, of which he complains in his declaration, nor that any such officer, agent, servant, or employee knew of, or had notice of the probable occurrence of the act, which brought about such injury, or any opportunity or means of anticipating or preventing the same.

If a person simply adds to the signature of his name "agent," "trustee," "treasurer," without disclosing his principal, he is personally bound.

De Bian v. Gola (Md.) 24 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 777.

It is a difficult and delicate task to state, hypothetically, to a jury the proof relied on by the opposite sides, so that each side shall feel that his evidence has been fully and fairly arrayed; yet such is the duty to be performed, unless a special verdict is ordered.

Phillipi was not a servant or agent or representative of the defendants, or of the Golden Gate. He was a third party, acting only for himself, and the liability of the defendants, if any exists, grows simply out of the fact that they neglected some duty they owed White, the plaintiff, in not preventing Phillipi's exploding the cartridge in the gun which wounded White.

In such a case the liability results exclusively from the negligence of the party sought to be charged—the defendants here—and if the evidence discloses no such negligence, no cause of action exists.

An action is maintainable only "where (1) there is a misfeasance or negligence in some particular as to which there was a duty toward the party injured or the community generally; and (2), where it is apparent that the harm to the person or property of another which has actually ensued was reasonably likely to ensue from the act or omission complained of.

The defendants have done nothing, and have omitted nothing, directly injuring White, but his injury is admitted to have proceeded from Phillipi.

No case can be found where a steamboatman is held liable to one passenger for what may be termed the careless or negligent acts of another passenger, in which the steamboatman does not participate, and of which he has no knowledge or notice, and no means or opportunity of preventing, and that the steamboatman's rules or the absence of rules on the particular subject have nothing to do with the question.

Beard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit for damages, brought by the defendant in error against the West Memphis Packet Company and the Memphis & Arkansas Ferry Company; the gravamen of the complaint being that, while a passenger on the steamboat Golden Gate, operated, as is alleged, by and in the joint interest of plaintiffs in error, owing to the failure of their servants to preserve order and decorum on this boat, the defendant in error was severely injured by a shot fired from a gun negligently handled by a fellow passenger. Upon pleas which made issues upon all the material averments in this declaration a trial was had, which resulted in a verdict of $3,500 against both plaintiffs in error, from the judgment on which they have prosecuted their appeal to this court.

As to the facts, it is only necessary to say that the evidence tended to show that plaintiffs in error were rival corporations, operating different streams, doing a ferry business from Memphis to different points on the west shore of the Mississippi river, and something of a coasting trade as well, and at the same time giving occasional excursions for revenue, to which the public were invited; that this rivalry was attended with much loss, and at last resulted in litigation; that, pending this litigation, they came together, and entered into an agreement by which the West Memphis Packet Company was to retire and tie up its steamer the C. B. Bryan until necessity should call it out, and that the Memphis & Arkansas Ferry Company should continue its steamer the Golden Gate in operation, and that it was to do the work theretofore done by the two steamers, in the interest of both companies, they sharing the losses and profits; that this agreement provided for a board of arbitrators, who should choose the officers of the combination and the employees to man this boat; that this board was never constituted, but that all officers of the Memphis & Arkansas Ferry Company, as well as crew of the Golden Gate, were retained by the combination, and C. B. Bryan, of the West Memphis Packet Company, was made treasurer of this combination. The evidence further discloses that one of the general officers of the company owning the Golden Gate, and engaged in operating this steamer, was one James Couch; that he, through the newspapers of Memphis, advertised that an excursion would be given by that boat to a point some 20 miles below Memphis; that this advertisement had general publicity, and was known to Mr. Bryan of the West Memphis Packet Company, and treasurer of the combination, several days before it occurred, and he made no objection to it; that while both boats before the combination made similar excursions, in the interest of the rival companies, such as occurred afterwards were made by the Golden Gate on joint account; and that the proceeds of this excursion were paid by Couch into the treasury of the Memphis & Arkansas Ferry Company. The evidence also discloses that the defendant in error, with his children, in company with 75 or 100 other persons, of all ages and both sexes, embarked as passengers on this excursion, and that among these pas-passengers were a number who were armed with guns and pistols, who, occupying positions on the different decks of the boat, soon after it left its moorings and got under way, began an indiscriminate firing at objects in the water, to the great alarm of many persons on board. At this time the defendant in error was seated on the middle deck, where he was directed by Couch to go, and where many of the other passengers were. He was seated with one of his children on his knee, and the others near by, while on the deck above were a party of three or four persons who were practising with their guns. One of these parties, a passenger named Phillippi, while manipulating a repeating gun, for the purpose of exhibiting its construction and movements to those persons immediately around him, placed a loaded shell in one of the chambers of the cylinder, which, while the muzzle of the gun was pointed down, in some unknown and accidental way exploded, the shot therefrom passing through the thin covering or roof of the hurricane deck into the body of White and the child in his arms, inflicting the injuries for which he here sues, and a mortal wound on the child. Among the persons standing near Phillippi, watching and interested in the experiment, was Couch, the party who advertised the excursion. The evidence shows that not only he had not endeavored to stop the firing, but he had encouraged it by actively participating in it. The contention of the plaintiffs in error was that this excursion was an individual enterprise of Couch's, in which their combination was not interested, and also that Couch was not the master, nor in charge of the boat, on this excursion; but there was evidence tending to show otherwise, and upon which, with the various issues of fact, the jury could—and, it must be assumed in this court, did—rest their verdict. This is equally true with regard to the other issues of fact passed upon in the court below.

After the evidence of the plaintiff below was in, the defendants below moved the court to exclude it from the jury, upon the ground that it would not support a verdict in his favor. This motion was overruled, and the action of the court in this regard is assigned for error; and an earnest argument is submitted, insisting upon this as a proper practice in this state. Whether the practice is a wise one, and as such should be adopted, it is not necessary for us to determine. It is sufficient to say that it has never prevailed in Tennessee, and there was certainly nothing in the testimony, as we read it in this record, which would have warranted its introduction and application in this case.

A sweeping objection is made to the charge of the trial judge,—that it abounds in generalities without application to the facts of the case, and that its effect was to confuse or mislead the jury, rather than guide them to an intelligent verdict. We have carefully examined this charge, in view of the interest involved and the hurt that could easily in such a case be unnecessarily inflicted by the trial judge on plaintiffs in error, and, while we find in it more or less of generalization and abstraction, which it would have been wiser to avoid, yet we do not regard it as amenable to this criticism. While general or abstract propositions are stated, it is with a purpose, as we understand it, to illustrate and emphasize the relations of a carrier to his passengers, and their respective rights and responsibilities, and we are not able to discover, in doing this, that the jury were led to the consideration of false, or left to grope in the dark as to the true, issues. Whatever generalizations are indulged in, they led up to the statement of the law which determined the rights and responsibilities of the parties upon the issues of facts presented in the record, and in language within the easy apprehension of the jury.

Among the instructions given, and which it is now insisted were either misleading generalities or else positively erroneous when applied to the facts of this case, is the following: "The lawfulness of an act from which injury results is no excuse for the negligence, unskillfulness, or incaution of the party. Every one in the exercise of a lawful act is bound to use such reasonable and vigilant precaution as that no injury may be done to others. Nor is it material in this action whether the injury was wilful or not, but the gist of the action is whether or not the defendant used proper care in allowing the passengers using guns to use them in the manner the evidence shows they did use them on this trip." It is conceded that if this was an action against the party who placed the loaded shell in the gun, and pointed it downward towards defendant in error, when it was discharged, to his hurt, the fact that the explosion was unexpected and accidental would not discharge such party from liability; for the rule admittedly is well settled that, "if the injury is not the effect of an unavoidable accident, a person by whom it is inflicted is liable to respond in damages to the sufferer." Talty v. Ayres, 8 Sneed, 677. While this is conceded to be a sound principle, yet it is insisted it has no application to this case, and that the effect of the court's instruction is to make the plaintiffs in error liable for the incaution of Phillippi however blameless they themselves might be. We do not think so. It is true the court does say to the jury, in substance, that the lawfulness of an act will not excuse incaution or negligence in its performance, yet he distinctly informs them that the right of recovery in this action depends upon whether plaintiffs in error exercised proper care in allowing Phillippi to use the gun in the manner disclosed. Apparently to guard against all misapprehension on this point, a little further along the trial judge said: "If the conduct of the passengers was such as to create in the minds of any reasonable person any apprehension of danger, then the officer would be justified in permitting the passengers their course of conduct, and cannot be charged with negligence in so doing, or made liable for injuries resulting therefrom." In other words, while saying to the jury that, however lawful it might be in Phillippi to manipulate his gun, even with a loaded shell, on an excursion boat, with men, women, and children on board, yet this would not excuse the injury resulting in his incaution or negligence in doing the act, but the right of recovery against plaintiffs in error depended upon whether they had been careless or negligent in permitting Phillippi to make this experiment, and the trial judge cautions the jury that they would not be negligent, if there was nothing in the action of Phillippi to excite apprehension in a reasonably prudent person. Thus regarded, we have no doubt of the soundness of the proposition charged.

It is next insisted that there was error in giving the following instructions: "While he [the carrier] is not an insurer, or bound to carry passengers safely at all events, yet the rule as to the care and foresight to be exercised makes him responsible for injuries and losses arising from even the slightest negligence in not providing safe and suitable means of transportation, or skilled, competent, and careful officers and crew, or in formulating and enforcing such rules of order and decorum as will secure and protect the passengers from injuries arising from careless, thoughtless, or negligent acts of their fellow passengers. The defendants in this case were bound to exercise the utmost care and vigilance for maintaining order and guarding the plaintiff, White, who was a passenger on board the boat, against personal injury, from whatever source arising, which might reasonably have been expected to occur, in view of all the circumstances of the case, and the number and character of the passengers on board the boat." It will be seen that the trial judge lays down the rule which requires the exercise of the utmost vigilance and diligence on the part of the boat's officers and agents in protecting the defendant in error, yet he carefully limits its operation to cases of danger which, under all the circumstances, they might reasonably have expected or anticipated. He does not make them insurers, and liable at all hazards, but in effect tells the jury that they were bound, and only bound, to give to the protection of defendant in error the utmost care and vigilance against a danger which prudence would suggest as possible to occur under the circumstances of the case. We are satisfied, not only that this language could not have been misunderstood but that it announced the law. In the leading case in America of Flint v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co. 6 Blatchf. 158, 84 Conn. 554 [Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co. v. Flint], 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 8, 20 L. ed. 556, Justice Shipman, in submitting to the jury a case involving the liability of a steamer and its owners for an injury sustained by one passenger from the act of a fellow passenger, said: "The defendants were bound to exercise the utmost vigilance and care, in maintaining order and guarding the passengers against violence from whatsoever source arising, which might reasonably be anticipated, or naturally be expected to occur, in view of all the circumstances, and of the number and character of the persons on board." This is regarded as a fair statement of the rule, and it has been adopted and approved by the courts where they have had occasion to deal with this question. See Goddard v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 57 Me. 203, 2 Am. Rep. 39; Stewart v. Brooklyn & C. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 588, 43 Am. Rep. 185; New Orleans, St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Burke, 53 Miss. 200, 24 Am. Rep. 689. See note to Meyer v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 4 C. C. A. 281, 10 U. S. App. 677, 54 Fed. Rep. 116.

But it is contended that this rule of the "utmost vigilance" may be sound when applied to the protection of passengers against injuries resulting from faulty machinery or wrongful acts of the employees of the carrier, yet it does not apply to injuries arising from the misconduct of fellow passengers; that in the class of cases embracing the latter, "reasonable diligence" is the measure of liability. This distinction was insisted on in Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Hinds, 53 Pa. 512, 91 Am. Dec. 224, and there rejected; the court saying that, if the employees of the carrier had no control or power over the passengers, the argument would be sound. The case of Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Pillsbury, 128 Ill. 9, is relied upon as authority for this contention; but it will be found that the trial judge there gave in charge to the jury the rule of "utmost vigilance," and the judgment on a verdict following his instruction was affirmed. While there will be found some general observations of the court which give some support to the view here insisted upon, yet, taking the opinion as a whole, we think it in line with Flint v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co. 6 Blatchf. 158. The court, says: "It is the duty of carriers by rail to preserve order in their carriage, and to protect passengers from all danger, from whatever source arising on their trains. . . . [But], with regard to danger and hazard to travel arising otherwise than on the train, and not incidents of such travel," as was the case there, the degree of care required will depend upon the attendant circumstances. Yet "in no case," continues the court, "must the carrier expose the passenger to extra hazardous dangers that might readily be discovered or anticipated by all reasonable care and diligence." It is well to observe, also, that the injury to the passenger complained of in that case was one that resulted from an invasion of the cars by a violent mob from the outside, and the general observations of the trial judge here relied on were addressed particularly to that phase of the facts. In Simmons v. New Bedford, V. & N. S. B. Co. 97 Mass. 361, 98 Am. Dec. 99, the court does make a distinction in the degree of care to be exercised in the one case and then in the other. The court there says: "The defendants were bound to see that their officers, agents, and servants, used the utmost care and diligence in keeping the steamboat constantly provided with suitable machinery, boats, . . . and competent officers and crew, . . . and in making all the arrangements necessary to secure the passengers against any danger which might reasonably be anticipated from the action of the winds and seas, of the officers, . . . or of other passengers. They were not indeed responsible for the negligent or wrongful acts of the passengers to the same extent as for those of their own officers and crew. . . . And they were bound to use the utmost skill and care of prudent men in taking precautions to prevent any passenger from being injured by the ignorant, negligent, or reckless acts of other passengers." It will be seen that there is a slightly appreciable difference in the degrees of care exacted in the two classes of cases and it falls far short of the modification of the rule insisted on by the plaintiffs in error. Nor do we see any sound reason for such modification. On the contrary, we think that carriers by land as well as on the water, with power conferred by law to protect passengers who have committed themselves to their care, ought to be held to the greater degree of diligence in guarding them from the negligence as well as violence of their fellow passengers, when, as prudent men, knowing the surrounding facts, they might well anticipate, from the attendant circumstances, that the acts in question might be attended with injury. And we certainly find nothing in the facts of this case, especially so far as the Memphis & Arkansas Ferry Company is concerned that should induce a relaxation of the rule, as we think the conduct of the parties in charge of this boat was only a little short of gross negligence.

But, again, it is contended that this rule of "utmost care" had been enforced alone in cases where passengers had received injuries from mobs, riots, or from assaults or other form of violence of drunken or insane parties, and never in cases where the injury resulted from the negligence of a fellow passenger. In this contention the counsel for the carrier is also in error. Simmons v. New Bedford, V. & N. S. B. Co. 97 Mass. 361, 93 Am. Dec. 99, is a leading case enforcing a contrary view. In that case plaintiff was a passenger on the steamboat, and took a position on deck, as he had the right to do, and at a point underneath a small boat which was suspended by tackle and falls, a part of the necessary equipment of the steamer. There was nothing in the evidence to indicate that this small boat was improperly hung or insecurely fastened. The plaintiff showed, however, that when he took his position there were already two persons in this boat, and that shortly after this number was increased to five. It was also in evidence that passengers, before the day in question, rode in this boat, with the knowledge and permission of the officers of the steamer. While plaintiff was standing under it, the stern bolt broke, and it fell on plaintiff, and injured him seriously. The court says: "They [the steamboat company] were bound to use the utmost skill and care of prudent men in taking precautions to prevent any passenger from being injured by the ignorant, negligent, or reckless acts of other passengers. As to the boat, the fact that it was hung in the place in which it was by order of the government inspector did not protect the defendants from responsibility for negligence in the manner of hanging or using it. They were still bound to use the utmost skill and care, consistent with the nature and extent of their business, in so keeping it secured and preventing passengers from getting into it, as to guard against injury by its falling upon a passenger from any cause, including careless or irregular acts of other passengers, which might reasonably be anticipated." In Carpenter v. Boston & A. R. Co. 97 N. Y. 494, 49 Am. Rep. 540, the same rule was applied. There a passenger, while entering a station for the purpose of taking a train, was struck by a mail bag carelessly and negligently thrown from the mail car by a postal clerk employed by the United States government; and it was held that the clerk and the injured party were fellow passengers, that the railroad owed the duty of utmost vigilance to protect the one from an injury resulting from the negligence of the other, that the manner of throwing off these mail bags was dangerous, and that this had been so long the customary method of disposing of them that notice to the railroad company might be fairly implied. On the same point see Galloway v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 56 Minn. 346, 23 L. R. A. 442.

A number of special requests were submitted by plaintiffs in error, some of which were rejected, and others given in a modified form. As we are satisfied with the general charge, only one of these will be noticed. The trial judge was asked, and declined, to give the following: "If the jury believe, from the evidence, that the defendant the West Memphis Packet Company did not own and had no interest in the steamboat Golden Gate, and had nothing to do with the running or navigating of the said steamboat on the occasion alleged in the said declaration, . . . then the jury will find for the defendant the West Memphis Packet Company." The real contention of both plaintiffs in error in the progress of this cause has been that this excursion was an individual affair of Couch's, for which neither was responsible, with the additional incidental insistence of the West Memphis Packet Company that it was not liable because the Golden Gate was not managed by the regular officers of the Memphis & Arkansas Ferry Company, who were for the time being the officers of the joint enterprise. Both phases of this contention were submitted sufficiently to the jury. In the outset of his charge the trial judge says distinctly to the jury that, among other essentials to recovery by plaintiff below, the "evidence must satisfy you [them] that the Golden Gate was being run by and in the interest of defendants at the time of the injury." This clearly put the burden on the plaintiff below of showing that the West Memphis Packet Company was interested in this venture as a prerequisite to recovery, and in this sentence the trial judge covers the point to which this special request was directed. The same reply may be made as to the refusal of the trial judge to give the further special request as to the liability of the Memphis & Arkansas Ferry Company, with this addition: that in granting the fifth special request of the company, even with the qualification attached, the fourth special request was more than covered, and left nothing that this company could complain of on this point.

But we are asked to reverse this judgment upon the ground that the verdict is excessive. The testimony shows that the defendant in error received shot in the finger, and through the thumb of his left hand, and that his right arm was perforated from his shoulder to his hand with shot, a great number of which were never extracted. It also appears that several shot entered the right leg, and one at the joint of left ankle. The surgeon who attended him said he regarded the wounds as not at all serious; yet there is testimony, upon which the jury was warranted in acting, that this injury has permanently affected his strength, and especially his capacity for lifting,—a power very valuable to him as a laboring man. This question of damages was one peculiarly for the jury, and in the absence of a conviction that their verdict is the result of caprice, prejudice, or corruption, we do not feel authorized to interfere with it.

Judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

I. Presumption as to revocation of missing will.

a. Generally.

The presumption that a will is revoked arises where a will is not shown to be in existence at the death of the testator, and this presumption, although not conclusive, must be overcome.

So, where a will was traced to the possession of the testator and was not found after his death, it was presumed that it was destroyed by the testator animo revocandi, under N. Y. Rev. Stat. 67, § 67, providing that no will shall be proved as a lost or destroyed will unless the same shall be proved to have been in existence at the time of the death of the testator or be shown to have been fraudulently destroyed in his lifetime. Bulkley v. Redmond, 2 Bradf. 281.

And under this statute it was held that a will could not be established where it was destroyed by the testator's wife in his presence, and not fraudulently. Timon v. Claffy, 45 Barb. 498.

So, under this statute, where a will was duly executed and in the custody of the testatrix, and was not found after her death, the presumption was that it was destroyed by her animo revocandi, and it could not be proved as a lost will unless it was shown to have been in existence at the time of the death of the testatrix, or to have been fraudulently destroyed in her lifetime. Re Marsh, 45 Hun. 107; Betts v. Jackson, Brown, 6 Wend. 173; Idley v. Bowen, 11 Wend. 236; Knapp v. Knapp, 10 N. Y. 276.

And under the same section (3 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 5th ed. 144), a lost will could not be admitted to probate where there was no evidence that the testator had not destroyed it. Re Nichols, 40 Hun. 287.

In Snider v. Burks, 34 Ala. 53, it was said that the presumption that a will was revoked applied where it was traced to the testator's possession and could not be found after his death, but if not in his possession the presumption did not apply.

And where a will was traced to the possession of a decedent, and could not be found, the presumption 38 L. R. A.

2. The testimony of a witness as to the contents of a will, his knowledge being derived from testator's reading the will to him, and not from having himself inspected it, is in effect only testimony as to the testator's declarations.

3. Such declarations, it seems, are admissible to corroborate more direct evidence.

4. Attorney's fees cannot be allowed in the contest proceedings to unsuccessful proponents of a will. If such proponents are entitled to reimbursement out of the estate, it must be tion was that it had been destroyed animo revocandi. Holland v. Ferris, 2 Bradf. 384.

And the presumption of revocation in the case of a lost will prevailed, where there was no evidence to overcome the same. Mercer v. Mercer, 37 Ky. 21.

So, it was not enough to show that someone other than the testator had an opportunity and motive to destroy the will, where it was not traced out of the possession of the testator. In such a case it would be presumed to have been revoked. Blüble's Estate, 3 Pa. Dist. R. 16.

In Schultz v. Schultz, 35 N. Y. 653, 91 Am. Dec. 38, it was said: "If the will had remained in the custody of the testator, or it had appeared that, after its execution, he had access to it, the presumption of law would be, from the fact that it could not be found after his decease, that the same had been destroyed by him, animo revocandi."

And it was held not sufficient to establish the fraudulent destruction of a will, to show that persons interested had opportunity to destroy it. Collyer v. Collyer, 110 N. Y. 481.

So, under Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1330, providing that no will shall be proved as a lost or destroyed will, unless the same is proved to have been in existence at the time of the death of the testator, or is shown to have been fraudulently destroyed in the life time of the testator, nor unless its provisions are clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses, the probate of a lost will was set aside where it was proved to have been burned before the testator's death; but there was no averment in the petition that it was fraudulently destroyed, and the contestant was not called upon to meet any issue of that kind. Kidder's Estate, 37 Cal. 282.

And where a will was found with the seal cut off the same, the presumption was that it was revoked. Lambell v. Lambell, 3 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 568; Hare v. Nasmyth, 3 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 192, note.

And the fact that a will was found mutilated raised the presumption that it was revoked, which presumption should be overcome by evidence. Roberts v. Round, 3 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 552.

Where the testatrix lost her will and directed the scrivener to prepare another to take its place, and to keep it to prevent it from being lost, and her husband induced him to give it up about two weeks before she died, and it could not be found after her death, it was a question for the jury whether or not the will was destroyed. Re Soule, 40 N. Y. S. R. 600.

And the probate of a draft of a first codicil was refused where a will and second codicil were found, but the first codicil could not be found, although the residuary legatee who would be prejudiced by the draft forming part of the probate had consented to its probate. The court held that the presumption of revocation was not overcome. Goods of Shaw, 1 Swab. & T. 62.

So, in Brown v. Brown, 8 El. & Bl. 373, 27 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 173, 4 Jur. N. S. 163, it was said that parol evidence was admissible to prove a lost will, the weight of which evidence was to be a had in the course of administration, and after administration granted.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Marquette, Dewese, & Hall, and G. M. Lambertson for plaintiffs in error.

question for the jury. But the will was not established in this case because the presumption that it was destroyed by the testator was not overcome.

And in Dawson v. Smith, 3 Honst. (Del.) 335, it was held that proof of the execution of a will and of its contents, and a diligent search for it after the death of the testator without its having been found, was sufficient ground for the admission of parol evidence to prove the substance and contents, and the presumption that the testator destroyed the will, because it was not found, was purely a question of fact to be determined by the jury.

And where a will was lost or destroyed in the testator's lifetime, and its loss was known to him months before his death, the probate of the same could not be established by evidence of its contents. Deaves's Estate, 140 Pa. 242.

And before probate of a lost will was allowed the court required that an advertisement be made offering a reward for the production of the will. Goods of Callaghan, Jr. L. R. 13 Eq. 245.

But where the testator had stopped before he had torn the will in pieces it was no revocation. Doe, Perkes, v. Perkes, 3 Barn. & Ald. 489.

And the fact that a testator knew a few days before his death that his will was lost, was not sufficient to make the deduction that the will was revoked, although he did not renew it in writing. Steele v. Price, 5 B. Mon. 58.

And the presumption that a will was destroyed did not arise where the evidence did not satisfy the court that it was not in existence at the time of the testator's death. Finch v. Finch, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 371, 36 L. J. Prob. N. S. 78, 16 L. T. N. S. 268, 15 Week. Rep. 797.

In Re Waldron, 19 Misc. 333, the question of testator's competency when he destroyed his will was involved, but such questions do not come within the scope of this note.

b. Burden of proof.

The burden of proof is on the propounders of a lost or destroyed will to show that it was in existence at the death of the alleged testator, or was destroyed in his lifetime without his consent or knowledge, in order to overcome the presumption of revocation.

The legal presumption where the will is last seen in the possession of the testator and cannot be found after his death is that he destroyed it for the purpose of revocation, and the burden of proof is on the propounders to overthrow that presumption. Re Nichols, 40 Hun. 387; Collyer v. Collyer, 110 N. Y. 481; Idley v. Bowen, 11 Wend. 227; Betts v. Jackson, Brown, 6 Wend. 173; Holland v. Ferris, 2 Bradf. 334; Knapp v. Knapp, 10 N. Y. 276; Schultz v. Schultz, 35 N. Y. 653, 91 Am. Dec. 88; Hatch v. Sigman, 1 Dem. 519; Lorley v. Jackson, 3 Phillim. Eccl. Rep. 123; Behrens v. Behrens, 47 Ohio St. 323; Foster's Appeal, 87 Pa. 67, 30 Am. Rep. 340; Minkler v. Minkler, 14 Vt. 126; Minor v. Guthrie (Ky.) 4 S. W. 179; Wargent v. Hollings, 4 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 245; Lillie v. Lillie, 3 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 184; Pinhalow v. Robinson, 3 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 182, note; 88 L. R. A.

Messrs. Sawyer, Snell, & Frost and Charles O. Whedon, for defendants in error:

The burden lies on the proponents to show that the will cannot be found, and that a diligent but unsuccessful search has been made for it.

Mercer v. Mackin, 14 Bush. 439.

When the proof fails to show that a will last known to have been in the possession of the testator was not among his effects at his death, there is no presumption either that he had or that he had not destroyed it animo reco-

Jaques v. Horton, 74 Ala. 238; Saunders v. Saunders, 6 Notes of Cases, 518; Newell v. Homer, 120 Mass. 277; Fuentes v. Gaines, 25 La. Ann. 85, 3 Woods. 77; Harris v. Harris, 10 Wash. 553.

So, in Gurdner's Estate, 184 Pa. 420, it was held: "The burden having been on the proponents in this case to overcome the presumption of revocation which sprang out of the fact that the will, which Lot Gardner admittedly executed, could not be found at his death, made not only testator's character, conditions, acts, and declarations, but the conduct and interests of those who were around him, from and after the date of his will, legitimate subjects of inquiry."

And where a will was executed in duplicate, and the one that was in the possession of the testator before his death was not found after his decease, the burden of proof was upon the executor setting up the duplicate to show that the testator had not destroyed the one in his possession, and that he did not intend also to annul the duplicate. Colvin v. Fraser, 2 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 286.

So, the burden of proof was upon the propounders endeavoring to establish a lost will, to show that the will was in existence at the time of the testator's death, or that it was fraudulently destroyed in his lifetime, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1863, providing that the plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment establishing a lost or destroyed will, unless the will was in existence at the time of the testator's death or was fraudulently destroyed in his lifetime. Perry v. Perry, 42 N. Y. S. R. 291.

So, under this section, where a will could not be found, the burden of proof was on the propounders of the will to show by proof clear and convincing, not only in respect to the provisions of the will, but that it was in existence at the time of the testator's death. Kahn v. Hoes, 14 Misc. 63.

c. Rebutting presumption.

In order to lay the grounds for secondary evidence of the contents of a will, and in order to overcome the presumption that the will was revoked where it cannot be found, it is necessary to show that the will had been surreptitiously destroyed before the testator's death, or that he destroyed it when he was of unsound mind, or that it cannot be found and that it was out of the power of the testator to have access to the place where such will was deposited, or that it was in existence at the time of his death.

So, the presumption that the will was destroyed by the testator animo revocandi was rebutted, where it was shown that it was deposited by the testator with a custodian, and that the testator did not thereafter have it in his possession, or have access to it. Schultz v. Schultz, 35 N. Y. 653, 91 Am. Dec. 88.

So, where the presumption of revocation from the fact that the will was not found was rebutted by circumstantial evidence, a duplicate will was probated. Saunders v. Saunders, 6 Notes of Cases, 518.

And the presumption that the testatrix had de-candi. In such cases, it is simply a question of fact.

The court left it to the jury to decide from all the evidence whether or not the deceased left an unrevoked will. This was proper.

Podmore v. Whotton, 8 Swab. & T. 451; Finch v. Finch, 16 L. T. N. S. 268.

There was no competent testimony as to the contents of the will alleged to have been made by Dr. Turner.

The testimony of the witness Curtis as to conversation between himself and Dr. Turner was inadmissible as evidence under the provisions of the statute above quoted. Mr. Curtis was pastor of the church, and in that capacity visited Dr. Turner during his last illness.

When objection is made to the testimony of a minister of the gospel as to communications made to him by a member of his church, the question of the admissibility of the testimony is to be determined by the same rule that is applied where objection is made to the testimony of an attorney as to communications made by his client, or a physician where a communication has been made by a patient.

stroyed her will with intention to revoke was rebutted by evidence indicating that the administrator had suppressed or destroyed it, and the testatrix was too ill to have access to the place where the will was kept. Podmore v. Whotton, 8 Swab. & T. 449, 38 L. J. Prob. N. S. 143, 10 Jur. N. S. 756, 10 L. T. N. S. 754.

The presumption of revocation was overcome where the testamentary intention of the testator was shown to exist up to time of his death, and he was unable to have access to the place where his will was kept. Scoggins v. Turner, 98 N. C. 135.

And the probate of the draft of a will was proved where the will could not be found, and the presumption of revocation was overcome by many circumstances tending to negative the presumption. This was shown by affection manifested by the deceased, the way the will was made under the influence of that feeling as expressed at that time and afterwards, and by proof that the testatrix never expressed a desire to benefit by her will any other, and that she knew that her children would receive no part of her property if she died intestate. Patten v. Poulton, 1 Swab. & T. 55, 27 L. J. Prob. N. S. 41, 4 Jur. N. S. 841.

And the presumption of revocation was overcome where it had been admitted on the morning after the testator's death that the will was in the house and the will could not be found, and the party making the admission was interested in having the will suppressed. Brown v. Brown, 10 Yerg. 84.

In Colvin v. Fraser, 2 Harg. Eccl. Rep. 266, it was said that the presumption that a will was destroyed by the testator where it could not be found after his death may be rebutted by a strong combination of circumstances leading to a moral conviction that the deceased did not do the act, or it may be established by direct positive evidence, such as proving the existence of the instrument after the testator's death, or by proving that he himself destroyed it when of unsound mind or that it was fraudulently destroyed by some other person. But under this last supposition the proof should be clear to overcome the presumption of innocence.

So, in Minkler v. Minkler, 14 Vt. 125, a will was established where such evidence was produced as satisfied the court that although the will had been destroyed by someone before the death of the testator it was not with his privy.

Where a will is destroyed by the testator, the presumption of revocation may be overcome by evidence showing that the testator had not sufficient capacity to revoke his will, and the will may be established by proper proof of its execution and contents. So, where a will is attempted to be revoked by destruction and the revocation is not in accordance with a statute, as where someone not in the testator's presence attempts to destroy a will claiming that he authorized such destruction.

So, where a will was duly executed and destroyed in the lifetime of the testator when he was in a condition not to be able to revoke a will, it was established on satisfactory evidence of its destruction and of its contents. Idley v. Bowen, 11 Wend. 227.

And in Hook v. Pratt, 8 Hun. 102, it was held that under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. tit. 1, chap. 6, § 63, providing that whenever a will be lost or destroyed by accident or design the court of chancery shall have power to establish the same, and § 67, providing that no such will shall be proved as a lost or destroyed will unless the same shall be shown to have been in existence at the time of the death of the testator or be shown to have been fraudulently destroyed in his lifetime, it was held that upon due proof that the testator had destroyed certain clauses of his will while he was of unsound mind the same would be established.

So, a will and codicil were probated where the testator in a fit of insanity tore the codicil in pieces, but the pieces were preserved, and the testator afterwards, on being restored to his right mind regretted the act of attempted destruction. Borlase v. Borlase, 4 Notes of Cas. 106.

And a will was probated where the testator tore his will in pieces after its execution and while he was in a delirium, and the pieces were preserved, and on his recovery he had made declarations that he was very sorry for what he had done and intended to make another will. Brunt v. Brunt, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 37, 38 L. T. N. S. 363, 21 Week. Rep. 362.

So, where the testatrix, who tore up and destroyed a will previously executed by her, was in such a condition and laboring under an excitement which prevented her from having a reasonable intention of revocation, such act was held not to be a revocation of the will. Re Forman, 54 Barb. 274.

The presumption that a will was destroyed by the testator where it had been executed and could not be found after his death did not apply where the testator became insane after the execution and continued insane to the time of his death, and the burden of showing the will was destroyed was on the party setting up the revocation, and the will was established by proof of a copy. Sprigge v. Sprigge, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 608, 38 L. J. Prob. N. S. 4, 19 L. T. N. S. 462, 17 Week. Rep. 8.

And a will was established where it was destroyed by the testator through fraud and undue influence. Voorhis v. Voorhis, 50 Barb. 119.

And the codicil of a will was probated where it had been burned by testatrix's orders but not in her presence, and its contents were proved by the draftsman who had a copy, and by the attesting witness and by another party who had read the codicil before it was burned, and believed the draft to be a correct copy. Goods of Dadds, Deane & S. Eccl. Rep. 290.

In Wilmot v. Talbot, 3 Harr. & M'H. 2, 1 Am. Dec. 374, in an action of ejectment where evidence of a daughter-in-law of the testator was offered to prove the destruction of a will and its contents, it was held that she was a competent witness to prove the destruction of the will by her husband, where

In order to exclude a privileged communication, it is not necessary to first prove that the communication was proper or necessary to enable the minister, physician, or attorney to discharge the functions of his office; that will be presumed from the relationship of the parties.

Such communications made to a physician or surgeon are confidential, and cannot be disclosed.

she had relinquished her right of dower, and the will devised the land to the grandchild of the testator.

In Morris v. Swaney, 7 Heisk. 591, there was evidence sufficient to overcome the presumption of revocation.

The presumption of revocation arising from the failure to find a will might be rebutted by evidence. Davis v. Sigourney, 8 Met. 487; Legare v. Ashe, 1 Bay, 464.

And evidence of the scrivener of the contents of a will which he had prepared for the deceased before his death should have been received, where there was some other evidence tending to show that it was the same will which had been executed. In this case an agreement of the parties dispensed with preliminary proof of destruction or loss. Ford v. Teagle, 63 Ind. 61.

The presumption of revocation did not apply where the will was left with a solicitor, and the testator had no access to it, and the will could not be found after the testator's death. Hildreth v. Schillenger, 10 N. J. Eq. 197.

And the presumption of revocation did not have to be rebutted by three witnesses which number was required to prove the contents of a will, but might be overcome by such other evidence as satisfied the jury. Kitchens v. Kitchens, 39 Ga. 163, 99 Am. Dec. 453.

But evidence of the contents was not admissible where the will was not shown to have been fraudulently destroyed before the testator's death, or lost or destroyed after his death, although the execution of a will was duly proved by the subscribing witnesses, and that the testator was competent. Knapp v. Knapp, 10 N. Y. 276.

And parol evidence of the contents of a will was not authorized where the deceased said he had made a will, and his housekeeper was a daughter having an interest adverse to the will, and the same could not be found in a search made three days after his death, under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 63, § 67, providing that no will shall be proved as a lost or destroyed will unless proved to have been in existence at the death of testator or be shown to have been fraudulently destroyed in his lifetime, nor unless its provisions shall be clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses, a correct copy or draft being equivalent to one witness. Knapp v. Knapp, 10 N. Y. 276.

And in establishing and probating a lost will, the loss of the instrument should, except in rare instances, be proved before evidence is received of its contents; but the order of evidence was held to be within the control of the presiding judge. Conoly v. Gayle, 61 Ala. 116.

And before parol evidence could be given of the contents of a will alleged to be destroyed, where there was not sufficient evidence to warrant the conclusion of its destruction, it must be shown that the party has made diligent search and inquiry after the will where it would probably be found. Eure v. Pittman, 3 Hawks (N. C.) 364. 33 L. R. A.

Houston v. Simpson, 115 Ind. 62; Westover v. Elina L. Ins. Co. 90 N. Y. 56, 52 Am. Rep. 1; Loder v. Whelpley, 111 N. Y. 239; Parker v. Carter, 4 Munf. 273, 6 Am. Dec. 513.

The testimony of Capt. Scott was inadmissible for two reasons—first, because he was the attorney for Doctor Turner, and should not have been permitted to disclose any communications made to him by his client.

Morris v. Cain, 39 La. Ann. 712; Loder v. Whelpley, 111 N. Y. 239; Re Colman, 111 N. Y. 230; Bacon v. Friable, 80 N. Y. 394, 36 Am. Rep. 627; Root v. Wright, 84 N. Y. 72, 33 Am. Rep. 495; Sweet v. Owens, 109 Mo. 1.

So, a new trial was granted where a lost will was proved, but the proponders did not show that they had made diligent search. Dan v. Brown, 4 Cow. 483, 15 Am. Dec. 385.

And it was necessary to prove that a will was lost, spoliated, or destroyed subsequently to the death of the testator, in order to establish the same, under Swan's (Ohio) Stat. Rev. ed. 1030, § 47, providing that the several courts of common pleas shall have the power to probate any lost will and testament, where such original will had been lost, spoliated, or destroyed subsequently to the death of such testator. Re Sinclair, 5 Ohio St. 230.

And parol evidence of the contents of a will was not admissible, where it was not satisfactorily proved that the will was lost. Jackson, Bush, v. Hasbrouck, 12 Johns. 192.

6. Declarations.

Some cases hold that declarations of the testator are admissible in evidence to overcome or to sustain the presumption of revocation, arising from the inability to find a will which was in existence prior to the testator's death. But there is some conflict, and some cases deny this rule. And it is generally held that declarations alone are insufficient to overcome this presumption.

The declarations of the testator were admissible to overcome the presumption that a will was revoked by destruction by the testator where the alleged will could not be found. Tucker v. Whitehead, 59 Miss. 504; Tynan v. Paschal, 27 Tex. 236, 84 Am. Dec. 619; Re Pare, 116 Ill. 573, 59 Am. Rep. 395; Patterson v. Hickey, 32 Ga. 156; Behrens v. Behrens, 47 Ohio St. 323; Whiteley v. King, 17 C. B. N. S. 758, 10 Jur. N. S. 1079, 11 L. T. N. S. 342, 13 Week. Rep. 83; Southworth v. Adams, 11 Blas. 257; Keen v. Keen, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 105, 42 L. J. Prob. N. S. 61, 29 L. T. N. S. 247; Re Johnson, 40 Conn. 587; Bauskett v. Keitt, 22 S. C. 187; Betta v. Jackson, Brown, 6 Wend. 173, per Chancellor Walworth; Durant v. Ashmore, 3 Rich. L. 184, but see Waterman v. Whitney, 11 N. Y. 157, 62 Am. Dec. 71.

So, where a will was found in an old barrel, torn in pieces, evidence of the declarations of the testatrix was admissible to determine whether or not it had been destroyed. Lawyer v. Smith, 8 Mich. 411, 77 Am. Dec. 460.

So, in an action of partition where the due execution of a will was proved, it was held that declarations of the testator at the time of his death should have been admitted to prove that the will was still in existence and had not been canceled by him. Reeves v. Booth, 2 Mill. Const. 334, 12 Am. Dec. 679.

And in Youse v. Forman, 5 Bush, 337, where a will was found with the name of the testator cut off the paper, it was held that the presumption of revocation might be strengthened by extrinsic evidence of declarations to show the intention of the testator.

So, where the presumption that the testator de-

Second, because he claimed to have been one of the executors named in the proposed will, and therefore had a direct legal interest in the result of the proceeding, by which it was sought to have the will admitted to probate.

Rasmussen v. Schmela, 13 Neb. 73.

Clark was not a competent witness as to any conversations he may have had with the deceased, because he also claimed to be an executor, and had the same interest in the result that Scott had.

The contents of this alleged will could not be shown by the declarations of the deceased.

destroyed his will was strengthened by parol evidence in his declarations and of his increased attachment for his wife, and was not overcome by other evidence, an engrossed draft of the will was refused probate. Lillie v. Lillie, 8 Hagg. Ecol. Rep. 184.

So, in Weeks v. McDeth, 14 Ala. 474, the declarations of the testator were admissible to strengthen or repel the presumption of revocation arising from the inability to find the will.

And the presumption of revocation was overcome by declarations of the testator corroborated by other evidence. Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards, L. R. 1 Prob. Div. 154, 45 L. J. Prob. N. S. 49, 34 L. T. N. S. 369, 24 Week. Rep. 479.

So, the presumption that the will was revoked was overcome where the testator a short time before his death sealed a package containing his will, inscribed, "Pour être ouvert en cas de mort," and made declarations up to the time of his death, and had centered all his affections on his only daughter provided for in the will. Gains v. Lizardi, 8 Woods, 77.

And where a duplicate second will was retained by the testatrix but was not forthcoming at her death, the presumption of revocation was overcome by declarations and other circumstances. Saunders v. Saunders, 6 Notes of Cases, 518.

And where declarations of the testator, and his conduct up to the evening of his death, indicated that he had not destroyed his codicil, and overcame the presumption of revocation. Davis v. Davis, 2 Add. Ecol. Rep. 223.

And the testator's declaration that his will was in his trunk as he started on a journey was sufficient to overcome the presumption of its revocation, where he died before reaching his destination and the will could not be found in the trunk. Southworth v. Adams, 11 Biss. 256.

Declarations of the testator that he would burn his will, followed by declarations that he did burn it, were confirmatory of the presumption of revocation. Richards v. Mumford, 2 Phillim. Ecol. Rep. 23.

But where a will was canceled by mutilation, and it was uncertain when the cancellation took place, a statement in a letter found with the will referring to her will, and loose declarations that she had made a will, were not sufficient to overcome the presumption of revocation. Re White, 25 N. J. Eq. 501.

And a will was not probated where it could not be found after the testator's death, and declarations of the testator as to his intentions and contents of the will, which were held to be admissible, were rebutted by other declarations that he had destroyed the will and did not intend to leave the property as indicated by the will. Keen v. Keen, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 105, 42 L. J. Prob. N. S. 61, 29 L. T. N. S. 247.

Evidence of vague declarations of the testator that he had destroyed the will was held inadmissible, and the probate of a will which had been out 38 L. R. A.

McKernan, 2 Dem. 421; Whart. Ev. § 992; Mercer v. Mackin, 14 Bush. 442; Clark v. Morton, 5 Rawle, 285, 38 Am. Dec. 670; Pemberton v. Pemberton, 18 Ves. Jr. 818.

Even in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards, L. R. 1 Prob. Div. 154, it was not held that the declarations of St. Leonards, made after the execution of his will, were sufficient in themselves to prove its contents.

The subject of the admission and exclusion of parol declarations of a testator falls into six classes:

1. They are not admissible to prove a revocation of a legal will, except when accompany-in pieces was granted, where the court did not believe the evidence of a witness to the effect that this had been done by the testator for the purpose of revocation. Staines v. Stewart, 2 Swab. & T. 320, 31 L. J. Prob. N. S. 10, 8 Jur. N. S. 440.

And a will was refused probate where the only evidence tending to overcome the presumption that it was destroyed by the testator animo revocandi was the declarations of the testator, where a will was found after the testator's death in his private drawer with the first page torn off and absent. Williams v. Jones, 7 Notes of Cases, 108.

And the probate of a will was refused where it was found the morning after the day he died under the bolster of his bed with his signature torn off, although the deceased had made declarations up to the time of his death to one witness, as to his satisfaction in regard to executing his will. Goods of Lewis, 1 Swab. & T. 31, 27 L. J. Prob. N. S. 31, 4 Jur. N. S. 248.

So, the probate of a will was denied where a will was proved to have been executed, and evidence of declarations of testator up to a short period before his death showed that he had a will, but there was no satisfactory proof that he had a will at the time of his death, or that it had been destroyed previous to that time. Appling v. Eades, 1 Gratt. 236.

And under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1835, formerly 2 Rev. Stat. 68, 3 Rev. Stat. 6th ed. 70, § 67, requiring the provisions of a lost or destroyed will to be clearly proved by at least two credible witnesses, a correct copy or draft being deemed equivalent to one witness, it was held that the evidence of one witness as to the provisions of the will and the copy or draft proved by him only was not sufficient; and it was further held that declarations of the testator as to the contents of the will were not available for this purpose. It was held that the declaration of the testatrix, made before her death, as to the execution of a will, was not sufficient to rebut the presumption of its destruction by her, where no will could be found after diligent search made soon after her death. Collyer v. Collyer, 17 Abb. N. C. 328.

And in Elghym v. People, 79 N. Y. 546, it was held that the offer to prove the declarations of the deceased after the alleged destruction of the will was properly overruled, for the reason that such declarations were not accompanied by acts, and in no way constituted a part of the res gestæ.

In Waterman v. Whitney, 11 N. Y. 157, 62 Am. Dec. 71, it was said that the case of Durant v. Ashmore, 2 Rich. L. 184, was "in conflict with authority as well as with principle. The fact to be proved in such cases is, the act claimed as a revocation, together with the intent with which it is done, and all declarations of the testator which do not accompany the act are to be regarded as mere hearsay, and should be treated as such."

For declarations, see Gardner's Estate, 164 Pa. 420.

In Re Marsh, 45 Hun, 107, the New York cases on ing an act of revocation as part of the res gesta.

Gay v. Gay, 60 Iowa, 415, 46 Am. Rep. 78.

2. Subsequent ones are inadmissible to impeach the validity of a will for duress, or on account of some fraud or imposition practised upon the testator, or for some other cause not involving his mental condition.

Waterman v. Whitney, 11 N. Y. 157, 63 Am. Dec. 71.

3. In cases of insanity or undue influence, subsequent as well as prior declarations are admissible, not as evidence of the facts stated, but only as tending to show the mental capacify of the testator at the execution of the will.

Boplan v. Meeker, 28 N. J. L. 274.

4. When the will is not forthcoming, and a copy is submitted for probate, subsequent declarations are admissible on the question of the existence of the will, or of its revocation by the testator.

Behrens v. Behrens, 47 Ohio St. 323.

5. In explanation of the provisions of a will, such declarations may or may not be admissible:

(a) When the language employed is clear and unambiguous, they are not.

(b) They are to remove a latent ambiguity.

the question of admissibility of declarations to prove the existence of a will are ably reviewed as follows: "But a question arises upon exceptions taken to the admission of evidence of the declarations of the testatrix made from time to time and up to a short time prior to her death, to the effect that she had a will and by it had given her property to Ruth. This evidence was evidently given as bearing upon her intention as of the time they were made, and to repel the presumption that she had during her life revoked the will (which it appeared she had made), and as tending to prove that it was in her possession up to the time of her death. The cases in this state and elsewhere are not entirely in harmony on this question. In Dan v. Brown, 4 Cow. 483, 15 Am. Dec. 385, which was a proceeding for the partition of land, evidence of this character was received without objection, but on review Woodworth, J., remarked that he did not lay any stress upon the declarations of the testator. They were made long after the execution of the will and shortly before his death. They are not evidence unless they relate to the res gesta or to an act done." In Jackson, Brown, v. Betts, 6 Cow. 377, which was an action of ejectment involving the consideration of the same will, the declarations referred to of the testator were rejected and the plaintiff nonsuited, and although a new trial was granted on review, on the ground that the evidence was sufficient to go to the jury. Sutherland, J., said: "The declarations of the testator during his last sickness, as to the existence of his will, and the place where it would be found, were incompetent evidence, and were properly rejected by the judge. This point was decided in Dan v. Brown, 4 Cow. 490, in relation to this very will." The case of Jackson, Brown, v. Betts, after another trial, came up for review again (9 Cow. 208), in which the question now under consideration was not presented, but the case went off on the ground that no presumption of revocation by the testator of a will which he had made arose from the mere fact that it was not found after his death. The court of errors on review (6 Wend. 173) held to the contrary, and reversed the court below. The chancellor, however, in referring to the decision of the court (reported in 6 Cow. 377) that evidence of the declarations of the testator was not admissible, remarked that there was sufficient doubt as to the correctness of the decision of the supreme court on that point to authorize them to direct a reargument of the question if it should again come there. In Knapp v. Knapp, 10 N. Y. 276, evidence of the declarations of the testator, made a while before his death, that he had made a will and it was in his desk, was received without objection. The views of the court in the cases cited, so far as they express any determination, are against the admissibility of evidence of such declarations. But it may be observed that in the case where that decision was announced, the determination of the question was not necessary to the result given, as the view of the trial court was in that respect approved on review, and a new trial was granted for the reason before mentioned (63 L. R. A.

Cow. 377). But in Waterman v. Whitney, 11 N. Y. 157, 63 Am. Dec. 71, after referring to the cases of Dan v. Brown and Jackson, Brown, v. Betts, Seiden, J., in delivering the opinion adds: "I consider these cases as establishing the doctrine that upon a question of revocation, no declarations of the testator are admissible except such as accompany the act by which the will is revoked; such declarations being received as a part of the res gesta, and for the purpose of showing the intent of the act."

e. Where there is more than one will.

Some cases hold that where the intentions of the testator in destroying his will can be shown, such intentions will control where there is more than one will and one of them is destroyed.

So, where a testator destroyed a will on the supposition that he had made a subsequent will, but which was not duly executed, the probate of the first was granted on a copy and execution of the original being duly proved. Scott v. Scott, 1 Swab. & T. 258.

And where a holographic will was destroyed by the testator in order to use a more perfect copy, which was ineffectual, the probate of the destroyed will was allowed, and the contents were proved by a copy which was shown to be accurate. Wilbourn v. Shell, 59 Miss. 205, 42 Am. Rep. 363.

And a draft of a will was probated where the will was destroyed by the testator acting on the belief that a subsequent will superseded the former, but the latter will was void. It was held that under 1 Vict. chap. 26, § 20, providing that a will may be revoked by the burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying the same by the testator, with the intention of revoking the same, the revocation was not effected where the intention was wanting. Clarkson v. Clarkson, 2 Swab. & T. 497, 31 L. J. Prob. N. S. 143, 6 L. T. N. S. 506, 10 Week. Rep. 731.

The court decreed for an intestacy where the intentions of the testator were shown by his declarations that he would have no will unless he made a new one and he had made two and destroyed the last. This was held not to revive the former one. Hooton v. Head, 3 Phillim. Ecol. Rep. 28.

So, where the question was whether a testator who had destroyed a will intended to revive the same by destroying a subsequent will or to die intestate, it was held that declarations of the testator were competent, and the jury found that he died intestate. Boudinot v. Bradford, 2 U. S. 3 Dall. 265, 1 L. ed. 375.

So where there was full proof that a later will contained a revocatory clause annulling a previous will, and the second will was destroyed but not by the testator, declarations of the testator at the time of his death were admissible to prove that the subsequent will was not destroyed by him. Yount v. Yount, 3 Grant, Cas. 140.

The general rule is that the declarations can be shown to establish whether or not the testator intended to revive the former will. But this note is not intended to discuss the question of the revival Morgan v. Burrows, 45 Wis. 211, 30 Am. Rep. 717.

6. They are not admissible to establish the contents of a lost will.

Woodward v. Goulstone, L. R. 11 App. Cas. 478; Hunter v. Gardenhire, 18 Lea, 662; Chisholm v. Ben, 7 B. Mon. 412.

Contents of this alleged will are not shown by that positive and clear-cut testimony the law requires.

Southworth v. Adams, 11 Biss. 260; Davis v. Sigourney, 8 Met. 487; Johnson's Will, 40 Conn. 589; Woodward v. Goulstone, L. R. 11 App.

Cas. 475; Hunter v. Gardenhire, 18 Lea, 662.

The law will presume a destruction of a will by the testator (an innocent act) rather than by the heirs simply because of their opportunity of so doing, as this would be a criminal act.

Bauskett v. Keitt, 22 S. C. 187; Collyer v. Collyer, 110 N. Y. 481.

Attorney's fees should not be allowed.

Mumper's Appeal, 8 Watts & S. 441; Royer's Appeal, 18 Pa. 569; Andrews v. His Administrators, 7 Ohio St. 152; Collyer v. Collyer, 4 Dem. 53; Brown v. Vinyard, Ball. Eq. 460.

of a prior will by the destruction of the second, but simply to show that in this class of cases it becomes material to ascertain by evidence the execution and the contents of the lost will as well as to ascertain the intentions of the testator, if possible, by his declarations. For a discussion of the question as to the revival of a prior will by the destruction of a second will, see Cheever v. North (Mich.) 37 L. R. A. 551, note.

The evidence of the intention of the testator in destroying a second will should be considered, in order to determine whether the first will was revoked or revived, and to show this fact evidence of the contents of the second will and declarations of the testator are competent. McClure v. McClure, 86 Tenn. 172; Elintham v. Bradford, 10 Pa. 82; Williams v. Williams, 142 Mass. 515; James v. Shrimpton, L. R. 1 Prob. Div. 431, 45 L. J. Prob. N. S. 45, 35 L. T. N. S. 423, 24 Week. Rep. 740; Usticke v. Bawden, 2 Add. Ecol. Rep. 125; Welch v. Phillips, 1 Moore, P. C. 292; Linginfetter v. Linginfetter, Hardin (Ky.) 119; Bates v. Holman, 3 Hen. & M. 502; Hawes v. Nicholas, 73 Tex. 481, 2 L. R. A. 888; Marsh v. Marsh, 3 Jones, L. 77, 64 Am. Dec. 598; Colvin v. Warford, 20 Md. 357; Lady Kirkcudbright v. Lord Kirkcudbright, 1 Hagg. Ecol. Rep. 325; Powell v. Powell, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 209, 35 L. J. Prob. N. S. 100, 14 L. T. N. S. 800.

Where it was contended that a will was canceled because part of one will was canceled and another will was found uncanceled, the intention of the testator should be shown to overcome the presumption. Burtenshaw v. Gilbert, 1 Cowp. 49, Loft, 465.

Where a canceled duplicate was found in the custody of the testator, it was presumed that the deceased canceled it herself. Bouhey v. Moreton, 3 Hagg. Ecol. Rep. 191.

So, where the deceased made a codicil in duplicate in 1839 and in 1845 made another, and then destroyed the copy of the codicil of 1839, which was in the custody of his solicitor, but the copy retained by him was found in his papers, it was presumed to have been revoked by the destruction of the duplicate. Goods of Hains, 5 Notes of Cases, 621.

And where there were two wills in duplicate and one of them was canceled and a subsequent codicil was made, it was held that if the testator canceled that part which was with him the legal presumption was that the duplicate in possession of another was not to prevail, and if the testator had possession of both the same presumption held, though weaker, and having both in his possession and altering one and destroying that which was altered, there was also the presumption, but it was still weaker; and after three verdicts for the will the court refused to grant another trial. Pemberton v. Pemberton, 13 Ves. Jr. 290.

But where the deceased executed a will in duplicate, and left it in England with his solicitor, and took the duplicate with him to Africa and died there, and the duplicate was found in his papers, but the will could not be found among the papers of the solicitor, who also died, there was no presumption of revocation. Goods of Pechell, 6 Jur. N. S. 406.

And there was no presumption of revocation where the testator executed a will in duplicate and retained one, and the other could not be found. Saider v. Burks, 84 Ala. 53.

And probate was refused where a testator having made two wills destroyed the last will and subsequently on the same day stated that her intention in doing so was to have her former will take effect, and a motion was made for the probate of the draft of the destroyed will, and it was held that "in the case of Powell v. Powell, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 209, 35 L. J. Prob. N. S. 100, 14 L. T. N. S. 800, there was distinct and undoubted evidence that at the very moment the deceased destroyed his last will, he stated he did so in order that the earlier will should prevail. In this case the supposed declarations were not made at the time the deceased destroyed the will. They were far more vague, and not wholly reliable. I reject the motion; the daughter may propound the draft if she thinks proper." Goods of Weston, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 633, 38 L. J. Prob. N. S. 53, 20 L. T. N. S. 330.

Some cases hold as in case of intestacy, where the last will is lost or destroyed, and the intentions of the testator are not sufficiently shown.

So it was held that the deceased died intestate where three wills were made, and the two of later date were burned by deceased, and the will of latest date was not properly signed and executed, and it was not clear that the deceased destroyed the wills with the sole intention of setting up some other paper. Eckersley v. Platt, 36 L. J. Prob. N. S. 7, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 231, 15 L. T. N. S. 327, 15 Week. Rep. 232.

And where a second will could not be found after the testator's death and was shown by proof of draft to revoke a former will, and the later will was presumed to have been destroyed, there was no revival of the prior will where such was not shown to be the intention of the testator. James v. Cohen, 3 Curt. Ecol. Rep. 770.

And the court refused to place reliance on intemperate declarations by a capricious person, and held that the destruction by mutilation of a will did not revive a prior will. Moore v. Moore, 1 Phillim. Ecol. Rep. 403; Moore v. De La Torre, 1 Phillim. Ecol. Rep. 375.

The contents of a lost or destroyed will may be proved by secondary evidence to show that it contained a clause revoking a prior will. Some cases hold that proof of the execution of a prior will is sufficient to show a revocation of a lost will where other intention is not shown.

So, where it was shown that a second will was destroyed by the testator after its execution, and that it contained an express clause of revocation of the former will, the first will was revoked. James v. Marvin, 3 Conn. 576, Approved, Peck's Appeal, 50 Conn. 562, 47 Am. Rep. 685.

So where a testator destroyed his second will, and his third will was destroyed by his wife at his request, and the evidence showed that the third will

Irvine, C., filed the following opinion:

John J. Turner was an elderly citizen of the city of Lincoln, blessed with a pious disposition and a considerable quantity of this world's goods. He died March 1, 1890, leaving, him surviving, two sons, William J. Turner and R. Morris Turner. Some time after his death, William M. Clark and Nahum S. Scott propounded for probate what purported to be a copy of John J. Turner's last will and testament, it being alleged that said will had been deposited in a valise belonging to the testator, which, after his death, had been delivered to his sons, and that thereafter it was claimed that the house in which the valise had been kept was burglariously entered, the valise cut open, and its contents extracted. The probate was contested by the two sons. The result of the proceedings in the county court does not appear from the record. The case was, however, appealed to the district court, where, as a result of what appears to have been a third trial there, a verdict was rendered in favor of the contestants. Judgment was rendered denying probate, and the proponent Clark (the proponent Scott having died pending the proceedings) prosecutes to this court proceedings in error to reverse that judgment.

contained a revocation clause, the first will was refused probate. Scott v. Fink, 45 Mich. 241.

So, secondary evidence was inadmissible to show the contents of a second will which could not be found after the testator's death, and which established that this revoked a prior will. Brown v. Brown, 8 El. & Bl. 376, 27 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 173, 4 Jur. N. S. 163.

Where the factum of a later will was fully proved by two subscribing witnesses who swore that the third witness was since dead, and as to the contents the proof was made by one who swore that the executrix and residuary legatee of the later will was Mrs. H. which differed from the former will, it was held that the execution of the second will of a different purport was by law a revocation of the first although the second did not appear, and that it was presumed that the second will was revoked because it was not shown to have been out of the testator's custody and could not be found, and the court decreed as in case of intestacy. Heljar v. Heljar, 1 Lee, Ecol. Rep. 473.

And parol evidence of the contents of a third will was admissible where such will was lost or mislaid, in order to establish the revocation of two former wills. It was said that if the will had been designedly destroyed parol evidence would not be admissible because it would be making a new will. Legare v. Ashe, 1 Bay, 404.

And a will was held to be revoked by a subsequent will where parol evidence showed that it contained a clause of revocation, and the second will could not be found after the testator's death. The court pronounced for an intestacy. Eckersley v. Platt, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 361, 36 L. J. Prob. N. S. 7, 15 L. T. N. S. 227, 15 Week. Rep. 232; Goods of Brown, 1 Swab. & T. 32, 27 L. J. Prob. N. S. 20, 4 Jur. N. S. 244.

So, it was held that the deceased died intestate where a will was found, but a subsequent will which could not be found had been executed containing a clause of revocation, and there was some evidence of revocation by the drawer of the will by an entry in his book, and also the declaration of a witness, whose interest was opposed to the destruction of the lost will, that the deceased told her he should tear it up. Wood v. Wood, 36 L. J. Prob. N. S. 34, L. R. 1 Prob. 309, 15 L. T. N. S. 593.

And evidence of a revoking clause in a second will which was lost was admissible to prove the revocation of a former will, although the contents of the second will could not be proved sufficiently to probate the second will. Re Cunningham, 38 Minn. 199.

And strict proof of the contents of a second will was not necessary in order to establish the fact that it revoked a former will, where the second will had been destroyed by spoliation. Jones v. Murphy, 8 Watts & S. 275.

And where the testator made two wills and the last revoked the first, and both were destroyed without his consent, the first will could not be established although the evidence failed to show the 38 L. R. A.

contents of the second but did show the contents of the first. Day v. Day, 3 N. J. Eq. 549.

Under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2821, providing that a lost or destroyed will can be admitted to probate in the surrogate's court, but only in a case where a judgment establishing a will can be rendered in the supreme court, under § 1865, providing that a lost or destroyed will cannot be established unless it was in existence at the time of the testator's death or was fraudulently destroyed in his lifetime, nor unless its provisions are clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses, a correct copy or draft being equivalent to one witness, it was held that where a will was revoked by a later will, which was destroyed, it was not necessary that two witnesses should testify as to the contents of the later instrument, nor was it necessary to show that such instrument was in existence at the time of the testator's death, or that if not then in existence it had been fraudulently destroyed in his lifetime in order that the subsequent will should revoke the former one. Culligan's Estate, 5 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 198; Colligan v. McKernan, 2 Dem. 421.

Probate was refused where a subsequent will was lost and the evidence was contradictory and uncertain as to the contents of the will, and it was held that such proof must be clear, conclusive, and satisfactory. It was further held that where in such a case a revocatory clause was clearly proved, but was only attested by two witnesses, the clause of revocation should be probated as far as it affected personality. Vining v. Hall, 40 Miss. 63.

In Cleveland v. Booth, 43 Minn. 16, the contents of a codicil which had been destroyed by the testator were proved by parol evidence which showed that it was inconsistent with the will. (The question was whether the destroyed codicil revived the will.)

And evidence of the contents of a prior lost will should have been allowed to go to the jury, to establish that such will was inconsistent with the later one, where such former will was republished by the testator as his last will. Harvard v. Davis, 2 Binn. 406.

And evidence of the existence of a subsequent will was sufficient to show a revocation of a former will without proof of its contents, where the later will could not be found, under Ala. Rev. Code, §§ 1932, 1933, providing that no will can be revoked unless by some other will in writing. Barker v. Bell, 49 Ala. 284.

Where a later will had been lost or destroyed it was held that the prior will was revoked, in the absence of proof by three witnesses of its republication, under the Georgia statute requiring three witnesses to a will, and a "defunct dead" will could not be revived by a less number. In this case no proof was made or required of the contents of the last will. Harwell v. Lively, 30 Ga. 315, 78 Am. Dec. 619.

But some cases hold that the mere proof of execution of a subsequent will is insufficient to prevent

The copy of the will, as propounded, is as follows:

I, John J. Turner, of Lincoln, Nebraska, being of sound and disposing mind and memory, aged —, do hereby declare this to be my last will and testament, as follows:

First. I will that my debts and reasonable funeral charges be paid.

Second. I give and bequeath to the Board of Missions for Freedmen of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America the value of the note of R. Morris Turner for four thousand, five hundred dollars, secured by mortgage on lot three (3), in block one hundred and twenty nine (29), city of Lincoln, Lancaster county, Nebraska, less two thousand dollars borrowed at the First National Bank of Lincoln, Nebraska, and paid over to said board.

Third. I give and bequeath to the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America the value of a note made by William J. Turner to me for the sum of five thousand, seven hundred dollars, less the amount necessary to pay my note of $2,000 at the First National Bank of Lincoln, Nebraska, for which this note of $5,700 is pledged as collateral security.

the probate of a prior will where no inconsistency or revocatory clause is proved.

And a second will which could not be found at the testator's death was presumed to have been revoked by the testator, and this was held not to revoke a former will. In this case there was no proof of the contents of the second will. Dawson v. Smith, 3 Houst. (Del.) 93.

And a lost will was held not to be a revocation of a former will where the contents of the lost will were not proved, and it was not proved to have been in existence at the death of the testatrix but rather the contrary, and that she had canceled or destroyed it. Lawson v. Morrison, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 286, 1 L. ed. 384, 2 Hare & W. Am. Lead. Cas. 482.

So in Nelson v. McGiffert, 3 Barb. Ch. 158, 49 Am. Dec. 170, it was held that a will was not revoked by a subsequent will where such subsequent will was destroyed, but there was not sufficient evidence to show that the subsequent will contained any clause revoking the former will, or that it was inconsistent with the same.

And a will was held not to be revoked where a subsequent will was made but could not be found after the testator's death, and there was no draft or instruction in writing. (After probate was refused the lost will was found and was probated.) Cutto v. Gilbert, 9 Moore, P. C. C. 131.

II. Proof of execution.

a. Generally.

In order to establish a lost or destroyed will its due execution must be proved. Where the proof is offered after the lapse of many years from the execution and in cases of spoliation the courts seem to exercise a good deal of latitude depending on the circumstances of each case. In many cases the question in issue was not the due execution, but overcoming the presumption of revocation, establishing the contents and the like. But where the question is fairly made it is essential that the propounders of a lost will establish its due execution, or, in other words, as stated in a great many cases, its existence and then the loss and then secondary evidence of its contents can be received. In establishing the due execution of a will, no greater strictness is required in any case than where the will itself is produced in court. Declarations of the testator are not of themselves sufficient to establish the execution of a will, although they are generally held competent evidence, and when corroborated are held to be of great weight. In most of the states there is a statutory provision regulating the proof in such cases.

Where a bill to establish a lost will charged that the will was duly executed, a demurrer to the bill admitted such due execution, and in such a case the due execution did not have to be proved. Harms v. Tierreau, 52 Ga. 153, 21 Am. Rep. 242.

In Tucker v. Phipps, 8 Atk. 380, it was said that in the case of a destroyed will the plaintiff in the ecclesiastical court must prove it a will in writing. 83 L. R. A.

The evidence should show that a will had existed in a legal form before probate could be granted. Butler v. Butler, 5 Harr. (Del.) 178.

And that a will was duly made and was lost should be proved before any testimony could be admitted as to its contents. Dawson v. Smith, 3 Houst. (Del.) 93.

So, the fact that a will was duly executed should first be proved, and that it had been lost, destroyed, or suppressed before evidence of its contents would be received. Chisholm v. Ben, 7 B. Mon. 408; Fitzgerald v. Wynne, 1 App. D. C. 107.

And after the due execution and existence of a will have been established, its contents may be proved by parol, in case of the loss or destruction of the original, like those of any other written instrument. Reeves v. Booth, 2 Mill, Const. 334; Graham v. O'Fallon, 3 Mo. 507.

A lost will could be admitted to probate on competent evidence of its execution and contents. Jaques v. Horton, 70 Ala. 238.

So, evidence of the execution of a lost will should be made by the fullest and most satisfactory proof. Moore v. Whitehouse, 8 Swab. & T. 567, 84 L. J. Prob. N. S. 31, 11 L. T. N. S. 458.

And proof of the due execution of a will must be of the clearest and most satisfactory character. Buechle's Estate, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 127.

And in order to establish a lost will the proof of its execution required clear, strong, and irrefragable evidence free from suspicion or doubt in its sources, exact and certain in its conclusions. Podmore v. Wharton, 3 Swab. & T. 449, 93 L. J. Prob. N. S. 143, 10 Jur. N. S. 756, 10 L. T. N. S. 754.

And in order to prove the execution of a lost will by parol evidence only, such evidence should be most clear, satisfactory, stringent, and conclusive. Cutto v. Gilbert, 9 Moore, P. C. C. 131.

The burden of proof is on the propounders of a lost will to prove its execution by strong, positive, and convincing evidence. Southworth v. Adams, 11 Biss. 256.

And under Colo. Gen. Stat. chap. 115, § 21, providing that whenever a will had been lost or destroyed and the fact of the execution thereof can be established as hereinbefore provided, and the contents are likewise shown by the testimony of two or more witnesses, the same may be probated, it was first necessary to make proof of the execution as in other cases. Todd v. Rennick, 13 Colo. 546.

And in McDaniel v. Pattison, 98 Cal. 86, it was said that a lost or destroyed will may be proved and established in the probate court if there is sufficient evidence of its execution and its terms.

And parol evidence of the contents of a lost will was allowed where the court was satisfied as to the factum of the alleged will. Mahood v. Mahood, 8 Ir. Eq. Rep. 359.

In Lane's Will, 2 Dana, 106, the due execution of a lost will was proved, and a sworn copy was probated.

And in Davis v. Sigourney, 8 Met. 487, it was said that the evidence in this case showed that the will had been duly executed by the testator.

Fourth. I give and bequeath to Keren Root-ham the entire use of my double house on North Twelfth street, east of the university, during her natural life, and in case the house shall be destroyed she may use the entire amount of the insurance to rebuild the same, or she may receive one half of the amount of the insurance and release her interest and claim upon the property. She may assign and dispose of her entire interest in rents and use of said house at any time, and at her death the said property shall go to my two sons, William J. Turner and R. Morris Turner.

And in Brown v. Morrow, 43 U. C. Q. B. 426, the execution and previous existence of a lost will which had been acted upon by the heir were sufficiently proved in an action of ejectment.

In Chisholm v. Ben, 7 B. Mon. 408, it was said "in case of a lost will, the proof by the subscribing witnesses of acknowledgment alone might be sufficient, in the absence of countervailing circumstances, to prove the due execution of the will."

So, the proof was sufficient where the evidence showed beyond doubt the execution of the will and the capacity of the testator. Buchanan v. Matlock, 8 Humph. 390, 47 Am. Dec. 622.

An order establishing a lost or destroyed will should set forth its contents, that it was duly executed when the testator was of sound mind and disposing memory, and showed that it was duly attested. Dower v. Seeds, 28 W. Va. 113, 57 Am. Rep. 646.

A lost or destroyed will could not be used as evidence to affect the title to property devised or bequeathed by it before it had been proved and established in the mode prescribed by law. Mauck v. Melton, 64 Ind. 414.

And a copy of a lost codicil was refused probate where there was not sufficient proof of the execution of the codicil, the attesting witnesses failing to identify the document attested. Crickett v. Field, 19 Week. Rep. 232, 23 L. T. N. S. 630.

The jury were properly directed to return their verdict for the respondents where the only evidence of the execution of any testamentary document except the original will of 1841, under which the respondents claimed, was the testimony of one witness who said that in 1857 or 1868, he with others witnessed an instrument which the testator either said was his will or that it was a codicil of his will, and no testimony was produced of the contents of this instrument nor was any attempt made to otherwise identify it. In this case the persons whose names appeared as witnesses upon the papers propounded as codicils were called by the appellant, and each denied that they had witnessed any testamentary paper for the alleged testator. There was no testimony that such papers existed at the time of the testator's death. Newell v. Homer, 120 Mass. 277.

And in an action of partition evidence of the contents of a lost or destroyed will was incompetent where such will had not been proved and established, under 3 Ind. Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 570. Mauck v. Melton, 64 Ind. 414.

In Lawrence v. Kete, Aleyn, 54, where the testator desired to have his will drawn by K., and his wife without consulting her husband sent for K., who from the mouth of the witnesses who heard the devise wrote the same, and the husband died before the will was executed, and it was afterwards lost, it was held that the writing of the will from the mouth of the witnesses was sufficient; but the evidence was not clear as to the desire of the testator to send for K., and the will was not sustained in an action of ejectment.

And where the evidence showed that a destroyed will was not signed by the deceased, nor his signature acknowledged in the presence of the witnesses, it was held that it was not duly executed. Eckersley v. Platt, 38 L. J. Prob. N. S. 7, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 231, 15 L. T. N. S. 337, 15 Week. Rep. 232.

b. Declarations.

Declarations of the testator are not of themselves alone sufficient to establish the execution of a lost or destroyed will, but are admissible in evidence and have great weight when corroborated by other evidence.

So, the probate of a copy of a lost will was refused, where the contents were proved but there was no proof of the execution of the original, except the declarations of the supposed testator. Goods of Ripley, 4 Jur. N. S. 342, 1 Swab. & T. 68.

And the bare declarations of the deceased that the paper which the witness saw was his will did not prove that it was executed as the statute required. Re Russell, 38 Hun. 271, Aff'd 98 N. Y. 633.

And in Tynan v. Paschal, 27 Tex. 236, 84 Am. Dec. 619, it was said: "Nor will the declarations and acts of a party, indicating a belief that he has a will, add but little, if any, strength to the other testimony adduced to prove its due execution."

So, it was incumbent on the party seeking to establish a lost or destroyed will to prove its due execution. It was said: "Nor does it seem legitimate or reasonable (except in cases of spoliation, when the wrongful act of withholding or destroying the means of furnishing direct testimony authorizes presumptions and conclusions which otherwise would not be indulged to infer its due execution from proof of facts which, if the will were before the court, would in no way tend to prove it, and which are usually and reasonably consistent with the contrary conclusion." Tynan v. Paschal, 27 Tex. 236, 84 Am. Dec. 619.

And under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 67, § 63, requiring that a lost will should be proved by two witnesses, the declaration of a decedent was not competent to prove the execution of a will. Grant v. Grant, 1 Sandf. Ch. 235.

And the factum of a lost or destroyed will could not be proved by declarations of the testator, but should be proved in the same manner as though the will was produced in open court. Collyer v. Collyer, 4 Dem. 58, Affirmed 110 N. Y. 481.

In Collyer v. Collyer, 4 Dem. 58, Affirmed 110 N. Y. 481, the case of Colligan v. McKernan, 2 Dem. 421, was distinguished, as there the object of the proof was to defeat a will presented for probate by showing that it had been revoked by a subsequent will which was lost, and was not a proceeding to prove a lost will under the statute. There it was properly held that one witness to prove the lost will at common law was sufficient to sustain the objection to the earlier will propounded.

Declarations of the testator were not alone sufficient to prove the due execution of a will alleged to be lost. Mercer v. Mackin, 14 Bush, 434.

The probate of a holographic will which could not be found was refused, where the evidence did Codicil to My Last Will and Testament.

I, John J. Turner, hereby will and direct that my executors shall pay to my brother living in _____, out of the interest of William J. Turner's note, the sum of three hundred and fifty dollars, to be used by him as a loan, for the term of five years, without interest. At the expiration of five years to be collected and not show that such will was signed by the testator, and it was attempted to be established by evidence of his declarations that he had written a will and also declarations as to its contents. This evidence was inadmissible where no satisfactory evidence of the loss or destruction of the will was given, under Ky. Gen. Stat. chap. 31 (21), § 20, requiring signatures at the end of a writing, and chap. 118, § 15, providing that where a will is written by the testator he must have subscribed his name to it at its conclusion. It was said that if the deceased had declared that he wrote and signed it with his own name and hand, evidence of such declarations would not be sufficient to authorize the probating of a will. Mercer v. Mackin, 14 Bush, 434.

Where the attesting witnesses to a will and codicils were called, and a copy made by the testator's daughter was substantiated by the testator's declarations, it was held that the will and codicils were proved to have been duly executed. Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards, 24 Week. Rep. 209, 45 L. J. Prob. N. S. 1, 33 L. T. N. S. 861.

This is a leading case on the question, and goes farther than most other cases toward establishing execution by testator's declarations.

c. Witnesses.

Some cases hold that one witness is sufficient to establish the due execution of a will when corroborated, but other cases require proof by two witnesses. In some states at least two witnesses are required by statute, while under other statutes all the subscribing witnesses whose evidence can be had must be used to establish its execution.

In a suit for partition it was held that one of the subscribing witnesses could prove the execution of a will which was lost. The proof was sufficient where such witness who drew the will and subscribed as a witness proved its due attestation by three witnesses, although he had forgotten the name of one of them, but had no doubt that he was a competent witness. But a new trial was granted because the parties who claimed under the will did not prove that they had made diligent search. Dan v. Brown, 4 Cow. 483, 15 Am. Dec. 205.

And evidence by an attesting witness, who made her mark, that the testator signed the will in the presence of all three subscribing witnesses, was sufficient to prove the due execution of a lost will over thirty years old. Fetherly v. Wagoner, 11 Wend. 500.

And a lost will was admitted to probate on the testimony of one subscribing witness, who was the only witness who professed to have read the will. Skeggs v. Horton, 22 Ala. 332.

And the probate of a lost will was granted where the execution and contents were proved by an affidavit of one of the attesting witnesses and the widow, where the testator left his will behind him in escaping from Delhi during the Indian mutiny in May, and died in June, 1857. Goods of Gardner, 1 Swab. & T. 109, 27 L. J. Prob. N. S. 55.

So, a will lost or stolen after the testator's death was properly probated, where the contents of the will were clearly established and two witnesses proved that the original was wholly written and signed by the testator. It was said: "If its loss or destruction after the death of the testator be shown, and its contents be satisfactorily made out, the proof of its having been wholly written and signed by the testator himself, by a single credible witness, will suffice." Baker v. Dohyna, 4 Dana, 230.

And a due formal execution of a lost will was sufficiently proved where the attorney who drew the same testified that he and another party witnessed the testator sign the will, and that the witnesses in the testator's presence and in the presence of each other attested the same, and that the other witness was dead. Re Page, 118 Ill. 579, 59 Am. Rep. 595.

And evidence of a surviving witness that he signed, and saw the testator and the deceased witness sign, an instrument which the testator declared to be his will, was sufficient to establish the fact that there was a will made, under 1 Wash. Stat. § 1459, providing that when one of the witnesses of a will is dead, proof should be taken of the handwriting of the testator and of the witness who is dead. But the will was not established because its contents were not proved. Harris v. Harris, 10 Wash. 555.

A copy of a will was proved by one of the subscribing witnesses in ejectment where the adverse party had the original will on which the title depended, and refused to produce the same under a subpoena duces tecum. Hamilton v. Lightbody, 21 U. C. C. P. 123.

And in Graham v. O'Fallon, 3 Mo. 507, it was said that one witness would be sufficient to establish the due execution of a will that was lost if he proved that he saw the other witness subscribe it in the testator's presence.

So, a lost will was held to have been duly executed where a copy was tendered in evidence made by a person who represented himself to have been one of the attesting witnesses and who was dead, and was corroborated by a declaration in disparagement of the title in a deed made by a party in possession. Sly v. Sly, L. R. 2 Proc. Div. 91, 45 L. J. Prob. N. S. 63, 25 Week. Rep. 403.

And entries in the day book of a solicitor who was dead, which showed that he had drawn and attested a will and had been paid for the same, and proof of a draft of the will, were evidence of its execution. Goods of Thomas, 20 Week. Rep. 149, 41 L. J. Prob. N. S. 32, 25 L. T. N. S. 530.

And the execution of a stolen will was proved by copy and the affidavit of the attesting witness. Goods of Cousins, 1 Notes of Cases, 230.

And where one of the attesting witnesses was out of the jurisdiction of the court, and the other attesting witness testified that he did not see the testator sign, but that the testator acknowledged that he signed, sealed, and published it as his last will and testament, and another party testified positively that the testator signed it in the presence of the witnesses, it was held that the affirmative witness should prevail, and that the will was duly executed. Bailey v. Stiles, 2 N. J. Eq. 220.

In Brown v. Brown, 10 Yerg. 94, the execution of a lost will was proved by two witnesses.

paid over to the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America.

John J. Turner.

Dated December —, 1889.

Witness:

Sarah Turner.

Keren Rootham.

A few remarks in regard to the subject-matter of the testator's property may not be inappropriate, preliminary to the statement of other facts in the case. The alleged testator, John J. Turner, referred to usually in the evidence as "Dr. Turner," by which term we shall hereafter designate him, was, at the time of his death, and at the time it is claimed this will was executed, seised of the land described in the will and also of another lot in the city of Lincoln not thereby disposed of. He had previously owned two other lots in the city of Lincoln, one of which he had conveyed to his son R. Morris Turner, receiving, in consideration for the conveyance, the latter's note for $4,500, secured by mortgage on the lot. The other lot he had, at about the same time, conveyed to his son William J. Turner, receiving in return the latter's note for $5,700. It ap-

And a destroyed will was probated where it was proved to have been duly attested by a requisite number of witnesses. Anderson v. Irwin, 101 Ill. 411.

And the execution of a lost will was duly proved where the attesting witnesses proved the signature of the testator by his mark, and that the subscribing witnesses attested it in his presence and in the presence of each other at the testator's request, and the testator declared the same to be his last will. Voorhees v. Voorhees, 30 N. Y. 463, 100 Am. Dec. 458.

So, in Morris v. Swaney, 7 Heisk. 591, the jury were properly instructed as to the requirements of the law as to the manner of executing a will, and that the propounders must introduce evidence clear, full, and satisfactory, to establish the facts in their favor, and that two witnesses were required to the factum of the will, but that two witnesses were not required to each particular fact.

And where a revocatory clause of a lost will was clearly proved, but was only attested by two witnesses, it was probated so as to affect personality. Vining v. Hall, 40 Miss. 53.

And the execution of a lost will was sufficiently proved by the two attesting witnesses, and the sanity of the testator was proved positively by the witnesses, and by the equalization in the will. Payne's Will, 4 T. B. Mon. 423.

So, where a lost will was proved by two subscribing witnesses, and the contents were proved by one witness, it was held to revoke a prior will. Helyar v. Helyar, 1 Lee, Eccl. Rep. 472.

The evidence of two subscribing witnesses relative to the due execution and contents of a will and verifying a copy was sufficient where a third subscribing witness was not called, but no objection was made for not producing him, and the will had been destroyed by the testator on the day of his death while in a fit of insanity. Apperson v. Cottrell, 3 Port. (Ala.) 51, 29 Am. Dec. 239.

And a lost will was proved where two of the subscribing witnesses testified in regard to a copy, that the original was made by the deceased in their presence, that he was of sound mind at the time of the execution, and that he executed it in the presence of the other witness. Apperson v. Cottrell, 3 Port. (Ala.) 51, 29 Am. Dec. 239.

So, where a will was destroyed by one of the heirs it was admitted to probate, where the entire correspondence of the rough draft with the will was proved only by one witness, the execution of the will was proved by the three attesting witnesses, and parts of the will were proved by several witnesses, and the rough draft of the will was in the handwriting of the testator. Kearns v. Kearns, 4 Harr. (Del.) 83.

And under Ga. Code, § 2431, providing that "if a will be lost or destroyed subsequent to the death, or without the consent, of the testator, a copy of the same, clearly proved to be such by the subscribing witnesses and other evidence, may be admitted to probate and record, in lieu of the original; but in every such case the presumption is of revocation by the testator, and that presumption must be rebutted by proof," the probate of a lost will was required to be proved by three subscribing witnesses if in life and within the jurisdiction of the court. Moseley v. Carr, 70 Ga. 333; Moseley v. Evans, 72 Ga. 203.

And in Hildreth v. Schillenger, 10 N. J. Eq. 166, the execution of a lost will was duly proved by three subscribing witnesses.

Where private was sought of a will which could not be produced, and which was executed when five persons were present, three of whom attested it, and it was known who two of the attesting witnesses were but not who the third was, it was sufficient where all five of the persons who were present were called although two remembered nothing about the transaction, and R. C. act 1839 (11 Stat. at L. 41) required that in probate of wills in due form of law all the subscribing witnesses, where not absent from the state, dead, or insane, should be produced. Watkins v. Watkins, 13 Rich. L. 66.

In Baukett v. Keitt, 22 S. C. 137, it was held to be a question for the jury where two of the witnesses to an alleged lost will testified to its execution in the presence of themselves and another witness, all of whom signed as witnesses, but such other witness denied it. The case of Watkins v. Watkins, 13 Rich. L. 66, was distinguished, as in that case five persons named were present and none of the five denied signing as a witness though two of them said they had no recollection. In that case the testimony might warrant a verdict that the will was executed in the presence of three witnesses because, while it failed to designate with certainty which three of the five subscribed as witnesses, it did show that three of the five named persons, all of whom were competent, had signed as witnesses.

And a lost will was established where the proof was clear and uncontradicted as to the execution and contents of the will, by proof of a copy which had been verified before the will was executed and three witnesses who were present at the execution of the will and other witnesses who heard the will read and another witness who saw the execution, and the evidence of two witnesses who knew the handwriting of the testator, as well as that of the attesting witness. This satisfied 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 67, § 74, requiring that a lost will shall be proved to have been in existence at the time of the death of the testator, and that its provisions shall be clearly and distinctly proved by two credible witnesses, a correct copy or draft being deemed equivalent to one witness. Everitt v. Everitt, 41 Barb. 385, Affirming 29 N. Y. 39.

So, where a will was claimed to have been fraudulently destroyed the evidence of its execution was sufficient, where one of the subscribing witnesses testified positively that the paper referred to was declared by the testator to be his last will, and the other witness so testified on his direct examination, but on cross-examination testified that such statement was made by the draftsman in the presence of the testator, as was also the request to sign. The will was read aloud to the testator and signed by pears from the evidence that the object of both these conveyances was to provide annuities, by virtue of an arrangement entered into between Dr. Turner and his sons, whereby, in order to relieve the doctor of the burden of caring for the property, the conveyances were made to his sons, they to pay interest on the notes during the doctor's lifetime. They contend that, upon his death, interest was to cease, and the principal of the notes was not to be paid. These are the notes referred to in the second and third paragraphs of the will propounded. Dr. Turner's wife died in 1888. Soon thereafter one Keren Rootham, or, as she herself signs her name, Kerenhappuch Rootham, a maiden of mature years, became installed in Dr. Turner's home as his housekeeper. It is to her that the fourth paragraph of the alleged will relates. Mr. Clark and Mr. Scott, who are named as executors, were prominent members of the Presbyterian Church, of which Dr. Turner was also a member. Capt Scott was a lawyer, and seems to have been Dr. Turner's legal adviser. Dr. Turner seems to have acquired somewhat of a habit of making wills, as there is evidence, chiefly from entries in his diary, of his having executed several such instruments in the last decade of his life. There him in the presence of the witnesses, who signed it in his presence. Early v. Early, 5 Redf. 376.

In Lewis v. Lewis, 6 Serg. & R. 489, it was said: "If a will of land is lost or secreted, parol proof of its contents by one witness would be sufficient, the proof of its execution being made by the requisite number."

And in Conoly v. Gayle, 61 Ala. 116, it was held that the fact that one of the subscribing witnesses to a lost will was incompetent did not vitiate the same where the requisite number of competent witnesses attested the same.

So, where a will was presented and proved before the court of probate in order to be executed, and was afterwards lost, it was held that parol evidence was admissible to establish it by witnesses who had subscribed to the will and had been sworn before the judge of probate to prove it, and the propounders offered to prove the loss, and after such facts were proved offered to give evidence of its contents. Thomas v. Thomas, 2 La. 166.

So, where the attorney who prepared a will from personal instructions of the testatrix, together with his partner and clerk who witnessed its execution, testified clearly and positively to the fact and produced the original draft of the will, and their book showing credit for payment of charges, there was no doubt as to the will having been duly executed. Podmore v. Wharton, 8 Swab. & T. 449, 33 L. J. Prob. N. S. 143, 10 Jur. N. S. 756, 10 L. T. N. S. 754.

And a lost will was established where proof of a pencil memorandum in the testator's handwriting was corroborated by the attesting witnesses. Southworth v. Adams, 11 Biss. 256.

Under La. Old Code, art. 159, p. 244, New Code, art. 1648, requiring for the proof of an olographic will the testimony of two credible witnesses, who declare that they recognize the testament as being entirely written, dated, and signed in the testator's handwriting, "as having often seen him write and sign during his lifetime," a will lost or destroyed after the testator's death was admitted to probate where the witnesses testified that the will was entirely written, dated, and signed by the testator, but they did not say that "they had often seen him write." It was held that this clause was not sacramental but directory, and the evidence showed an intimacy and relationship which left little room to doubt that they were really well acquainted with his handwriting and had probably seen him write often but did not expressly say so. Clark's Succession, 11 La. Ann. 124.

In Fuentes v. Gaines, 25 La. Ann. 85, the probate was set aside on the ground that the evidence was by witnesses who derived their knowledge of the contents from the verbal declarations of the testator. But this case was reversed in 32 U. S. 10, 23 L. ed. 524, on account of the failure of the state court to transfer the case to the Federal court.

And in Gaines v. Lizardi, 3 Woods. 77, on the removal to the circuit court, it was held that under La. Civ. Code, art. 1588 (1581), declaring an olographic will shall be entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator, this will was proved to have been executed by two witnesses, the evidence being the same as in Clark's Succession, 11 La. Ann. 125.

Different phases of subsequent proceedings of this celebrated case are found in 38 U. S. 18 Pet. 404, 10 L. ed. 221; 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 9, 10 L. ed. 642; 48 U. S. 2 How. 619, 11 L. ed. 402; 47 U. S. 6 How. 550, 12 L. ed. 553; 52 U. S. 15 Wall. 624, 21 L. ed. 215; 17 Fed. Rep. 16; 1 Woods, 118.

In Harris v. Thierau, 52 Ga. 153, 21 Am. Rep. 243, it was said that if the will be lost the witnesses should be produced if accessible, if not, the next best evidence should be used to prove the execution.

And where a will had been destroyed by one of the subscribing witnesses, who with another subscribing witness were the only heirs, and they had made a sham effort to probate the will in the county court, and testified as to the attestation in such a manner that the probate was refused, and then destroyed the will, a court of equity notwithstanding the rejection by the probate court declared the proof of execution sufficient to enforce the same and grant a decree of emancipation to slaves that were emancipated by such will. It was held that the complainant should not be precluded by the rejection of the will when it was attested by their antagonists in interest, offered for probate by one of them, and defeated by the general statement of the other, without any cross-examination or any person present who was interested in establishing the will, as each of these interested witnesses showed himself capable of resorting to improper devices for the purpose of injuring the beneficiaries. Mullins v. Wall, 3 B. Mon. 445.

And in Re Russell, 33 Hun. 271, affirmed 98 N. Y. 633, proof of the execution of a lost will was required to be made, and the evidence was insufficient where it was not shown that there was a full attestation clause subscribed by proper witnesses.

The evidence of a solicitor that he drew the will for the decedent, but could not remember the witness who attested it, was insufficient. Grant v. Grant, 1 Sandf. Ch. 235.

And in Collyer v. Collyer, 4 Dem. 53, affirmed 110 N. Y. 481, the factum of the will was not established where the draft produced contained neither the name of the decedent nor those of the witnesses, and the only witness in regard to this matter did not testify positively that he was a subscribing witness, and he was unable to state who the other witnesses were.

And under Md. act 1715, chap. 39, conferring power on the probate judge to cause to be proved any last will and testament, although the same concerned title to land, and 29 Car. II., chap. 3, § 5, providing that all devises and bequests of lands shall be in writing, signed by the party devising the same or some other person in his presence and by his express directions, and shall be attested and subscribed in the presence of said devisor by three or four credible witnesses, or else they shall be utterly void, a copy of a lost will admitted to probate by the register of wills was not admissible in paid over to the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America.

A few remarks in regard to the subject-matter of the testator's property may not be inappropriate, preliminary to the statement of other facts in the case. The alleged testator, John J. Turner, referred to usually in the evidence as "Dr. Turner," by which term we shall hereafter designate him, was, at the time of his death, and at the time it is claimed this will was executed, seised of the land described in the will and also of another lot in the city of Lincoln not thereby disposed of. He had previously owned two other lots in the city of Lincoln, one of which he had conveyed to his son R. Morris Turner, receiving, in consideration for the conveyance, the latter's note for $4,500, secured by mortgage on the lot. The other lot he had, at about the same time, conveyed to his son William J. Turner, receiving in return the latter's note for $5,700. It ap-

And a destroyed will was probated where it was proved to have been duly attested by a requisite number of witnesses. Anderson v. Irwin, 101 Ill. 411.

And the execution of a lost will was duly proved where the attesting witnesses proved the signature of the testator by his mark, and that the subscribing witnesses attested it in his presence and in the presence of each other at the testator's request, and the testator declared the same to be his last will. Voorhees v. Voorhees, 30 N. Y. 463, 100 Am. Dec. 458.

So, in Morris v. Swaney, 7 Helsk. 591, the jury were properly instructed as to the requirements of the law as to the manner of executing a will, and that the propounders must introduce evidence clear, full, and satisfactory, to establish the facts in their favor, and that two witnesses were required to the factum of the will, but that two witnesses were not required to each particular fact.

And where a revocatory clause of a lost will was clearly proved, but was only attested by two witnesses, it was probated so as to affect personalty. Vining v. Hall, 40 Miss. 53.

And the execution of a lost will was sufficiently proved by the two attesting witnesses, and the sanity of the testator was proved positively by the witnesses, and by the equalization in the will. Payne's Will, 4 T. B. Mon. 423.

So, where a lost will was proved by two subscribing witnesses, and the contents were proved by one witness, it was held to revoke a prior will. Helyar v. Helyar, 1 Lee, Eccl. Rep. 472.

The evidence of two subscribing witnesses relative to the due execution and contents of a will and verifying a copy was sufficient where a third subscribing witness was not called, but no objection was made for not producing him, and the will had been destroyed by the testator on the day of his death while in a fit of insanity. Apperson v. Cottrell, 3 Port. (Ala.) 51, 29 Am. Dec. 239.

And a lost will was proved where two of the subscribing witnesses testified in regard to a copy, that the original was made by the deceased in their presence, that he was of sound mind at the time of the execution, and that he executed it in the presence of the other witness. Apperson v. Cottrell, 3 Port. (Ala.) 51, 29 Am. Dec. 239.

So, where a will was destroyed by one of the heirs it was admitted to probate, where the entire correspondence of the rough draft with the will was proved only by one witness, the execution of the will was proved by the three attesting witnesses, and parts of the will were proved by several witnesses, and the rough draft of the will was in the handwriting of the testator. Kearns v. Kearns, 4 Harr. (Del.) 83.

And under Ga. Code, § 2431, providing that "if a will be lost or destroyed subsequent to the death, or without the consent, of the testator, a copy of the same, clearly proved to be such by the subscribing witnesses and other evidence, may be admitted to probate and record, in lieu of the original; but in every such case the presumption is of revocation by the testator, and that presumption must be rebutted by proof," the probate of a lost will was required to be proved by three subscribing witnesses if in life and within the jurisdiction of the court. Moseley v. Carr, 70 Ga. 333; Moseley v. Evans, 72 Ga. 203.

And in Hildreth v. Schillenger, 10 N. J. Eq. 186, the execution of a lost will was duly proved by three subscribing witnesses.

A few remarks in regard to the subject-matter of the testator's property may not be inappropriate, preliminary to the statement of other facts in the case. The alleged testator, John J. Turner, referred to usually in the evidence Voorhees*, 30 N. Y. 463, 100 Am. Dec. 458.

So, in Morris v. Swaney, 7 Heisk. 501, the jury were properly instructed as to the requirements of the law as to the manner of executing a will, and that the propounders must introduce evidence clear, full, and satisfactory, to establish the facts in their favor, and that two witnesses were required to the factum of the will, but that two witnesses were not required to each particular fact.

And where a revocatory clause of a lost will was clearly proved, but was only attested by two witnesses, it was probated so as to affect personalty. Vining v. Hall, 40 Miss. 53.

And the execution of a lost will was sufficiently proved by the two attesting witnesses, and the sanity of the testator was proved positively by the witnesses, and by the equalization in the will. Payne's Will, 4 T. B. Mon. 423.

So, where a lost will was proved by two subscribing witnesses, and the contents were proved by one witness, it was held to revoke a prior will. Helyar v. Helyar, 1 Lee, Ecol. Rep. 472.

The evidence of two subscribing witnesses relative to the due execution and contents of a will and verifying a copy was sufficient where a third subscribing witness was not called, but no objection was made for not producing him, and the will had been destroyed by the testator on the day of his death while in a fit of insanity. Apperson v. Watkins, 13 Rich. L. 66.

In Bauskett v. Keitt, 22 S. C. 187, it was held to be a question for the jury where two of the witnesses to an alleged lost will testified to its execution in the presence of themselves and another witness, all of whom signed as witnesses, but such other witness denied it. The case of Watkins v. Watkins, 13 Rich. So, where a will was claimed to have been fraudulently destroyed the evidence of its execution was sufficient, where one of the subscribing witnesses testified positively that the paper referred to was declared by the testator to be his last will, and the other witness so testified on his direct examination, but on cross-examination testified that such statement was made by the draftsman in the presence of the testator, as was also the request to sign. The will was read aloud to the testator and signed by pears from the evidence that the object of both these conveyances was to provide annuities, by virtue of an arrangement entered into between Dr. Turner and his sons, whereby, in order to relieve the doctor of the burden of caring for the property, the conveyances were made to his sons, they to pay interest on the notes during the doctor's lifetime. They contend that, upon his death, interest was to cease, and the principal of the notes was not to be paid. These are the notes referred to in the second and third paragraphs of the will propounded. Dr. Turner's wife died in 1888. Soon thereafter one Keren Rootham, or, as she herself signs her name, Kerenhappuch Rootham, a maiden of mature years, became installed in Dr. Turner's home as his housekeeper. It is to her that the fourth paragraph of the alleged will relates. Mr. Clark and Mr. Scott, who are named as executors, were prominent members of the Presbyterian Church, of which Dr. Turner was also a member. Capt Scott was a lawyer, and seems to have been Dr. Turner's legal adviser. Dr. Turner seems to have acquired somewhat of a habit of making wills, as there is evidence, chiefly from entries in his diary, of his having executed several such instruments in the last decade of his life. There him in the presence of the witnesses, who signed it in his presence. Early v. Early, 5 Redf. 376.

In Lewis v. Lewis, 6 Serg. & R. 499, it was said: "If a will of land is lost or secreted, parol proof of its contents by one witness would be sufficient, the proof of its execution being made by the requisite number."

And in Conoly v. Gayle, 61 Ala. 116, it was held that the fact that one of the subscribing witnesses to a lost will was incompetent did not vitiate the same where the requisite number of competent witnesses attested the same.

So, where a will was presented and proved before the court of probate in order to be executed, and was afterwards lost, it was held that parol evidence was admissible to establish it by witnesses who had subscribed to the will and had been sworn before the judge of probates to prove it, and the propounders offered to prove the loss, and after such facts were proved offered to give evidence of its contents. Thomas v. Thomas, 2 La. 166.

So, where the attorney who prepared a will from personal instructions of the testatrix, together with his partner and clerk who witnessed its execution, testified clearly and positively to the fact and produced the original draft of the will, and their book showing credit for payment of charges, there was no doubt as to the will having been duly executed. Podmore v. Wharton, 3 Swab. & T. 449, 38 L. J. Prob. N. 143, 10 Jur. N. S. 755, 10 L. T. N. S. 754.

And a lost will was established where proof of a pencil memorandum in the testator's handwriting was corroborated by the attesting witnesses. Southworth v. Adams, 11 Bls. 256.

Under La. Old Code, art. 159, p. 244, New Code, art. 1648, requiring for the proof of an olographic will the testimony of two credible witnesses, who declare that they recognize the testament as being entirely written, dated, and signed in the testator's handwriting, "as having often seen him write and sign during his lifetime," a will lost or destroyed after the testator's death was admitted to probate where the witnesses testified that the will was entirely written, dated, and signed by the testator, but they did not say that "they had often seen him write." It was held that this clause was not sacramental but directory, and the evidence showed an intimacy and relationship which left little room to doubt that they were really well acquainted with his handwriting and had probably seen him write often but did not expressly say so. Clark's Succession, 11 La. Ann. 124.

In Fuentes v. Gaines, 25 La. Ann. 85, the probate was set aside on the ground that the evidence was by witnesses who derived their knowledge of the contents from the verbal declarations of the testator. But this case was reversed in 92 U. S. 10, 23 L. ed. 524, on account of the failure of the state court to transfer the case to the Federal court.

And in Gaines v. Lizardi, 3 Woods. 77, on the removal to the circuit court, it was held that under La. Civ. Code, art. 1588 (1861), declaring an olographic will shall be entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator, this will was 88 L. R. A.

proved to have been executed by two witnesses, the evidence being the same as in Clark's Succession, 11 La. Ann. 125.

Different phases of subsequent proceedings of this celebrated case are found in 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 404, 10 L. ed. 221; 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 9, 10 L. ed. 642; 43 U. S. 2 How. 619, 11 L. ed. 406; 47 U. S. 6 How. 550, 12 L. ed. 553; 52 U. S. 15 Wall. 624, 21 L. ed. 215; 17 Fed. Rep. 16; 1 Woods, 118.

In Harris v. Tisereau, 52 Ga. 158, 21 Am. Rep. 243, it was said that if the will be lost the witnesses should be produced if accessible, if not, the next best evidence should be used to prove the execution.

And where a will had been destroyed by one of the subscribing witnesses, who with another subscribing witness were the only heirs, and they had made a sham effort to probate the will in the county court, and testified as to the attestation in such a manner that the probate was refused, and then destroyed the will, a court of equity notwithstanding the rejection by the probate court declared the proof of execution sufficient to enforce the same and grant a decree of emancipation to slaves that were emancipated by such will. It was held that the complainant should not be precluded by the rejection of the will when it was attested by their antagonists in interest, offered for probate by one of them, and defeated by the general statement of the other, without any cross-examination or any person present who was interested in establishing the will, as each of these interested witnesses showed himself capable of resorting to improper devices for the purpose of injuring the beneficiaries. Mullins v. Wall, 8 B. Mon. 445.

And in Re Russell, 33 Hun. 271, affirmed 98 N. Y. 633, proof of the execution of a lost will was required to be made, and the evidence was insufficient where it was not shown that there was a full attestation clause subscribed by proper witnesses.

The evidence of a solicitor that he drew the will for the decedent, but could not remember the witnesses who attested it, was insufficient. Grant v. Grant, 1 Sandf. Ch. 235.

And in Collyer v. Collyer, 4 Dem. 53, Affirmed 110 N. Y. 481, the factum of the will was not established where the draft produced contained neither the name of the decedent nor those of the witnesses, and the only witness in regard to this matter did not testify positively that he was a subscribing witness, and he was unable to state who the other witnesses were.

And under Md. act 1715, chap. 30, conferring power on the probate judge to cause to be proved any last will and testament, although the same concerned title to land, and 29 Car. II., chap. 3, § 5, providing that all devises and bequests of lands shall be in writing, signed by the party devising the same or some other person in his presence and by his express directions, and shall be attested and subscribed in the presence of said devisor by three or four credible witnesses, or else they shall be utterly void, a copy of a lost will admitted to probate by the register of wills was not admissible in is a little evidence of this character tending to show the execution by him of a will later than the one here in controversy, but this evidence would not be of such a character as to justify the rejection of this will, were this one satisfactorily established. It is claimed that the will propounded was executed in the summer of 1888, and it quite satisfactorily appears that Dr. Turner, during that summer, did execute a will, which was witnessed by Fred Schmidt and George A. Hagensick. Neither witness pretends to have been informed as to the contents of the will. There is evidence to the effect that, on one occasion, and perhaps on three occasions, between the time when this will was executed and Dr. Turner's death, the doctor exhibited to Miss Rootham an envelope, and also, without displaying its contents, a paper inclosed in that envelope, telling Miss Rootham that it was his will, and calling her attention to the fact that he deposited it in a certain valise, which he hung in a closet in his house. He also placed the key to the valise in a drawer, and called her attention to that fact. He left with her an envelope marked "Miss Keren Rootham (after my death). J. J. Turner." This envelope, when opened, contained a direction to Miss evidence to show a devise of real estate, where the paper offered was not proved to have been attested by three witnesses, and the certificate of register or probate did not show that the provisions of the statute were complied with in this respect. Hale v. Monroe, 28 Md. 93.

III. Evidence of the contents.

a. Sufficiency.

1. In general.

It is generally held that it will be sufficient if the contents of a lost or destroyed will are clearly and distinctly proved. Some courts require proof beyond all doubt, some hold that it is sufficient if the contents are substantially proved. The expressions used in various cases are set out below.

The contents of a lost or destroyed will should be proved in the same manner as a deed, note, or bond. Foster's Appeal, 87 Pa. 67, 30 Am. Rep. 340; Jaques v. Horton, 76 Ala. 238.

They should be proved in general terms. Forthing v. Weber, 99 Ind. 589.

They should be substantially proved. Banning v. Banning, 12 Ohio St. 437; Jones v. Casler, 139 Ind. 832; Allison v. Allison, 7 Dana, 91.

They should be substantially proved under Ohio act May 8, 1852, § 47, 50 (3 Curwin, 1910, 1904), providing that the contents shall be substantially proved. Banning v. Banning, 12 Ohio St. 437.

They should be clearly and fully proved. Re Foster, 13 Phila. 507.

They should be clearly established. Baker v. Dobyns, 4 Dana, 220.

They should be clearly and distinctly proved. Dower v. Seeds, 28 W. Va. 113, 57 Am. Rep. 646; Re Paine, 6 Dem. 361.

They should be clear and satisfactory. Harris v. Tisereau, 52 Ga. 153, 11 Am. Rep. 242; McNeely v. Pearson (Tenn. Ch.) 42 S. W. 165, Affirmed by supreme court.

They should be of the clearest and most satisfactory character. Büchle's Estate, 3 Pa. Dist. R. 16.

They should be clear and uncontradicted. Everitt v. Everitt, 41 Harb. 385, Affirmed 29 N. Y. 39.

Should be clear and convincing. Wyckoff v. Wyckoff, 16 N. J. Eq. 401.

Evidence of the contents should be such as to satisfy the conscience of the jury, and should be very clear and strong. Kitchens v. Kitchens, 39 Ga. 163, 99 Am. Dec. 453.

Proof should be very clear and might be by parol. Deaves's Estate, 140 Pa. 242.

It should be full and satisfactory. Dudley v. Wardner, 41 Vt. 59.

The contents should be proved by evidence as cogent and satisfactory as that required to establish the validity when produced in open court. Harris v. Harris, 10 Wash. 555.

They should be proved by the most stringent evidence. Huble v. Clark, 1 Hagx. Eccl. Rep. 115.

Evidence should be strong, positive, and free from all doubt. Davis v. Sigourney, 8 Mot. 487.

Should be of a very cogent character, and not less 88 L. R. A.

than to rectify mistakes in written contracts and actions in chancery. Wharram v. Wharram, 10 Jur. N. S. 499, 8 Swab. & T. 301, 33 L. J. Prob. N. S. 75, 10 L. T. N. S. 163, 12 Week. Rep. 889.

Should be clear, strong, and irrefragable, free from suspicion or doubt in its sources, exact and certain in its conclusions. Podmore v. Wharton, 3 Swab. & T. 449, 33 L. J. Prob. N. S. 143, 10 Jur. N. S. 756, 10 L. T. N. S. 754.

Should be of the most cogent and irrefragable character, free from suspicion in its sources, and exact and certain in its conclusions. Fitzgerald v. Wynne, 1 App. D. C. 107.

Should be the fullest and most satisfactory proof of the contents, and the last trace of reasonable doubt and suspicion should be dispelled by trustworthy evidence. Moore v. Whitehouse, 3 Swab. & T. 567, 34 L. J. Prob. N. S. 31, 11 L. T. N. S. 458.

Should be so strong that the last trace of reasonable doubt or suspicion should be dispelled by trustworthy evidence. Moore v. Whitehouse, 11 L. T. N. S. 458, 3 Swab. & T. 567, 34 L. J. Prob. N. S. 31.

In Clark v. Wright, 3 Pick. 67, it was held that parol evidence was sufficient to probate a codicil which had been lost or destroyed.

In Burks v. Burks, 86 L. J. Prob. N. S. 125, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 472, 16 L. T. N. S. 677, 15 Week. Rep. 180, it was said that in ascertaining the contents of a lost will "the court must, so far as regards the sources from which the testimony is sought, proceed in the same way as if it were dealing with any other paper, the contents of which are to be proved by secondary evidence."

All that could reasonably be required of a party seeking to establish a will would be to show in general terms the disposition which the testator made of his property by the instrument, and that it purported to be his will, and that it was duly attested by the requisite number of witnesses, where such instrument was destroyed after the testator's death by another heir without the fault of complainant, and there was no copy shown to be in existence. Anderson v. Irwin, 101 Ill. 411.

And proof was sufficient where the contents were clearly and distinctly proved. Schultz v. Schultz, 35 N. Y. 653, 91 Am. Dec. 88.

And where the contents were clearly and fully proved. Foster's Appeal, 87 Pa. 67, 30 Am. Rep. 340.

And a lost will was established on satisfactory proof of destruction and contents. Trevelyan v. Trevelyan, 1 Phillim. Eccl. Rep. 149; Bowen v. Idley, 1 Edw. Ch. 148; Idley v. Bowen, 11 Wend. 227.

Any evidence admissible under the rules of law to establish the existence of a lost will and its contents can be received, although the statute provides for proving a will by a certified copy from the record of the county court. McNeely v. Pearson (Tenn. Ch.) 42 S. W. 165, Affirmed by supreme court.

And in an action for partition the evidence was sufficient where the contents were proved distinctly by one witness who was corroborated by

Rootham "to give my valise key to Mr. William Clark, who can take the note case, which contains all valuable papers, also any money in my old book, and the key of the house to my son R. Morris Turner." Mr. Clark was, unfortunately, absent from Lincoln at the time of Dr. Turner's death. Immediately after his funeral the two sons of Dr. Turner found Miss Rootham in possession of the valise. At their solicitation, she exhibiting some reluctance, she delivered the valise to William J. Turner, both sons giving her a written receipt therefor. The valise was placed in William J. Turner's house. Early in May it was announced that this house had been entered by burglars, and a number of articles abstracted. The account of this affair, as given by William J. Turner, and corroborated in most particulars by his wife and brother, is that, with his family, he made an evening call upon his brother, and returned home about half past 10. During his absence the house had been entered through a basement window. Some jewels had been stolen. This valise had been cut open, and papers, evidently abstracted therefrom, were found scattered about the floor. No will was found among these papers. From the foregoing facts we think the proponents raised a other evidence under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 8d ed. p. 182, §§ 85, 89, providing that the contents shall be clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses and the plaintiffs were not concluded by the dismissal of a suit in which they had sought to probate the will. Harris v. Harris, 26 N. Y. 433, Reversing 36 Barb. 88.

In Timon v. Claffy, 45 Barb. 433, it was said that in Harris v. Harris, 36 Barb. 88, the complaint was dismissed because the contents were not proved by two witnesses, and that in an action at law the judgment was held conclusive on the parties. But Harris v. Harris, 26 N. Y. 433, says: "The single purpose of the former one was to make proof of a will alleged to have been lost or destroyed. And the judgment in legal effect was, that there was not sufficient proof to establish the will as a record according to the provisions of the statute in relation to the probate of wills. To this extent it was conclusive. But the action did not directly involve the validity of the will, as a will or devise of real estate, and no such judgment was authorized. No such judgment in terms reaching that question was given. On the contrary, the record distinctly shows that the exclusive ground on which the judgment refusing probate proceeded was, that there was a failure of statute evidence as to the contents of the will, which the court found had been made and published in due form of law to pass real and personal estate, and was fraudulently destroyed by the plaintiff in this action."

And the evidence was sufficient where the proof of contents was clear and explicit, and the evidence showed beyond doubt that the will had been surreptitiously destroyed. Buchanan v. Matlock, 8 Humph. 399, 47 Am. Dec. 622.

And it was held that N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1865, requiring that the provisions of the will be clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses, "a correct copy or draft being equivalent to one witness," was to be liberally construed. Re De Groot, 18 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 102.

And in an action of partition, the attorney who drew the will and subscribed it as a witness also proved its contents. Dan v. Brown, 4 Cow. 453, 15 Am. Dec. 366.

Where it is sought to establish a lost will it was error to instruct the jury that "everything may be presumed against the destroyer of the will." The court said: "The doctrine is, that unfavorable presumption and intentment shall be against the party who has destroyed the instrument which is the subject of inquiry, in order that he may not gain by his wrong. But where there is express and positive evidence, there is no place for presumption or inference. It is only in reference to the contents of a paper destroyed or withheld that the maxim can have application; and where the contents are proved, there is no occasion for resort to the maxim." Bott v. Wood, 56 Miss. 186.

In an action of ejectment where a party claimed through a will which could not be found, and it was proved that land was devised to three children and the wife in fee and that two of them had sold their part and had acted upon and submitted to the will as validly devising the land purporting to be theirs by devise, it was held that the existence of the will was established by the evidence of one of the heirs "that she saw the will and her explicit statement of what it contained, and the fact that the devisee and the heir at law being one, all submitted to and acted upon the will as she described." Brown v. Morrow, 43 U. C. Q. B. 436.

In an action of ejectment where the second will was traced to the testator's possession and could not be found after his death, parol evidence of its contents was proved by one witness and established the revocation of the former will, and the presumption of revocation by the testator was not overcome. It was held that the testator died intestate. Brown v. Brown, 27 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 173, 8 El. & Bl. 876, 4 Jur. N. S. 163.

And parol evidence of the contents of a will was admissible where the same had been recorded and the record and the original destroyed by fire; but the evidence was insufficient where the witness was eighty-five years old, and testified to hearing the will read sixty-five years previously, stating the testamentary disposition of the testator's property. Apperson v. Dowdy, 82 Va. 776.

In Woodroff v. Burton (Feb. 1719), 1 P. Wms. 734 where the devisee brought a bill against the heir and it was shown that there was such a will as the plaintiff suggested and that the defendant had destroyed it, it was decreed that the defendant convey the premises to the plaintiff in fee.

In Hampden v. Hampden, 3 Bro. P. C. 550, where the plaintiff claimed as devisee under the defendant's father's will, and the defendant had suppressed the will, it was held that although the contents were not proved exactly, yet the defendant might have cleared this by producing the will, therefore it was decreed that the plaintiff, the devisee, should hold and enjoy until the defendant produced the will.

In Campbell v. West, 3 B. Mon. 242, where the question was as to the jurisdiction of a court of equity, it is said: "We are of the opinion that there being no difficulty in proving the publication and contents of the will in the county court, and there being no proof of a fraudulent suppression or spoliation by any one of the appellants, a court of equity ought not, now especially, to assume jurisdiction to decide on the ultimate rights of the parties."

An instruction: "Unless the evidence of the contents of the alleged will is clear and positive,—not vague or uncertain recollections,—and of such a character as to leave no reasonable doubt as to any of the substantial parts of the paper, the jury should find for the contestants,"—was properly refused because the rule laid down was too strict. Skogg v. Horton, 82 Ala. 352.

But in an action of reversion, persons claiming to be instituted heirs under a will alleged to be lost or destroyed were not allowed to prove its existence, loss, and contents in the district court, when it had never been admitted to probate by strong presumption, if they did not make conclusive proof, that a will by Dr. Turner had been executed, that it was placed in the valise, and that it was there at the time of his death. Without desiring to cast any unfavorable reflection upon any of the parties concerned, we may be, perhaps, permitted the remark that the unusual conduct of the burglar in seeking out this valise from an upstairs closet, cutting it open, and scattering its contents over the floor, does not tend in our minds to raise any inference that no will was among the papers so abstracted, although it does not appear that any paper belonging to Dr. Turner, and known to be in existence, was actually carried away by the felon. In addition to the foregoing there appeared certain declarations of Dr. Turner, extending to a short time before his death, from which it would appear that the will had not been revoked. Such declarations we think admissible for this purpose, as will be hereinafter indicated.

The difficulty lies in the proof which was offered as to the contents of the will. It does not appear that any person ever read the will, or was aware of any portion of its contents, except through statements made by Dr. Turner. The strongest evidence is that of Capt. Scott, to the effect that Dr. Turner came to his office declaring that he had made his will, and the court of probate. Clappier v. Banks, 11 La. 503.

A will claimed to have been fraudulently suppressed after the death of the testatrix was not established on account of insufficiency of proof, and it was held that it would require the most stringent evidence to establish the paper. Huble v. Clark, 1 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 115.

Where the question of title between vendor and vendee depended upon a will which had been proved in New York, but which had never been registered or proved in Ontario, the affidavit of the loss of the will was held to be insufficient evidence to establish the same where there was some reason to apprehend that there existed no legal means of proof of the will by the purchaser if he was compelled to accept the title. Brady v. Walls, 17 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 699.

And the contents of a lost will could not be proved on motion without the consent of the next of kin. Re Pearson [1896] P. 239.

A party could not intervene in proceedings for the probate of a will, where he claimed that a prior will was in existence at the testator's death in which he was named as legatee or devisee, and which was still in existence or had been fraudulently destroyed, where he did not show that he was a legatee or devisee or establish the provisions of the prior will as required by N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1865. Re Hammersly, 7 N. Y. S. R. 232.

2. Wills torn in pieces.

Where a will has been torn in pieces without the consent of the testator, it may be established by proving the missing parts.

So, a will and codicil which were torn in pieces by the testator's son after the death of the testator were probated, where some of the pieces were saved and by oral evidence the court arrived at the substance of the instruments. Foster v. Foster, 1 Add. Eccl. Rep. 462.

So, a will was established where a younger brother of the heir at law snatched the will out of the hands of the executor and tore it up in many small pieces, and most of them, particularly such parts wherein it was the devise of the land, were picked up and stitched together again. Haines v. Haines, 2 Vern. 441.

And the probate of a will was allowed where the will after the testator's death was torn in pieces by one of his sons while a copy was being made by the executor, and a copy supplied some blanks where the pieces were not found. The court said: "If you can supply the whole of a lost will by evidence from memory why should you not supply part of an incomplete will which has been partly destroyed when you have evidence in the form of a copy which has been made at the time?" Goods of Leigh [1892] P. 82.

So, where a will was torn in pieces after the death of the testator, the court ordered that the will be pasted together and decreed probate. Knight v. Cook, 1 Lee, Eccl. Rep. 413.

"In an eject 'firm' upon a trial at the bar the evidence was that one Warner by his will in writing devised the lands in question to Henry Etheringham, and the heirs males of his body, and bailed the writing to the scrivener to keep, and four years after died, and about a fortnight after his death this writing was found in the scrivener's study, gnawn all to pieces with rats, yet he with the help of the pieces, and of his memory and other witnesses, caused it to be proved in the ecclesiastical court, and now the court demanded of the witnesses, whether a stranger that knew not the contents of the will before, by joining of the pieces together could tell that the devise of the lands in question was to Etheringham, and the heirs males of his body; for they did agree that if this clause could be made out, though by joining of the pieces, it were a good will, for all that. But the witnesses said that a stranger could not make out that clause. Whereupon the court directed the jury, that if they found that the will was gnawn before the death of the deviser, then 'twas for the plaintiff, if after, for the defendant, and the jury found for the defendant in favor of the will." Etheringham v. Etheringham, Aleyn, 2.

3. Proof by copy.

Where it is proved that a will has been duly executed, and that it has been lost or destroyed without the knowledge or consent of the testator, the best evidence of its contents is a copy or draft of the will if it can be obtained, and this is sufficient when satisfactorily proved. Burl v. Burl, 36 L. J. Prob. N. S. 125, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 472, 16 L. T. N. S. 677, 15 Week. Rep. 1090; Graham v. O'Fallon, 8 Mo. 507; Hildreth v. Schillenger, 10 N. J. Eq. 196; James v. James, 3 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 184, note; Happy's Will, 4 Bibb, 553; Goods of Cousins, 1 Notes of Cases, 236; Goods of Peobell, 6 Jur. N. S. 406; Podmore v. Whotton, 33 L. J. Prob. N. S. 143, 38 Swab. & T. 449, 10 Jur. N. S. 750, 10 L. T. N. S. 754; Lane's Will, 2 Dana, 108; Martin v. Luking, 1 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 244; Sly v. Sly, 46 L. J. Prob. N. S. 61, L. R. 2 Prob. Div. 91, 25 Week. Rep. 463; Batton v. Watson, 13 Ga. 63, 58 Am. Dec. 504; Goods of Barber, 36 L. J. Prob. N. S. 19, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 267, 15 L. T. N. S. 192, 15 Week. Rep. 231; Payne's Will, 4 T. B. Mon. 423; Hamilton v. Lighbody, 21 U. C. C. P. 123; Jackson, Schuyler, v. Russell, 4 Wend. 543; Forbuz v. Weber, 99 Ind. 589; Re Coghlan, 4 L. T. N. S. 839.

So, the probate of a lost will was allowed where the contents of the will were proved by a draft, and the witnesses agreed in all the substantial matters contained in the chief part of the draft, and its due execution was proved. Burl v. Burl, 36 L. J. Prob. N. S. 135, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 472, 16 L. T. N. S. 677, 15 Week. Rep. 1090.

So, a probate was granted on a copy, where it was proved that the original will was duly executed, and was destroyed or lost after the death of the testator. Graham v. O'Fallon, 8 Mo. 507.

then read it to Capt. Scott, asking him whether it was in legal form. Capt. Scott was blind, and therefore did not see the will himself, so that his testimony amounts to nothing more than a repetition of Dr. Turner's declarations as to its contents. In addition to this there is evidence of a few declarations, made to others, subsequently, as to the effect of different provisions contained in the will. Dr. Turner told Mr. Clark that he and Capt. Scott were named as executors. He told Keren Rootham that he had provided for her. He told his pastor, Dr. Curtis, something in regard to the bequest to the two missionary boards. Beyond this there is no evidence as to the contents of the will. Mr. Clark had, about the time the will was executed, obtained copies of the two notes referred to. Just before the will was propounded for probate, he obtained from the records a description of the property covered by the Morris Turner mortgage. The copy propounded was made up by Capt. Scott's dictating to Mr. Clark from recollection of Dr. Turner's declarations, and Mr. Clark's filling in the description of the notes and mortgage from the memoranda in his possession. The attestation clause was copied from a form book. We do not think that this was sufficient evidence of the contents of the will, and from this it follows that the verdict was the only

So, where a copy was proved by the scrivener who drew the will. Hilbreth v. Schillenger, 10 N. J. Eq. 196.

An executed fair copy of a will was probated where the facts proving adherence to the last moment of the testator's life were quite irresistible. James v. James, 3 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 184, note.

The probate of a will was allowed on proof of a copy where it was in existence up to near the time of his death, and declarations of the testator showed that he had such will, and the testator's son acted suspiciously at the time of his death and claimed there was no will. Finch v. Finch, 36 L. J. Prob. N. S. 78, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 371, 16 L. T. N. S. 268, 15 Week. Rep. 797.

And where the original will was lost or mislaid, it was held that the next best evidence was a copy of the same, and this should be admitted to probate when properly proved. Happy's Will, 4 Bibb, 558.

So, a probate was granted to a copy of the will where the affidavit of the attesting witness proved its due execution, and the will was given to a solicitor after the testator's death to make a copy, and the will was stolen from his office. Goods of Cousins, 1 Notes of Cases, 236.

And the probate of a copy retained by the testator was allowed where his solicitor kept the original, which could not be found after the testator's death. Goods of Peebell, 6 Jur. N. S. 406.

So, where the will was proved to have been in existence at the death of the testatrix, or that it had been apollated or destroyed by the next of kin who opposed the application for probate, the probate of a draft was allowed. Podmore v. Wharton, 38 L. J. Prob. N. S. 143, 38 Sab. & T. 449, 10 Jur. N. S. 756, 10 L. T. N. S. 754.

And a sworn copy of a will was properly admitted to probate where the original will was lost, and the executors named, and the clerk of the court where the original should be kept testified that they did not know what had become of it, and the due execution of the original was proved. Lane's Will, 2 Dana, 106.

So, a will was established where it was destroyed after the testator's death, and its contents were proved by a draft of the same. In this case the contestant admitted that the proof established that the draft was entitled to probate. Martin v. Luking, 1 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 244.

And a will was probated on proof of a copy found among the papers of the solicitor of one of the executors, which copy was in the handwriting of the solicitor's clerk whose name appeared as one of the attesting witnesses, the attorney and his clerk both being dead and fifty years having elapsed. The copy was corroborated by the declarations of a deceased person who claimed a limited interest under the will. Sly v. Sly, 46 L. J. Prob. N. S. 63, L. R. 2 Prob. Div. 91, 25 Week. Rep. 463.

A will which the testator had destroyed through duress was admitted to probate on the evidence of two witnesses, one of whom had transcribed the same and the other a subscribing witness who identified a copy as substantially the same as the destroyed will, and two other subscribing witnesses who proved that the testator was in his right mind at the time of the execution of the will. Batton v. Watson, 13 Ga. 68, 58 Am. Dec. 504.

And a copy of a destroyed will was probated where the copy was proved by persons who heard the will read, and the persons entitled in distribution filed a proxy of consent for the probate of the draft. Goods of Barber, 36 L. J. Prob. N. S. 12.

So, a will was admitted to probate where a subscribing witness proved the same by a substantial copy, and the contestant refused to produce a literal copy made for him by such witness while the original was in his possession, and the due publication was proved by the attesting witness, and the will had been secretly taken from the possession of the witness with whom it had been left for safe-keeping and could not be found. Payne's Will, 4 T. R. Mon. 423.

In ejectment where it was proved that the defendant had the will upon which plaintiff's title depended, and refused to produce it on subpoena duces tecum, the evidence was sufficient where the will was proved by one of the subscribing witnesses, and who also corroborated a true copy of the will produced on the trial. Hamilton v. Lightbody, 21 U. C. C. P. 126.

So, in an action of ejectment an exemplified copy of an ancient will was admissible in evidence, where a witness testified that he had examined all the bundles of wills given him by the surrogate which should have contained the will in question if it was in the surrogate's office. It was held that the evidence of this witness was as satisfactory as that of the surrogate provided he had equal opportunity to ascertain the fact. Jackson, Schuyler, v. Russell, 4 Wend. 543.

And under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1831, § 2009, a will destroyed by a testator in a temporary fit of insanity was properly probated by evidence of a copy recorded by the recorder at the instance of the testator in the books of record, sustained by evidence of the deputy recorder, and by a witness who went to his office with the testator, and by a witness as to its being a true copy, and declarations of the testator as to depositing for record, and evidence of the testator taking the original from the office after record. It was held that after a true copy was shown it was not necessary to prove the exact contents by another witness, but it would be sufficient if it was proved in general terms. Forbing v. Weber, 99 Ind. 580.

In Goods of Coghlan, 4 L. T. N. S. 839, it was held that where an original will was lost and a pencil draft was attempted to be probated, the affidavit to support the motion should state in hac verba the contents of the lost will.

But where a will was executed and there was not room enough for the signatures, which were attached on another piece of paper, and the scrivener attempted to replace it by a copy which he produced to the testator who signed it without reading one which could properly be returned upon the evidence. It becomes, therefore, unnecessary for us to consider any special assignments of error relating to other branches of the case.

The precise question does not seem to have often arisen. We think all the cases hold that the declarations of a testator may be received in evidence to prove the existence of a will, and in proof of issues relating to the testator's competency or to undue influence; but it has been doubted whether such declarations may be received to establish a revocation. It follows that, in all proceedings to probate a lost will, such declarations are admissible in evidence because the existence of the will must necessarily be established by some such indirect method. The declarations having been admitted for that purpose, their sufficiency to establish the contents of the will is another question. In England, prior to the leading case of Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards, L. R. 1 Prob. Div. 154, it was considered that the declarations were not admissible as tending to prove the contents. Doe, Shallcross, v. Palmer, 16 Q. B. 747, turned upon the question whether an interlineation had been made before or after the execution of the will, and it was held that the testator's declarations as to his intentions made before the execution of the will were admissible, but the declarathe same or having it read to him, and the former one was destroyed, the probate of both was refused, where it was not shown that the substituted will was a copy of the previous one. Day v. Day, 8 N. J. Eq. 548.

And where the draft of a will was offered for probate, and the will had been destroyed by the widow inadvertently burning it with some old papers, thinking it was of no value, the court said: "People are constantly destroying wills, and the very persons who have destroyed them afterwards ask for probate of them. This is not one case, but one out of a hundred. I wish I had power to punish a person who destroys a will, but I have not. This, however, I always have done and I always will do, I will have the will propounded before I admit it to probate; I will give no assistance whatever to a person who has destroyed a will." Goods of Body, 84 L. J. Prob. N. S. 55, 4 Swab. & T. 2.

4. Number of witnesses.

In regard to the number of witnesses necessary to establish the contents of a lost or destroyed will, the weight of authority is that in the absence of a statute the contents of a lost will may be established by the evidence of one witness, but there are some cases which hold that two witnesses are necessary. In some states the statute is mandatory. In the following cases one witness was held to be sufficient for that purpose: Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards, L. R. 1 Prob. Div. 154, 45 L. J. Prob. N. S. 49, 34 L. T. N. S. 300, 24 Week. Rep. 479, 17 Moak. Eng. Rep. 453; Colligan's Estate, 5 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 198; Dan v. Brown, 4 Cow. 483, 15 Am. Dec. 396; Jackson, Brown, v. Betts, 6 Cow. 377; Dickey v. Malechli, 6 Mo. 177, 34 Am. Dec. 130; Kearns v. Kearns, 4 Harr. (Del.) 83; Baker v. Dohyans, 4 Dana, 221; Graham v. O'Fallon, 4 Mo. 601; Wyckoff v. Wickoff, 16 N. J. Eq. 401; Lewis v. Lewis, 6 Serg. & R. 489.

In Graham v. O'Fallon, 4 Mo. 601, it was held that the contents of a lost will could be proved by one witness. It was said that the rule that the contents should be proved by two witnesses, stated in Graham v. O'Fallon, 3 Mo. 511, was not a decision upon that question; but the question was, Could a will lost or destroyed be set up at all by proving the contents? and the case in Toller on Executors, 71, never was cited by this court, "nor does the author even affirm the law was so, but it had been done."

And a will was admitted to probate where its contents were proved by one witness who had destroyed the will under a mistake, and his testimony was above reproach and he could gain nothing by the intestacy of the deceased. It was held that the proof of its destruction and of its contents or substance, whether by one witness or by many, must be clear, satisfactory, and convincing. Wyckoff v. Wyckoff, 16 N. J. Eq. 401.

In Beall v. Cunningham, 1 B. Mon. 399, 39 Am. Dec. 469, it was said in regard to a subsequent will, which was not probated, that C, being a nominated executor in that will and charged by the testator's dying injunction with the immediate execution of it, his testimony might be sufficient in the absence of any countervailing facts to authorize extraneous proof as to its contents, where it was lost.

And in Brown v. Brown, 8 El. & Bl. 876, 27 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 173, 4 Jur. N. S. 163, a subsequent will which was lost was established by one witness to show a revocatory clause.

And in Helyar v. Helyar, 1 Lee, Eocl. Rep. 472, the contents of the second will which was lost was proved by one witness corroborated by declarations of the testator, to show that the second will was of a different purport from the former will, and the second will was held to be a revocation of the first.

But in Hunter v. Gardenhire, 13 Lea, 753, it was held that in order to establish a lost will as to realty, the proof should be the clearest and most stringent evidence of two unexceptionable witnesses who saw and read the will and remembered the contracts thereof.

And where two witnesses proved the contents of the will, and that it was witnessed about five days before the testator's death, and it could not be found, and the answer of his daughter admitted that she knew of the will, that its contents were such as stated in the bill, and that she made an admission the morning after his death that the will was in the house and tried to explain such admission in an absurd way, and it was shown that the testator had an aversion for her husband, who was a profligate drunkard, and the daughter obtained the keys to his papers the evening before he died, the will was admitted to probate. Brown v. Brown, 10 Yerg. 84.

So, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1865, providing that a lost or destroyed will should be clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses, a correct copy or draft being equivalent to one witness, it was held that these provisions should be liberally construed, and a destroyed will was proved where the scrivener retained the draft and verified it with another person before it was executed, and the draft was identified by the scrivener and the party who verified the same. Re De Groot, 18 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 102.

And under this section it was held that a stipulation by counsel in regard to the contents of a will was not sufficient to admit the same to probate. Re Ruser, 6 Dem. 31.

On the ground that a finding is presumed to be based on the required proof, it is held not necessary for a special finding in an action to probate a lost will to show that proof has been or has not been made by the number of witnesses required by Ind. Rev. 1881, § 2009, providing that "no will of any testator shall be allowed to be proved and established as lost or destroyed, unless the same shall be proved to have been in existence at the time of the death of the testator, or be shown to have been destroyed in the lifetime of the testator without his consent, tions made after its execution were not. Quick v. Quick, 3 Swab. & T. 442, was a case startlingly like that at bar in some points. The sole evidence of the contents of the will was the testator's declaration. There was the same fact of the will being kept in a bag, and of its being taken by burglars. The court held that there was a failure of proof, holding, also, that the declarations were incompetent. The court of appeals, however, in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards, overruled Quick v. Quick, and distinctly held such declarations admissible. The will in question was, however, proved by much other evidence. Miss Sugden, the testator's daughter, had not only heard the will read, but she had herself read it a number of times, and was able to testify in much detail as to its contents from such personal inspection. Moreover, not less than eight codicils were found, the terms of these all tending to corroborate her as to the contents of the original will. In addition to this proof, there was the evidence of the testator's declarations as to the will's contents. The long and exhaustive opinions are directed only incidentally to the admissibility of the declarations. The crucial question having been whether all the evidence was sufficient to establish the will, the case, therefore, falls far short of holding that the contents of a lost will may be proved or otherwise fraudulently disposed of; nor unless the provisions shall be clearly proved by two witnesses, or by a correct copy and the testimony of one witness." It was further held that it was not necessary that some two witnesses should concur in their evidence of the entire contents of the alleged will so that the instrument could be reproduced at full length, and it was only necessary that the substantial contents of the will should be proved. And the probate of a will was proper where the provisions of the will as probated had the united support of two witnesses, although of the three witnesses all did not concur as to each provision. Jones v. Casler, 139 Ind. 382.

A will was probated where it did not appear that all the contents of the will as sworn to by one witness were also sworn to by the other, although the testimony of the latter did not contradict that of the former, but confirmed it; yet his testimony did not relate to any portions of the will except such as relate to its form. The institution of his daughter as universal legatee, and the appointment of executors, and the examination of witnesses, did not appear to have been conducted with any reference to a detailed description of the will, and it was held that the universal legacy being established beyond question, the particular legacies which tended to diminish the estate were sufficiently proved on general principles against such legatee by a single witness, because those legacies were set up in the petition of the party who was to be charged with them, and she could not afterwards deny what she stated in her pleadings. Clark's Succession, 11 La. Ann. 124.

In Fuentes v. Gaines, 25 La. Ann. 85, the probate was set aside on the ground that the evidence was by witnesses who derived their knowledge of the contents from the verbal declarations of the testator. But this case was reversed in 22 U. S. 10, 23 L. ed. 524, on account of the failure of the state court to transfer the case to the Federal court.

On the trial in the United States circuit court the contents of a will were duly proved by two witnesses who had read the will. Gaines v. Lizardi, 3 Woods. 77.

Different phases of subsequent proceedings in this celebrated case are found in 33 U. S. 13 Pet. 404, 10 L. ed. 221; 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 9, 10 L. ed. 642; 43 U. S. 2 How. 619, 11 L. ed. 402; 47 U. S. 6 How. 550, 12 L. ed. 553; 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 624, 21 L. ed. 215; 17 Fed. Rep. 16; 1 Woods, 118.

Where a will was destroyed, and as the proponents were unable to prove its contents by two witnesses as required by Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1339, and had no standing in the probate court, and it was claimed the court of chancery should take jurisdiction, it was said: "We are not prepared to say the rule of evidence would not be the same, for if it were otherwise the safeguard thrown around the rights of heirs would be lost and the statute rendered entirely nugatory." McDaniel v. Patterson, 98 Cal. 86.

In an action by slaves emancipated under a will which was suppressed, it was held that the suppressed will was sufficiently proved where the two subscribing witnesses, both of whom read or heard the will read, testified as to the capacity of the testator, and that the will they attested contained provisions essentially different from the pretended recital in the ostensible bond which was tendered by the defendants proposing to carry out provisions of the will which they alleged to be different. The slaves were entitled to be free, where the evidence showed that the will had been confided to the custody of one of the witnesses by the testator, and he delivered it only a day or two after his death to two of the heirs who were nominated as executors, and the only countervailing evidence was that of one of the appellants who affirmed that the paper described as a bond recited the will. White v. Willis, 1 B. Mon. 180.

Under Ga. Code, § 2308, providing that if a will be lost or destroyed subsequent to the death or without the consent of the testator, a copy of the same clearly proved to be such by the subscribing witnesses and other evidence may be admitted to probate, but in every such case the presumption is of revocation by the testator and that presumption must be rebutted by proof,—it was held that it was not necessary that the contents of the will should be proved by three subscribing witnesses, and that the presumption of revocation must be rebutted by three witnesses; but the destruction or loss of the will could be proved by such other evidence as satisfied the conscience of the jury, that the will so executed as testified to by the subscribing witnesses was lost or destroyed since the death of the testator or without his consent before his death, and it was held the evidence of the contents should be such as to satisfy the conscience of the jury, and should be very clear and strong. Kitchens v. Kitchens, 39 Ga. 168, 90 Am. Dec. 453.

Under Wash. Code Civ. Proc. § 679, providing that no will shall be allowed to be proved as a lost or destroyed will, unless the same shall be proved to have been in existence at the time of the death of the testator, or be shown to have been fraudulently destroyed in the lifetime of the testator, nor unless its provisions shall be clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses, a will could not be proved where there was only one witness in the case who saw the will and he testified that he never saw it after he signed it as a witness and did not read it at that time, and had no knowledge of the contents except what he subsequently learned from conversations with the decedent, and from an examination of the recorded instrument. Harris v. Harris, 10 Wash. 555.

And the probate of a lost or destroyed will was denied where but a single witness was offered whose character was irreproachable, and his ability to express clearly the meaning of the will was unquestionable, and his testimony direct and positive as to all parts of the will, but the witness had not solely by the declarations of the testator. Its effect is merely that such declarations are admissible to corroborate more direct evidence. This is the construction given the case by the House of Lords in Woodward v. Goulstone, L. R. 11 App. Cas. 469, where the declarations of the testator were held insufficient alone to establish the will. An intimation was given that Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards was not considered free from doubt, and the question there presented left open. The importance of interests involved in probate cases in England is such that the decisions of English courts on such subjects are entitled to great weight, and we may safely say that the result of the English cases is that the contents of a lost will cannot be established solely by the declarations of the testator, although such declarations are now deemed admissible for the purpose of corroboration.

The American cases relied on to support proponent's theory are, when examined, in strict accordance with the English rule. Re Page, 118 Ill. 576, 59 Am. Rep. 395, expressly follows Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards, and comes within the true doctrine of that case, because the declarations in that case merely went to corroborate the testimony of the lawyer who drew the will, and who produced a copy thereof. Southworth v. Adams, 11 Biss.

seen the will or conversed concerning it for a period of more than eighteen months, had no copy or memoranda to refresh his recollection, and the will was a long one, requiring over three hours in its preparation, contained quite a number of legacies, varying from $300 to $50,000, creating life estates with remainders and trusts. It was held that the contents of this will were not proved with that degree of certainty required by law. Re Johnson, 40 Conn. 587.

And where a will was probated and the only witness was allowed to refresh his memory by inspecting a copy of the will, and no evidence was offered to show by whom a copy was made or from whom it was procured, the judgment of probate was set aside. It was said that the testimony of a single witness who has read and remembers the contents of a will might be sufficient, but such evidence should be so clear and positive as to leave no reasonable doubt as to the substantial parts of the paper. Jaques v. Horton, 76 Ala. 238.

In Jaques v. Horton, 76 Ala. 238, it was said: "We can conceive no valid reason why there should be any difference in the quantum of proof necessary to establish the contents of a lost will, and the contents of a lost deed, or other written instrument. In either case, the proof must be satisfactory, and probably more caution should be observed in the case of a lost will, as the testator cannot be heard in respect to the disposition he has made of his estate, and as a will is required to be attested by two witnesses."

The evidence was not sufficient to establish a destroyed will where one of the attesting witnesses testified to a draft of the will which was also substantiated by another witness, but who did not know of the execution and had no personal knowledge of what the will contained after its execution. It was held that in the absence of a correct copy or draft of a will it must be proved by at least two credible witnesses, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1865, requiring that the provisions of a lost or destroyed will should be clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses before it can be admitted to probate. The two credible witnesses need not have been witnesses to the execution of the will, but they must both be able to speak of an actual will from knowledge, and not of a possible will. Re Waldron, 19 Misc. 338.

In order to establish a lost or destroyed will the contents must be proved by two witnesses, and each witness must testify to every fact essential to the establishment of the instrument. Buechle's Estate, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 127.

The contents of an alleged lost will could not be proved by the evidence of the sole beneficiary and another person, under New York statutes requiring the contents to be proved by two credible persons. Keasy v. Dimon, 91 Hun. 642.

5. Proving part of the contents.

The weight of authority is that the whole contents of a will must be substantially proved, although there are some cases which establish so much of a lost will as was clearly proved. The following cases require proof of the whole of a will.

So, it was held that the evidence must be of the whole contents without exception or omission. Davis v. Sigourney, 8 Met. 487.

So, where a will had been destroyed by the testator when he was of unsound mind, its probate was refused where there were four or five witnesses, no two of whom agreed as to the entire contents of the will, and all or nearly all affirmed their recollection to be indistinct and imperfect. It was held that in order to probate a lost will the proof of the entire contents should be conclusive and satisfactory. Rhodes v. Vinson, 9 Gill, 169, 52 Am. Dec. 685.

And the probate of a will which had been destroyed was refused, where the scrivener who testified as to its contents could not swear positively that every provision of the original was contained in the copy. Durfee v. Durfee, 8 Met. 490, note.

And where a will was lost or destroyed after the testator's death, the probate was refused where the witness did not pretend to prove the contents of the will, nor even the language of the testator in the particular devise which was attempted to be established, and it was held that proving part only of the contents of a will which was lost or destroyed was not sufficient to establish it even as to the part proved, unless it satisfactorily appeared that there was nothing else in the will which would qualify, change, or alter the particular devise proved. Butler v. Butler, 5 Harr. (Del.) 178.

And under Colo. Gen. Stat. chap. 115, § 21, providing that whenever any will shall have been lost or destroyed and the fact of the execution can be established, and the contents are shown by the testimony of two or more witnesses, providing the order admitting to probate shall set forth the contents of the will at length and the names of the witnesses, and providing no will shall be admitted to probate upon proof of the contents, unless it shall be proved that the same was in existence at the time of the death of the testator,—evidence was insufficient to establish the contents of a lost will where there were three or four witnesses sworn, no two of whom agreed as to all the devisees nor as to who were the executors. Todd v. Renick, 18 Colo. 544.

And under the New York statute requiring that the provisions of a will lost or destroyed shall be clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses, a correct copy or draft being equivalent to one witness, the probate of a will was refused where the statute was not fully complied with and the witnesses sufficiently concurred as to some of the provisions of the will, but as to other of its provisions there was a discrepancy and the witnesses did not agree in reference to the amounts of the gifts. Sheridan v. Houghton, 6 Abb. N. C. 234.

And under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 92, § 11, providing that no will can be revoked by any subsequent 256; Re Hope, 43 Mich. 518, and Re Lambie, 97 Mich. 49, are cases of the same character, the declarations being corroborative merely, and not relied on in themselves to establish the will. In Colligan v. McKernan, 2 Dem. 481, a will had been propounded for probate. It was contended that there was a subsequent will revoking the former one, but the subsequent will was lost. The evidence offered to establish the second will consisted in the testimony of a clerk in the lawyer's office who heard the scrivener read it in the presence of the testator at the time of its execution. The court distinctly held that this testimony was merely hearsay, relating, in fact, to the scrivener's declarations, and was not equivalent to testimony by one who had himself read the will. In Clark v. Morton, 5 Rawle, 235, 28 Am. Dec. 667, the supreme court of Pennsylvania held that the contents of a will cannot be established by declarations of the testator, in the absence of the corpus of the will, and of all evidence that the witness had himself seen it. The court said that to permit a will to be so established would defeat the object of the statutes requiring wills to be written. In Chisholm v. Ben, 7 B. Mon. 408, the testimony was of the same character as in this case. The will had been read by the testator to the witness, and there were subsequent declarations instrument other than a will or codicil or writing, signed, attested, and subscribed in the manner provided for making a will, where a codicil was lost, it was held that it could not be admitted to probate without clear and satisfactory proof of its whole contents, but it might be made available to prove a revocation of a former will. Wallis v. Wallis, 114 Mass. 610.

So, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1895, 2021, the provisions of a lost or destroyed will should be clearly proved by two credible witnesses, and it was held that it was not necessary that the witnesses should remember the exact language used, but they should be able to testify at least to the substance of the whole will so that it could be incorporated in the decree. McNally v. Brown, 5 Redf. 372.

So, where a will was lost it was held that it would not be sufficient that some of the provisions were proved by two or more witnesses, and another provision in the same way by others, but each of the witnesses must be able to testify as to all the disposing parts of the will under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1895. Re Ruser, 6 Dem. 31.

And in an action for the execution of a power and partition where it was necessary to establish a lost will, and one witness testified that she read the will, and another that she either read it or heard it read and that the property was given to K., but the evidence was indefinite as to how the property was given, and the statements of the witnesses were nothing more than their conclusions as to the construction of the paper and did not give the particular terms of the will or even the substance, the evidence was insufficient. Fitzgerald v. Wynne, 1 App. D. C. 107.

In Woodward v. Goulstone, 35 Week. Rep. 837, L. R. 11 App. Cas. 469, 55 L. J. Prob. N. S. 1, 55 L. T. N. S. 700, 51 J. P. 307, the probate of a will was refused where evidence of its contents was insufficient, and much of the evidence consisted of declarations by the alleged testator as to the contents of the will after its execution. It was said, distinguishing "Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards", the facts were very different from the facts here. The evidence, it is true, was the evidence of a person much interested in establishing the will, but it was the evidence, to begin with, of a person who had seen the will, and was giving a recollection of its contents. In the next place, that evidence was corroborated in the strongest possible way and in the most material particulars by written documents, about which there could be no question. Moreover, the court were satisfied that although there might be some few legacies which were omitted in the recital of the legacies by Miss Sugden, yet they could not be many, but must be few, and that they could not be of any material consequence. The court was satisfied that they had the substantial testamentary dispositions brought to their minds."

But some cases held that probate might be made of so much as might be satisfactorily established. Jackson v. Jackson, 4 Mo. 210.

So, in Dickey v. Maleochi, 6 Mo. 177, 34 Am. Dec. 130, it was held that where a will was lost or destroyed and the whole provisions of the will could not be established, the will was probated as to such parts as were established.

And a lost will was sufficiently proved where one of the subscribing witnesses and the person who last had the will in his possession agreed that all the testator's property was devised and bequeathed to his widow, but did not agree whether or not an executor was appointed. Early v. Early, 5 Redf. 376.

In Steele v. Price, 5 B. Mon. 58, it was held that "as the principal devisees, those in which the testator took deepest interest, and about which he showed most solicitude, are sufficiently proved, the failure of proof as to the minor provisions of the will, should not defeat the whole by preventing the admission to record, of that which is proved; and especially as it does not appear that the establishment of the devise as proved, though it would greatly reduce the fund to be distributed, will affect the relative proportions which the heirs will receive" where a lost will is probated.

And where the contents of a lost will were not completely proved it was probated to the extent to which they were proved. Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards, L. R. 1 Prob. Div. 154, 45 L. J. Prob. N. S. 49, 34 L. T. N. S. 209, 24 Week. Rep. 479, 17 Moak, Eng. Rep. 463.

In Tucker v. Phipps, 3 Atk. 360, where the question was as to the jurisdiction in the case of destroyed will, it was said: "I think in such cases of malicious and fraudulent spoliation, the court will not put the plaintiff under the difficulty of going into the ecclesiastical court, where he must meet with much more difficulty than proving the contents of a deed at law, which has been lost or sequestered. For in the spiritual court the plaintiff must prove it a will in writing, and must likewise prove the contents in the very words, which will be a difficulty almost insuperable, and which courts of law do not put a person upon doing; the plaintiff must also prove the whole will, though the remainder of it does not at all belong to or regard his legacy."

b. Declarations.

The case of CLARK v. TURNER holds that the contents of a lost will cannot be proved solely by the declarations of the testator, and the probate was refused where the testimony of a witness as to the contents of a will was given from knowledge derived from the testator's reading the will to him and not from having inspected it himself. This is in accord with the authorities.

In CLARK v. TURNER it was also said that the declarations of the testator could be received in evidence to prove the existence of a will, and any proof relating to the testator's competency or undue influence, but the sufficiency to establish the contents of the will was another question; and it was said that the result of the English cases is that by him as to its contents. The court rejected this evidence as insufficient. Mercer v. Mackin, 14 Bush, 434, reaffirms Chisholm v. Ben.

The argument has been frequently advanced that such declarations are, admissible as self-serving declarations of a decedent. Mercer v. Mackin and Clark v. Morton discuss this proposition, but demonstrate that such declarations are not admissible on that ground. Chisholm v. Ben, 7 B. Mon. 408, intimated that on adequate proof that the will had been fraudulently suppressed by the heirs, the evidence offered might be sufficient by virtue of the maxim, Omnia præsuntur contra spoliatores. This maxim is not easy to apply. It has sometimes been held to justify the production of slighter proof than would otherwise be required. Its most frequent application is for the purpose of allowing secondary evidence. It would certainly be very dangerous to extend it so far as to relieve a party charged with proving the contents of a written instrument from all obligation to produce some evidence of a competent character; but this phase of the case was not submitted to the jury by any instruction given or asked, at least so far as the

the contents of a lost will could not be established solely by the declarations of the testator, although such declarations are now deemed admissible for the purpose of corroboration. This is in accord with the authorities on this question.

So, the probate of a will was refused where the deceased sent a copy of the will from India to England in a letter to his solicitor, stating that he had made the will but there was no proof of the execution of the original except the statements of the deceased. Goods of Ripley, 1 Swab. & T. 68, 4 Jur. N. S. 842.

In an action to probate a lost will it was held that the declarations of the deceased made in the presence of a witness, that a paper on the table was his will, which was signed by the testator, were insufficient to establish the same, where the witness could not testify as to the witnesses to the same. Re Russell, 88 Hun, 271.

In Quick v. Quick, 33 L. J. Prob. N. S. 146, 88 Swab. & T. 444, 10 Jur. N. S. 682, 10 L. T. N. S. 619, 12 Week. Rep. 1119, it was held that the declarations of the testator, made after the execution of a will, were not admissible as evidence of its contents, where no draft or copy of the will or any document throwing any light upon it was in existence. But this case was overruled in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards, L. R. 1 Prob. Div. 154, 45 L. J. Prob. N. S. 49, 34 L. T. N. S. 809, 24 Week. Rep. 479, and declarations were held admissible in that case. In Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards there were many corroborating circumstances.

In Quick v. Quick, 3 Swab. & T. 443, 33 L. J. Prob. N. S. 146, 10 Jur. N. S. 682, 10 L. T. N. S. 619, 12 Week. Rep. 1119, it was said that in Goods of Ripley, 1 Swab. & T. 68, 4 Jur. N. S. 842; and Doe, Shallocross v. Palmer, 15 Q. B. 747, 30 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 367, 15 Jur. 836, declarations of the testator were refused to prove that a will had been duly executed.

And a lost will could not be established where the only evidence of its contents was declarations of the testator. Woodward v. Goulstone, L. R. 11 App. Cas. 469, 35 Week. Rep. 337, 55 L. J. Prob. N. S. 1, 65 L. T. N. S. 790, 51 J. P. 307.

And in Chisholm v. Ben, 7 B. Mon. 408, it was said that no case holds that contents of a lost will can be established solely by proof of declarations of the testator.

The probate of a destroyed will was refused where the evidence of one of the witnesses had many discrepancies rendering her unworthy of belief, and there was only one other witness who pretended to any knowledge of the actual contents of the will and claimed to be a subscribing witness, and who claimed that the testator read the will to him, but whose character was not above reproach, and there were some discrepancies in his testimony which weakened his claims to absolute credence. It was further held that, conceding the evidence of such witness to be worthy of belief, it was insufficient to establish the contents of the will, where his testimony amounted to nothing more than a detail of what the testator told him was in the will, or of what he supposed the testator was reading from the will, as represents tions or statements made by the testator were not sufficient of themselves to establish the contents of a will in the court of probate. Chisholm v. Ben, 7 B. Mon. 412.

Declarations of the decedent as to the contents and substance of the will were not available to establish its contents, where there was only one witness who verified the draft made by him but he could not testify as to any subscribing witnesses, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1865, providing that a lost or destroyed will shall be clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses, a correct copy or draft being equivalent to one witness. Collyer v. Collyer, 17 Abb. N. C. 323.

And a lost will was not established where the statute required two witnesses to the handwriting of the subscribing witness on the probate of a will, and there was but one witness to the handwriting of one attesting witness and the declarations of the supposed testator. It was held that to establish the validity of a lost will it was necessary to prove its execution with the formalities and solemnities prescribed by the statute, and "It should be done by direct testimony or legally deducible from such facts as are directly established." Tynan v. Paschal, 37 Tex. 286, 84 Am. Dec. 619.

And the declarations of the testator were held not to be sufficient of themselves to establish a will, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1865, although substantiated by two witnesses who saw the will at the scrivener's office, and the testator stated to them at that time the contents of the will. Hatch v. Sigman, 1 Dem. 519.

And the declarations of the contents of a will made by the testator were held to be of no weight in establishing a lost will. Re Ruser, 6 Dem. 31.

And under Pa. act 1705, providing that a will in order to convey lands must be in writing and proved by two or more credible witnesses, the making of a will and its contents could not be established by evidence of the verbal declarations of the deceased in the absence of the corpus of the will and of all evidence that it had been seen by the witness. Clark v. Morton, 5 Rawls, 235, 28 Am. Dec. 667.

But evidence of declarations of the testator were held competent as some evidence of his intent at the time they were made to show that a will was duly executed. Such evidence should be carefully scrutinized and cautiously weighed. Re Marsh, 45 Hun, 107.

And secondary evidence was admissible to prove the existence and contents of a lost will, and declarations of the testator were properly received in evidence. Southworth v. Adams, 11 Biss. 256.

And declarations of the testator made before and after the execution of his will were admissible as secondary evidence of its contents where it was lost. Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards, L. R. 1 Prob. Div. 154, 45 L. J. Prob. N. S. 49, 34 L. T. N. S. 809, 24 Week. Rep. 479, 17 Mosk. Eng. Rep. 453, Overruling Quick v. Quick, 3 Swab. & T. 443, 33 L. J. Prob. N. S. 146, 10 Jur. N. S. 682, 10 L. T. N. S. 619, 12 Week. Rep. 1119.

And in Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards it was said contents of the will are concerned. The general verdict for the contestants precludes us from examining the evidence on this point on the theory that spoliation by the contestants was established. The policy of the statute of wills, like the statute of frauds, is that it is better that occasional injustice should be done in exceptional cases, through a failure of legal proof, than that transactions within the statutes should in all cases be left to the uncertainties of parol evidence. So the courts, in giving effect to the statutes, should pursue the same policy, and should avoid meeting hard cases by adopting rules which, generally applied, would defeat the object of the legislature. On no subject, perhaps, are statutes so strict in requiring a writing executed and attested in certain forms as in the case of wills, and, while it is firmly established that a lost will may be proved by secondary evidence, the courts have always required such evidence to be direct, clear, and convincing. As said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Lea v. Polk County Copper Co. 63 U. S. 21 How. 493, 16 L. ed. 203, "Courts of justice lend a very unwilling ear to statements of what dead that the decision in Doe, Shallcross, v. Palmer, 16 Q. B. 747, 20 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 307, 15 Jur. 836, as to the admissibility of the declarations of the testator made after the will was an obiter dictum, as the declarations of the testator given in evidence there had been made prior to the execution of the will.

In Re Hope, 48 Mich. 518, where the contestants of a will claimed that a later will was made, which could not be found, it was held that the proponents of the first could not object to parol evidence of the contents of this document because not the best evidence, as they had taken the position that there was no such document in existence. It was further held that declarations of the testator as to the disposition of his property confirmatory of the witnesses who endeavored to establish the contents of the lost will should have been received.

And statements of the testatrix were admissible to show the contents of a will after proof tending to show its existence was adduced. It was held that the declarations of the person who alone profited by the nonexistence of such will should also be received. It was further held, under How, (Mich.) Stat. § 5798, providing that "no will, or any part thereof, shall be revoked unless by burning, tearing, canceling, or obliterating the same, with the intention of revoking it, by the testator, or by some person in his presence and by his direction; or by some other will or codicil, in writing, executed as prescribed in this chapter; or by some other writing, signed, attested, and subscribed in the manner provided in this chapter for the execution of a will," where the evidence indicated that the will was suppressed, that if the jury found the paper was destroyed, the law permitted the presumption that it was legally drawn and executed notwithstanding the terms of the statute, which required the revoking instrument to be formally executed; and, "if necessary, the law will prevent the perpetration of a fraud by permitting a presumption to supply the suppressed proof." Re Lambie, 97 Mich. 48.

And under Ill. Rev. Stat. 1874, p. 1101, § 6, providing that in all cases where one or more of the witnesses to any will shall die, it shall be lawful for the county court to admit proof of the handwriting of any such deceased or absent witness, and such other secondary evidence as is admissible in similar cases, and it may thereupon proceed to record the same, the contents of a lost or destroyed will were allowed to be proved by the testimony of a single witness where the other attesting witness was dead. It was further held that declarations made by the testator after the execution of his will were admissible in the event of its loss, not only to prove that it had not been canceled, but also as secondary evidence of its contents. (Denying the rule to the contrary in New York.) Re Page, 118 Ill. 576, 59 Am. Rep. 395.

And in the absence of statutory requirement a will was admitted to probate on the evidence of one witness who testified to having read the will and detailed its contents, but could not give the name of the legatee to whom $500 had been left, and such witness was corroborated by some evidence of conversations with and admissions made by the decedent. Skaggs v. Horton, 82 Ala. 352.

So, in Trevalyan v. Trevalyan, 1 Phillim. Eccl. Rep. 149, a will was established upon the testimony of one witness and proof of what the testator said he had done.

In Scoggins v. Turner, 98 N. C. 135, it was held that if a will was abstracted or destroyed without the testator's concurrence it will remain in force still and be susceptible of restoration upon parol proof of its contents and the inference of animus revocandi would be overcome; and a lost will was established upon parol proof of its contents in showing the declaration of the intention of the testatrix as to the disposition of her property, and a declaration that it would be time to have it recorded after her death, and evidence that the testatrix was too sick and helpless to obtain possession of the paper before she died. In this case her granddaughter remained with her up to the time of her death, and the bag containing her valuable papers was found the morning after her death open on the floor and several persons were present that night, among them a person to whose wife the land was given in a former will, and this party had declared before and after her death his determination to have the land if he spent everything he had in getting it.

Where a will was lost it was necessary to establish to the satisfaction of the jury the fact that a valid will was made and executed in accordance with law; second, the substance or contents of said will; third, that the will had not been revoked and that it was lost or destroyed and could not be found after due and proper search; and it was further held that the complainants must introduce evidence clear, full, and satisfactory to establish the facts in their favor, and two witnesses were required to the factum of the will, but that two witnesses were not required to each particular fact. It was held that one fact might be proved by one witness and other facts and corroborating circumstances might be proved by other witnesses. In this case both of the subscribing witnesses were dead and proof of the contents rested upon testimony of the witnesses, who repeated its contents from having heard it read by others, the witnesses themselves being held illiterate, and this proof was corroborated by the declarations of the testator and other circumstances. Morris v. Swaney, 7 Helsk. 501.

And a codicil relating solely to matters of account between the testator and his partner, made two days before the testator's death, with declarations that he had made a will, was probated although no will could be found. Goods of Halliwell, 4 Notes of Cases, 400.

And a codicil was established where it could not be found after the death of the testator, and there was some evidence to show that it was not intentionally destroyed by him, and the contents were proved by a witness who read it and by the probability of the disposition of the property and by the declarations of the testator. Davis v. Davis, 3 Add. Eccl. Rep. 223.

men have said." Such evidence is always considered dangerous, and subject to the closest scrutiny. We think it would be in the highest degree dangerous, and would be violative of the object and spirit of the statute, should we hold that the existence and contents of an alleged will might be established solely by testimony of the testator's declarations. Notwithstanding Syden v. Lord St. Leonards, and the other cases in that line, we believe the language of the court of appeals of Kentucky in Chisholm v. Ben remains true: "The books of reports contain many cases in which wills lost or destroyed have been offered for probate upon parol or other secondary evidence of their contents, and many in which such wills were established. But in an examination of these cases as extensive as opportunity would allow, we have found none in which there does not seem to have been the evidence of witnesses who knew, or might be presumed to have known, the contents of the will from their own inspection; none in which the declarations, or even professed reading, of the decedent have been held to be alone sufficient on this point; and none which would sanction their admission upon the question of the contents of the will, with any other effect than as merely corroborative of the more direct evidence." As already indicated, this view leads to affirmation of the judgment, because the verdict was the only one warranted by the evidence.

An application was made for the allowance of attorney's fees to the proponents. This application the district court denied, and the ruling is assigned as error. In two cases such an allowance has been made on behalf of defeated contestants when the will was admitted to probate. In Seebrook v. Pedawa, 38 Neb. 418, the allowance seems to have been made on the ground that there were reasonable grounds for contesting the will. In Mathis v. Pitman, 33 Neb. 191, the allowance was based on the construction of §§ 42, 44, chap. 20, Comp. Stat.:

And a will was probated where it was lost or could not be found after the testator's death, and was proved by a memorandum made by a party who had examined the will at the time of its execution, and by declarations of the testator. Bessey v. Bostwick, 13 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 279.

Probate was allowed of a will which could not be found after the testator's death, and the contents of the will were shown by the draft, and by declarations of the testator made at the time the will was made, and continuing up to within three weeks of his death, and the only person interested in intestacy had access to the place where the will should have been found, before any other person searched for the will. Finch v. Finch, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 871, 38 L. J. Prob. N. S. 78, 16 L. T. N. S. 268, 15 Week. Rep. 797.

And a will was probated where it was lost after the testator's death by a party to whom he had intrusted it for preparing a better copy, and the contents were fully proved by a draft and a copy made from recollection, and a letter from deceased in reference to the draft. Goods of Hilliard, 26 L. T. 228.

And a draft of a lost will made by testatrix's solicitor was admitted to probate, where the draft was found among the solicitor's papers after his death, and entries on his books against his interest showed that he had attested the execution and had been paid his charges, and the testatrix had made declarations to her husband of a desire to execute the will, and he had taken her to the solicitor's office and after its execution had left the will with the solicitor. Goods of Thomas, 20 Week. Rep. 149, 41 L. J. Prob. N. S. 32, 25 L. T. N. S. 509.

So, a will which could not be found after the testator's death was probated by proof of a copy made by the testator, and by oral and written declarations of the testator as to its contents. Johnson v. Lyford, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 546.

And a lost will was established where the evidence showed that the testator had the will a short time before his death, and checked his trunk and died on the trip, and he had made declarations that the will was in his trunk but it was not found therein, and its contents were proved by the scrivener who refreshed his memory by a form book and also by pencil memorandum in the testator's handwriting, and it was corroborated by the attesting witnesses and declarations of the testator. Southworth v. Adams, 11 Biss. 253.

And in an action of ejectment a will was established by proof of a draft of the will which could not be found after the testator's death, and proof of declarations made by the testator some years before his death, and by others within a week of that event. Whiteley v. King, 10 Jur. N. S. 1079, 17 C. B. N. S. 755, 11 L. T. N. S. 842, 13 Week. Rep. 82.

And a lost will was established where its execution was proved by one attesting witness where the other was out of the state, and another witness was present who saw the will executed and heard it read, and a copy was found in the handwriting of the scrivener with his papers, and the scrivener was dead, and declarations of the testator substantiated the will. Bailey v. Sillea, 2 N. J. Eq. 220.

c. Loss after probating or filing for record.

Secondary evidence of the contents of a will is admissible, where the will has been lost after probate or where the records with the will have been burned. But the evidence must be as conclusive as in cases of other instruments.

So, where a will was regularly proved and afterwards destroyed by the public enemy, together with the records, parol evidence of its contents was admissible in an action of ejectment. Smith v. Carter, 3 Rand. (Va.) 167.

And where a will was lost after probate, a copy of the record of the same was admissible in evidence in an action of ejectment. Jackson, Donaldson, v. Lucett, 2 Cal. 363.

But a statute allowing proof of the will by a certified copy of the record does not preclude proof by other competent evidence. McNeely v. Pearson (Tenn. Ct.) 42 S. W. 165. Affirmed by supreme court.

And under Ill. act of February 1, 1843, providing for the restoration of records destroyed by fire, and providing for the appointment of a commission, a copy of a will probated by such board of commissioners was admissible in evidence although the record showed only one attesting witness to the copy, as it was presumed that the court in admitting this copy to probate, and the board of commissioners, proceeded according to law and acted upon proper and sufficient evidence; and because that evidence was not preserved this presumption was not overcome. And it was further held that had the county court erred in admitting the will to probate on insufficient evidence, the judgment would stand until set aside by a proper proceeding. Grand Tower Min. Mig. & Transp. Co. v. Gill, 111 Ill. 541.

And a certified copy of a will was admissible in evidence in a suit by a legatee for an accounting where the public office containing the original and the records were burnt and the copy was in the possession of one of the executors and had been acted upon for about thirty years, and the law required that probate should be made in open court the latter section providing that, in appeals in probate matters, if it shall appear that the appeal was taken vexatiously or for delay, the court shall adjudge the appellants to pay the costs, including an attorney's fee to the adverse party. It seems to have been the opinion of the court that this language involved the alternative that, if the appeal be not taken vexatiously or for delay, the costs shall be taxed to the estate. The record before us does not show which party appealed to the district court. In McClary v. Stull, 44 Neb. 175, such an application was denied, the court remarking, however, that "courts of equity have frequently assumed, when dealing with funds brought directly within their control, to order payment therefrom of fees to counsel for the adverse party." Both in Mathis v. Pitman and in Seebrock v. Pedraza the will, as a result of the proceeding, was admitted to probate, and administration established, the parties charged with administering the estate being before the court, so that the fund may be said to have been "brought directly within the control" of the court, according to the statement in McClary v. Stull. This feature appears in all the cases from other states cited by the proponents. Thus, Henderson v. Simmons, 83 Ala. 291, 70 Am. Div. 590, was decided on the final accounting of an administrator, the question arising in the administration of the estate, and not in the proceeding leading to the probate of the will. In Compton v. Barnes, 4 Gill, 55, 45 Am. Dec. 115, the will had been probated, and letters testamentary granted to the executors. The contest was by means of a caveat thereafter filed, and the holding of the court was that, the will having been probated and letters testamentary granted, it became the duty of the executors to defend the will under which they were already acting, and that they were therefore entitled to compensation. In Bradford v. Boudinot, 8 Wash. C. C. 122, the facts were the same, and the proceeding was by and the original deposited with the officer for safe-keeping and a certified copy delivered to the executor, and the copy showed that the original had been proved in open court by one of the subscribing witnesses. Franklin v. Creyon, Harp. Eq. 243.

And in Smith v. Steele, 1 Harr. & M' H. 419, which was an action of ejectment, and an original will could not be found, evidence was allowed to go to the jury of a writing purporting to be a copy of the will with letters testamentary on the said will, under the hand and seal of the deputy commissary of Dorchester county which were annexed to the said copy of the will, with proof also of the deputy's handwriting.

In Nelson v. Whitfield, 82 N. C. 46, it was said that Chisholm v. Ben, 7 B. Mon. 403, and Davis v. St. Journey, 8 Met. 497, where it was held that secondary evidence must be strong, positive, and free from all doubt, were cases where lost wills were propounded for probate or said to be established in chancery, and the strictness of this action did not apply in an action for partition where the original will and court records were destroyed by fire. Evidence that a will was found in a book kept by the clerk of the court of pleas and the quarter sessions, as required by law, was proper to show the execution of a will and its due probate and registration, and it was competent to show that a paper purporting to be a will was publicly read at the funeral in the presence of the heirs at law, who asserted that their ancestor died intestate.

In an action of ejectment, the presumption that the ordinary received proof of a will by allowing the executors to make returns was a sufficient substitute for evidence of the probate of the lost will so as to admit the evidence of the contents thereof, where a will was destroyed after it was claimed to have been probated. Couns v. Wilson, 45 S. C. 571.

In an action of ejectment where a will had been burned by the destruction of a court-house, and a copy of the will which belonged to one of the executors and was in the possession of the surviving executor was admitted in evidence, it was held that it was a question for the jury where the executors had placed the will in the hands of the ordinary, and made returns and done various other things indicating that it had been probated. Couns v. Wilson, 45 S. C. 571.

Under Va. Code 1873, chap. 172, § 5, providing that a copy of any paper recorded in certain named offices shall be evidence in lieu of the original, and § 12, providing that where a book containing the record of wills is lost an attested copy may be received in lieu thereof, where a will and the will book were destroyed during the war, and a copy of the will filed in an injunction suit was recorded, a copy of such copy was held to be a true copy in a suit to construe the will. Efinger v. Hall, 81 Va. 94.

But where a suit was instituted to enforce a will which had been recorded and destroyed some thirty years previously in the destruction of a court-house, it was held that the evidence was not sufficiently certain to establish the contents of the will, the witnesses differing as to the terms and the parties described therein, and the bill of complaint was dismissed. Todd v. Wickliffe, 12 B. Mon. 289.

And where a will was destroyed in the Chicago fire, and there was an exhibit attached to the bill, which a witness, the executor, stated that he thought was a substantially correct abstract of the will, such evidence was inadmissible where it was shown that a copy of the will was sent by mail to complainant, and circumstances were proved which rendered it probable the copy was received, and there was no evidence accounting for the non-production of the copy or showing its nonreceipt. Illinois Land & Loan Co. v. Bonner, 75 Ill. 315.

And where a will has been burnt after its probate which it was contended gave an estate to a devisee until the youngest child was thirteen years of age, and such devisee kept possession of the property for ten years longer and made a will as though she owned the fee in which all acquiesced, it was held that the former will could not be established by the testimony of a single witness, a boy of sixteen or seventeen years, when his father died, taken more than a half a century afterwards, when he had permitted his own rights to be bound by it. Newell v. Newell, 9 Smedes & M. 56.

A record of court made many years before, reciting that a will was presented in open court for probate and stating the testimony of two witnesses, which was sufficient for the probate, also stating the appointment of administrators with the will annexed and giving a copy of the will, but without any signature or attesting clause appearing thereon, is amply sufficient after a long lapse of time to establish the contents of the will, where property has been held under it. McNeely v. Pearson (Tenn. Ch.) 42 S. W. 165, Affirmed by supreme court.

A certified copy of a will taken from the certified copy in a court record, although not admissible as evidence, can be used to refresh the memory of a witness as to the contents of the will. McNeely v. Pearson (Tenn. Ch.) 42 S. W. 165, Affirmed by supreme court.

original bill, after the will had been defeated, for an accounting against the executor who had qualified in pursuance of its probate. The court held that he was not an executor de son tort, and was consequently entitled to reimbursement for his expenses in defending the will. We can find no instance where no administration has been granted, and unsuccessful proponents of a will have been allowed counsel fees out of the estate in the contest proceedings. Inasmuch as the statute (Comp. Stat. chap. 23, §§ 137, 138) makes it the duty of persons named as executors to propound the will for probate, and provides a penalty for neglecting to do so, it seems reasonable that they should not be compelled to perform this duty at the peril of incurring the expense thereof against themselves should probate be denied, at least where they have acted in good faith. But we are satisfied that in this case no allowance can be made. The judgment simply denies probate. No administration is granted, and we have not before us any person now charged with the duties or powers of a personal representative of the deceased, nor has by this proceeding the estate itself been impounded. If such application be proper, it should be made in the county court, after administration shall have been granted.

Judgment affirmed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

Johnson JEFFERSON, by Next Friend,
Appl.,
v.
BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY & ELECTRIC

(.....Ala.....)

1. Operating small cars by a dummy engine in a street at a low rate of speed with occasional stops, without precautions to prevent children getting upon them, does not create a liability for the death of a child that got upon the cars and was thrown or fell from them.
2. An allegation that the defendant's servants recklessly and wantonly or intentionally caused a child to leave cars of a dummy line in a street while they were in motion is not sufficient to show negligence without anything to show that there were not proper conditions for the child to get off.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the City Court of Birmingham in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. C. P. Beddow and Bowmare & Harsh for appellant.

Messrs. Walker, Porter, & Walker, for appellee:

The first count alleges that while appellee was operating one of its trains in the streets of Bessemer this five-year-old boy got upon one of the cars of the train and was thrown or fell therefrom and was run over and injured. It also alleges that these trains run along slowly and stop often and are attractive to children, and were dangerous to young children that were too young to appreciate the danger,—that it was the duty of appellee to properly attend or guard said cars while they were being operated in said streets so that such children would not get hurt; and that the appellee negligently failed to have a conductor upon said cars.

The second count alleges the same facts as the first, and says that it was appellee's duty to use due care to prevent the boy from falling or being thrown off said car.

The third count alleges that appellee negligently allowed the boy to get upon one of said cars without any guardian or other proper attendant.

The fourth count alleges that appellee, through its servants, recklessly and wantonly or intentionally caused the boy to leave the car while it was in motion, and in consequence thereof he was injured.

The fifth count alleges the same facts as the first and second, and further alleges that the appellee had no one upon said train, and that the boy got upon one of said cars on a place thereon highly dangerous to him, without any attendant or guardian, and appellee knew, or could have known, by the exercise of due care, that he was on said car in a dangerous place; and appellee negligently failed to take any proper care or precaution to prevent injury to the boy.

Willfully making one leave a car is not willfully injuring him. The injury must be intentional. Here it is not so alleged, but simply that he was made to leave the car,—willfully made to leave the car,—in other words, that appellee or its servants saw the boy on the car and made him get off.

Haley v. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. 113 Ala. 640.

The duties of a railroad company when a young child is injured are the same as when an adult is injured, except in the matter of contributory negligence.

If such a child attempts to get upon the train from the side, and no employee of the railroad company knows of the peril of the child in time to prevent its becoming injured, there is no liability. While the child has not been guilty of contributory negligence, because it cannot be, the railroad company has not been guilty of even simple negligence.

Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Dobbs, 101 Ala. 219; Nave v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 96 Ala. 264.

There is negligence only in leaving exposed something dangerous and at the same time attractive to children that have not sufficient discretion to withstand the temptation to handle it—not something they might handle, some abnormal child, but something that would attract children generally.

Harriman v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 45 Ohio St. 11.

In the case at bar there was a railroad operating its train legitimately along a street, an engineer and fireman in charge, running slowly; a train that was not only dangerous if it ran over you, but which looks very dangerous to every child five years old unless that child is an exceedingly peculiar one. In the place where this accident happened the employees were required by law and common prudence to run slowly so as not to injure those who were crossing the street, not for the purpose of not injuring those who ran from the side of the train into it.

Western Railway of Ala. v. Mutch, 97 Ala. 194, 21 L. R. A. 816.

Haralson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The rule in respect to contributory negligence of children has been stated by this court to be that "a child between seven and fourteen years of age is prima facie incapable of exercising judgment and discretion, but evidence may be received to show capacity. . . . If the plaintiff is of such tender years that he is conclusively presumed incapable of judgment and discretion, and of owing a duty to another, neither contributory negligence on his part, nor that of his parent, can be set up to defeat a recovery." Pratt Coal & I. Co. v. Brawley, 83 Ala. 374; Government Street R. Co. v. Hanlon, 63 Ala. 70. See also 8 Elliott, Railroads, § 1261.

In speaking of the liability for injury to trespassing children, Elliott in his work on Railroads says: "In actions for injuries to children, as in other cases, there can be no recovery unless the defendant has been guilty of a breach of duty. . . . There is a sharp conflict among the authorities, however, as to what the duty of a railroad company is to children who come upon its premises as trespassers or mere licensees. We believe the true rule to be that, although the age of the child may be important in determining the question of contributory negligence or the duty of the company after discovering him, the company is, in general, no more bound to keep its premises safe for children who are trespassers or bare licensees not invited or enticed by it than it is to keep them safe for adults." To sustain this doctrine he cites a long list of authorities from many courts. 8 Elliott, Railroads, § 1259.

In Bishop v. Union R. Co. 14 R. I. 814, 51 Am. Rep. 386, similar in principle to the one before us, and which, from the frequency of its citation as well as from its own inherent merits, seems to be a leading case on the subject, the supreme court of that state lays down the doctrine that the owner of property which has been trespassed upon is not liable to the trespasser for an injury arising from the trespass merely because he might by care have guarded against it. Referring to the class of cases relied on by appellant in this case to sustain his complaint,—as where defendant's servant left his cart and horse in a public street, unattended, for half an hour, and a boy six years old, who had gotten into the cart and attempted to get out, was injured, after another boy had started the horse off (Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29); or where a child six years old was injured while playing with a turntable of a railroad company (Stout City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745); or where defendant put a heavy gate on his own land, beside a passway which was used by children going to and from the public road, but left it so carelessly that it fell upon and injured a child between six and seven years old, who shook it in passing, in each of which cases, a verdict was sustained against the defendant therein,—the court said: "We know of no cases more favorable to the plaintiff than the three cases last cited, but in all three of them the object which caused the injury was a dangerous object left exposed, without guard or attendant, in a public place or common resort for children. An object so left is a standing temptation to the natural curiosity of a child to examine it, or to his instinctive propensity to meddle or play with it." The court added: "The case at bar differs very much from the three cases previously stated, for in the case at bar the cars, instead of being left unattended, were in the charge of the driver who was in the act of driving them, so that there was nothing done to encourage the trespass, which was merely the result of a momentary impulse. Ordinarily a man who is using his property in a public place is not obliged to employ a special guard to protect it from the intrusion of children, merely because an intruding child may be injured by it. We have all seen a boy climb up behind a chaise or other vehicle for the purpose of stealing a ride, sometimes incurring a good deal of risk. It has never been supposed that it is the duty of the owner of such vehicle to keep an outrider on purpose to drive such boys away, and that, if he does not, he is liable to any boy who is injured while thus secretly stealing a ride. In such a case, no duty of care is incurred." In support of the doctrine many cases are cited, to which may be added, as being in point, Western Railway of Ala. v. Mutch, 97 Ala. 194, 21 L. R. A. 816; Cattlett v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Co. 57 Ark. 461; S. C. 54 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 113; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Stumps, 69 Ill. 409; Hestonville Pass. R. Co. v. Connell, 88 Pa. 520, 82 Am. Rep. 472; Rodgers v. Lee, 140 Pa. 475, 12 L. R. A. 216; Daniels v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 154 Mass. 849, 13 L. R. A. 248; Snyder v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 60 Mo. 413; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Smith, 46 Mich. 504, 41 Am. Rep. 177; Patterson, Railway Accident Law, § 75.

From what has been predicated it will appear that counts of the complaint, numbered 1, 2, 3, and 5 were insufficient as charges of negligence against defendant and were subject to the demurrer interposed to them.

The fourth count intended to set up that the servants of the defendant wilfully or intentionally caused the injury to the child. It not only fails in this respect, but does not even aver any actionable negligence. The defendant's servants had the right to cause the trespassing child to get off the train under proper conditions, and from aught appearing in the count, the conditions were not improper. Haley v. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. 113 Ala. 640.

There was no error in sustaining the demurrer to the count.
Affirmed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

SAN DIEGO WATER COMPANY, Resp't.,

City of SAN DIEGO et al., Appts.

(.....Cal.....)

1. The fixing of rates by legislative power, or otherwise than by appropriate judicial proceedings in which full notice and opportunity to appear and defend are given, is reviewable by the courts, at least to the extent of ascertaining whether such rates will furnish some reward for the property used and services furnished.
2. A review by the court of the action of the common council in fixing water rates is not limited to a determination of the question on the same evidence that was produced before the council, where the hearing before the council was conducted without notice to the water company or the rate payers, and without any right on their part to intervene effectually.
3. A water company entering upon the business of furnishing a public water supply under a Constitution giving a tribunal the right to fix water rates is bound to submit to the conditions thereby imposed.
4. An ordinance fixing water rates so palpably unreasonable and unjust as to amount to a taking of the property of a water company without just compensation is not justified by Const. art. 14, § 1, providing for the establishment of such rates.
5. An appropriation of water and a water plant to public use by the state, for which just compensation must be made, is in effect made by Const. art. 14, § 1, which subjects to the control of the state every public water supply.
6. Water rates which will produce but little more than 3 1-3 per cent upon the actual cost of the waterworks after deducting current expenses do not constitute just compensation to the water company, where it is compelled to pay a much higher rate upon money which it appears to have fairly borrowed, when the rate paid does not appear to be above the lowest market rate, and the prudence and economy of the management are not successfully impeached.
7. Water rates which will produce some reward to the owner of the water plant may be, nevertheless, so grossly and palpably insufficient to afford just compensation to the owner as to give the court power to relieve against an ordinance establishing such rates.
8. The investment on which a water company is entitled to base its compensation in determining the sufficiency of rates cannot include property not at present actually employed in collecting or distributing the water, however useful it may have been in the past or may yet be in the future.

9. The current expenses which may be allowed in determining the sufficiency of the income provided by water rates consist of the money which is reasonably and properly expended in each year in collecting and distributing the water.

10. Expenses of litigation contesting an ordinance fixing water rates cannot be considered as part of the expenses to be allowed, in determining the sufficiency of the income produced by the rates.

11. Testimony of expert witnesses as to the value of the property of a water company is not admissible, at least in favor of the company, as against the better evidence of its own books on the subject.

(October 9, 1897.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for San Diego County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enjoin the enforcement of an ordinance fixing water rates. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. William H. Fuller and C. L. Barber for appellants.

Messrs. Works & Works for respondent.

Van Fleet, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is a corporation engaged in the business of supplying water to the city of San Diego and its inhabitants. In February, 1890, the common council of the city passed an ordinance fixing the water rates for the year beginning July 1, 1890. In May, 1890, the plaintiff brought this action against the city, the common council, the mayor, and the individual members of the council, to annul this ordinance and enjoin its enforcement. The complaint alleged, in substance, that the entire revenue which plaintiff could receive during the year in question, under the rates so fixed, would be insufficient to pay its operating expenses and fixed charges for that year, and would therefore afford no reward whatever to plaintiff for furnishing the water, and that the ordinance would deprive plaintiff of its property without process of law, and without compensation. It was also alleged that, by reason of certain fraudulent practices on the part of the council, the plaintiff was deprived of a fair opportunity to be heard before the council, and prevented from properly presenting its side of the case. The action was tried after the expiration of the year in question, and a judgment was entered declaring the ordinance to be void, and setting the same aside. From this judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, the defendants appeal.

The findings of the court were, in substance, that the property and plant of the plaintiff necessary to supply water to the city and its inhabitants actually cost \$750,000; that the reasonable and necessary operating expenses of plaintiff for the year in question, and actually expended by it for that purpose, amounted to \$40,000; that plaintiff was indebted upon its bonds for money borrowed, amounting to the sum of \$1,000,000, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, of which amount \$750,000 had been necessarily and properly expended for the construction of the plant; that the total receipts of plaintiff for the year in question derived from the rates fixed by said ordinance could not be, and were not, greater than \$65,788.65; that the annual depreciation of the plant on account of natural decay and use amounted to $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent of its value; that no dividends for the stockholders of plaintiff had been or could be earned from the rates fixed by said ordinance for said year; and that the rates so fixed were not just or reasonable. The court also found certain facts concerning the proceedings of the common council and its committee in investigating the subject-matter, which will be noticed hereafter. These findings are assailed as being in some particulars unsupported by the evidence; and many questions of law have been ably argued by numerous counsel. Some of these questions, though highly interesting and important, are not necessarily involved in this appeal, and we shall therefore not notice them, but we will, so far as space will permit, consider each of the other points made.

1. It is contended by defendants that, under article 14 of the Constitution of this state, a court has no power, in the absence of fraud, to hold such an ordinance invalid merely because the court finds the rates fixed thereby to be unjust and unreasonable. We shall not attempt in this opinion to review the many cases on this subject. It is sufficient to say that the Supreme Court of the United States (whose decisions on this matter are controlling) has repeatedly decided that the power of the state to fix and regulate the rates of compensation to be charged by persons and corporations in charge of certain public utilities is so limited by the Constitution of the United States that it cannot be exercised to such an extent as to require any such person or corporation to furnish its property or services without reward; and that if the rates are fixed by legislative power, or otherwise than by appropriate judicial proceedings, in which full notice and opportunity to appear and defend are given, it is within the province of the courts to review such action, to the extent, at least, of ascertaining whether the rates so fixed will furnish some reward for the property used and services furnished. To fix rates that will allow no such reward is to take property for public use without just compensation. To this extent, at least, then, the court was entitled to go in this case.

But appellants contend that, in any event, the court could do no more in reviewing the action of the common council than to say whether there was or was not evidence produced before that body sufficient to sustain its conclusions; and that the court was not at liberty to determine the question upon other and perhaps new evidence not produced before the council, nor to substitute its judgment as to the reasonableness of the rates for the judgment of that body. In this contention we think that council entirely misconceives the nature of the functions respectively exercised under our Constitution by the rate fixing body and by the courts. Whether the fixing of rates by the council be called a legislative, a judicial, or an administrative act, it is certainly not an adversary judicial proceeding, such as under the Constitution will conclude private rights. It is a proceeding on the part of the government to which neither the water company nor the rate payers are parties, conducted without notice to them, and without any right on their part to effectually intervene. Such a proceeding cannot operate to deplete private rights; and, though the Supreme Court of the United States holds it to be a legitimate exercise of governmental powers, that court also holds that, when it is carried so far as to deprive anyone of his property without just compensation, it is an unlawful exercise of such power, and simply void. The function of the courts is merely to ascertain whether the power has been carried beyond the constitutional limits so fixed; and, if such be found to be the case, to declare the acts of the council void. They do not sit as appellate tribunals to review the correctness of the council's determination, nor need they know anything about the evidence on which that body has acted. All that they have to consider is whether in a given case the result of the council's action will be to take the property of the complaining party without just compensation. That is a mixed question of fact and law, to be decided by the court upon the evidence produced before it.

2. On the other hand, the plaintiff contends that § 1 of article 14 of the Constitution of this state is opposed to the Constitution of the United States, in that it operates to deprive the water company of its property without due process of law. It is argued that no provision for the fixing of water rates by the tribunal thereby created can be valid without notice to those whose rights are to be affected, and an opportunity being given to them to appear and defend, the right to which must be given by the Constitution itself. That no such notice or hearing is provided for must be admitted, but the consequence contended for does not follow. In the first place, there is nothing in the pleadings or evidence in this case to show that any water rights or property of plaintiff used in furnishing the water in question were acquired before the adoption of the present Constitution. On the contrary, we think it substantially appears that they were all acquired since that time. We are unable to perceive why the people of this state, in adopting that Constitution, had not the right to declare that all water not then reduced to private ownership should thereafter remain public, and that thereafter every person undertaking the business of supplying cities or towns or their inhabitants with water should do so upon the condition that the rates to be charged therefor should be conclusively fixed by the state. Such a business is so far public in its very nature that the state might lawfully forbid its exercise by any private individual, and a fortiori might impose such conditions and restrictions upon its exercise as might be thought proper. If, then, that section of the Constitution could be construed as rendering the decision of the council absolutely final and conclusive, plaintiff, at least, could not be heard to complain. If it chose, with that section in force, to enter upon that business, it was bound to submit to the conditions thereby imposed. But we think that the true construction of that section is such that it is not open to the constitutional objection urged, even if raised by one who, at the time of its adoption, was engaged in that business. It, obviously, was not the intention of the framers of that provision to make any distinction between rights then existing and those to be thereafter acquired; nor can we attribute to them any intention of confiscating private property. The meaning of the section is that the governing body of the municipality, upon a fair investigation, and with the exercise of judgment and discretion, shall fix reasonable rates and allow just compensation. If they attempt to act arbitrarily, without investigation, or without the exercise of judgment and discretion, or if they fix rates so palpably unreasonable and unjust as to amount to arbitrary action, they violate their duty and go beyond the powers conferred upon them. Such was the conclusion reached by this court in Spring Valley Waterworks v. San Francisco, 82 Cal. 286, 6 L. R. A. 756, to which conclusion we adhere. Although that case was decided without the light cast on the subject by later decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and contains some observations which perhaps may require modification, we are satisfied with the correctness of the conclusion there given to this section of the Constitution. According to this construction, the rules announced under the first head in this opinion are applicable. If the council has fixed rates so palpably unreasonable and unjust as to amount to a taking of plaintiff's property without just compensation, it has so far exceeded the powers conferred upon it, and the court is competent to afford redress.

8. This brings us, then, to the question whether the findings support the judgment. They show that the total receipts of the plaintiff from the rates fixed by the council would be and were insufficient to pay plaintiff's actual and necessary operating expenses, together with the interest on so much of its bonded indebtedness as was necessarily and properly expended by it in the construction of its plant, necessarily and actually used for the supplying of the water here in question; indeed, would fall short more than $11,000 of paying those charges. No circumstances requiring such a loss were found, and the findings that these actual charges were necessarily and properly incurred in the legitimate exercise of the business of furnishing water to the city negative the existence of any such circumstances. It is clear that under the rule laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in Reagan v. Farmer's Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 362, 412, 40 L. ed. 1014, 1039, that court would hold those rates to be so unreasonable and unjust as to require the court to set them aside. The decision in that case, however, is not in all respects satisfactory; and, after a careful examination of all the many cases on this subject, we are unable to discover that any consistent or adequate rules controlling the exercise of the governmental power of fixing rates have yet been judicially laid down. The subject is one of extreme complexity, and its inherent difficulties have been increased rather than diminished by the numerous decisions in which it has been discussed. We think, however, that a consideration of the real nature of the power conferred by our Constitution will afford a sufficient solution of the question.

It is apparent that the water company does not own the water which it collects and supplies, or the plant which it uses to collect and distribute that water, in the same sense in which a man is said to own his house or his farm. By the very nature of the use to which it is applied, the company has devoted that property to a public use. Having once undertaken to perform that public duty, it must continue to perform it, and must carry on its business under the lawful regulations of the government. In effect, the state may be said to have appropriated the water and the plant to public use. For that appropriation it is bound to make just compensation, and it has provided for such compensation by requiring the municipal authorities to fix just and reasonable rates at which the water is to be furnished to and received by the consumers. Since the state has "taken" the use of this property, it is bound to provide a just compensation for that use, and article 14 of the Constitution must be construed as providing for that just compensation.

The question of what is just compensation in such a case is, we think, in all respects analogous to the question which arises in every case of appropriation under the power of eminent domain; and it may be reduced to the formula that the public must pay the actual value of that which it appropriates to the public use. In determining such value, three, and, we believe, only three, methods are possible: (1) Either by ascertaining what the property could be sold for (its market value); or (2) by ascertaining what it would cost to replace it; or (3) by ascertaining the revenue it is capable of producing. In cases like the present, however, neither the first nor the second method can be resorted to. The judicial test of market value depends upon the fact that the property in question is marketable at a given price, which, in turn, depends upon the fact that sales of similar property have been and are being made at ascertainable prices. But such property as this is not so sold, at least not often enough to furnish a fair criterion; and the very fact of governmental regulation would necessarily control the price. Until the rates are fixed, no one can say how much the property would sell for, and therefore that price cannot be ascertained as a basis for fixing those rates.

The second method is entirely inapplicable to property of this kind. The construction of municipal waterworks is a matter of growth. It is necessary in common prudence, on the one hand, to construct the works of such capacity as to satisfy the needs of the growing city, not only at the moment, but within the near future, and, on the other hand, not to extend them so much as to cast an unnecessary burden on the stockholders or the present consumers. As such works are a necessity to the city, they must keep pace with, and to some extent anticipate, its growth. When constructed, they stimulate to that extent the progress of the city, and tend, like all conveniences, to lower the general cost of production of all things. It results that, at least, the first water system in any city occupies the position of a pioneer. At any expense the works must be constructed, and usually no reward can be realized by the constructors until some time has elapsed. In the meantime, as the city grows, in part by reason of this very supply of water, the facility of constructing works of all kinds is increased, and the cost of such construction diminished. It would therefore be highly unjust to permit the consumers to avail themselves of the plea that, at the present time, similar works could be constructed at a less cost, as a pretext for reducing the rates to be paid for the water. The reduced expense, if it be reduced, is due, in part at least, to the very fact that the city has been provided, at the cost of the water company, with increased facilities for doing business. But it is said that those who enter upon any business enterprise undertake the risk of being undersold by those who, coming later into the field, have the advantage of a cheapening of construction. But this is not an ordinary business enterprise. Those who engage in it put their property entirely into the hands of the public. Having once embarked, it is beyond their power to draw back. They must always be ready to supply the public demand, and must take the risk of any falling off in that demand. They cannot convert their property to any other use, however unprofitable the public use may become. They have expended their money for the benefit of others, and subjected it to the control of others. That money has, in effect, been taken by the public; and the public, while refusing to return that money, cannot be heard to say that it no longer has need for all of it. Nor would it, on the other hand, be just to the consumers to require them to pay an enhanced price for the water, on the ground that it would now cost more to construct similar works. Such a contingency may well happen; but to allow an increase of rates for such reason would be to allow the water company to make a profit, not as a reward for its expenditures and services, but for the fortuitous occurrence of a rise in the price of materials or labor. The law does not intend that this business shall be a speculation in which the water company or the consumers shall respectively win or lose upon the casting of a die, or upon the equally unpredictable fluctuations of the markets. For the money which the company has expended for the public benefit, it is to receive a reasonable, and no more than a reasonable, reward. It is to be paid according to what it has done, and not according to what others might conceivably do. In effect, the bargain between the company and the public was made when the works were constructed; and this matter is to be determined according to the state of things at that time.

We must, then, have recourse to the third standard of value,—the revenue which the property is capable of producing. At the first blush there might seem to be a difficulty in applying this standard, for the revenue received by the company will be absolutely controlled by the rates fixed, and no revenue can be collected except upon rates so fixed. This difficulty has led one of the counsel in this case, in a singularly able and ingenious argument, to contend that the rates must be so fixed as to enable the company to obtain precisely the revenue which it would realize if the rates were not regulated by the public at all. To this proposition we cannot assent. The whole history of municipal regulation conclusively shows that its principal purpose was always to diminish what were rightly or wrongly believed to be exorbitant charges. The theory of its application has always been that it is necessary to restrain the proprietors of what have been called "virtual monopolies" from imposing extravagant and unreasonable tariffs for the use of their facilities. Whether the system be well conceived or not, whether it accords with the theory of free government, are not questions with which we have to do. It is sufficient that the law recognizes that there is a standard by which just compensation may be measured, and that it is intended to prevent that measure from being exceeded. What that standard is, as applied to the present case, we think not difficult of ascertainment. As we have said, it is not the water or the distributing works which the company may be said to own, and the value of which is to be ascertained. They were acquired and contributed for the use of the public. The public may be said to be the real owner, and the company only the agent of the public to administer their use. What the company has parted with—what the public has acquired—is the money reasonably and properly expended by the company in acquiring its property and constructing its works. The state has taken the use of that money, and it is for that use that it must provide just compensation. What revenue money is capable of producing is a question of fact, and, theoretically at least, susceptible of more or less exact ascertainment. Regard must be had to the nature of the investment, the risk attendant upon it, and the public demand for the product of the enterprise. It would not, of course, be reasonable to allow the company a profit equal to the greatest rate of interest realized upon any kind of investment, nor, on the other hand, to compel it to accept the lowest rate of remuneration which capital ever obtains. Comparison must be made between this business and other kinds of business involving a similar degree of risk, and all the surrounding circumstances must be considered. An important circumstance will always be the rate of interest at which money can be borrowed for investment in such a business; and, where the business appears to be honestly and prudently conducted, the rate which the company would be compelled to pay for borrowed money will furnish a safe, though not always conclusive, criterion of the rate of profit which will be deemed reasonable. In ordinary cases, where the management is fair and economical, it would be unreasonable to fix the rates so low as to prevent the company from paying interest on borrowed money at the lowest market rate obtainable; and even then some allowance or margin should be made for any risk to which the company may be exposed, over and above the risk taken by a lender. This being so, the existence of the bonded indebtedness, on which so much stress has been laid, and which has seemed to present so difficult a problem in some of the cases, must be disregarded. That fact, indeed, it seems to us, can never be important, except as entitling the holders of the bonds, as parties in interest, to be heard in actions like the present. Evidently no distinction can be made between those who construct the works with their own money and those who do so with money borrowed from others. In either case the money actually invested is the basic criterion of the revenue to be allowed. It follows that we cannot say that the finding of the court below that the rates fixed by the city council were less than what was reasonable is unsupported by the evidence. After deducting current expenses for the year ($40,000) from the revenue received ($65,788.65), there would be left but $25,788.65, or but little more than 84 per cent upon $750,000, the actual cost of the works; while the evidence shows that the company was compelled to pay a much higher rate upon money which it appears to have fairly borrowed. It is true that the evidence is not as full and satisfactory on this question as it should be, doubtless owing to the fact that the rules governing this inquiry were not clearly apprehended by the counsel who tried the case. But as no attempt was made to show that the rate of interest paid by the company was above the lowest market rate, and as the prudence and economy of the management were not successfully impeached, we cannot say that the court below was not justified in the conclusion to which it arrived on this question.

But it is contended that the power of the court is, at most, to inquire whether some reward will be provided by the rates fixed, and that if some reward, however small, is so provided, the court cannot interfere. We have been referred to dicta in some of the cases which do support that contention, but we are unable to agree with that conclusion. It is an elementary doctrine of constitutional law that the question of just compensation is a judicial question, to be determined in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings; and, construing article 14 of our Constitution with § 14 of article 1 (as we think we are bound to do), we find no difficulty in holding that, whenever the rates fixed by the council are grossly and palpably insufficient to furnish such a revenue as will afford just compensation within the rules above declared, redress may be had in the courts. Of course, every slight or conjectural deficiency will not justify an appeal to the courts; nor, if the question be doubtful, will the court, in the absence of fraud or other special ground of equitable interference, substitute its judgment for that of the municipal body. But, whenever it is clear and beyond question that the revenue which the company can possibly receive under the rates fixed will be wholly insufficient to allow it the compensation to which it is legally entitled, it is the duty of the court to declare the ordinance void. Such is the case under the findings here, and those findings must therefore be held to support the judgment. It should, of course, be said that it does not follow that in every case the company will be entitled to credit for all of its current expenditures, or to receive a compensation based on the entire cost of its works. Reckless and unnecessary expenditures, not legitimately incurred in the actual collection and distribution of the water furnished, or in the acquisition, construction, or preservation of so much of the plant as is necessary for that purpose, cannot be allowed. Nor can the investment on which the company is entitled to base its compensation be held to include property not now actually employed in collecting or distributing the water now being supplied, however useful it may have been in the past or may yet be in the future. It is the money reasonably and properly expended in each year in collecting and distributing the water which constitutes the current expenses which may be allowed; and it is the money reasonably and properly expended in the acquisition and construction of the works actually and properly in use for that purpose which constitutes the investment on which the compensation is to be computed. The amounts stated in the findings in this case are found to be of that character.

4. But it is contended that the findings in several particulars are unsupported by the evidence. It is claimed that the evidence does not justify the finding that $750,000 had been actually expended in the purchase and construction of the plant. On this subject the evidence is extremely unsatisfactory. Apart from estimates testified to by engineers, the only evidence of the cost was the books of the company, which placed the amount at $735,000. Of this sum defendants object to items amounting to about $127,000, vis., an alleged duplicate of the entry of $13,932, an alleged overcharge of $25,000 in the real-estate account, and the sum of $38,000, alleged to be the cost of certain works abandoned and not in use. On these questions we have had little or no assistance from counsel for respondent, and our examination of the evidence has failed to satisfy us on any of them. The books, or those portions of them brought up in the transcript, require much explanation, which has not been furnished us. In fact, the case appears to have been tried largely on a wrong theory, the greater portion of the evidence consisting of the testimony of expert witnesses as to the value of the property. This is, at the best, an unsatisfactory way of determining the question of actual cost (for which purpose only could it be admissible), and should not be resorted to when better evidence can be obtained. As against the company, at least, its books furnish better evidence on this subject, and cannot be disregarded. These books certainly show the cost to have been less than $750,000, though we are unable to determine the precise amount properly shown by them; and the evidence clearly discloses that portions of the plant included in that cost are not now in use, if, indeed they have not been totally abandoned. We think, therefore, that this finding is not justified by the evidence. On this and kindred matters, not only is the burden of proof on the plaintiff, but it is bound to establish them by the most clear and satisfactory evidence, in order to overcome the presumption of the correctness of the action of the city council.

The finding that the expenses of the company for the year in question were $40,000 is also attacked. The books of the company put the amount at $44,255.80. Of this amount, appellants object to items of about $5,000, as unnecessary and improper, and object particularly to an item of $12,800, being an unpaid bill, which is disputed by plaintiff, and on which its liability is left doubtful. Counsel for respondent have not attempted to answer these points. As the evidence is presented to us in an unsatisfactory shape we will say no more than that it does not support the finding. Whether all of the items complained of are proper or improper cannot be determined upon this record, but some of them are not shown to be proper. It will be the duty of the court on a retrial to allow no item of expenditure which is not satisfactorily shown to be an actual and proper charge in the actual conduct of the business of supplying water; and, when legal or other general expenses are claimed, they must be shown to have had a proper relation to that business. Of course, the items of expenses in the present action should be disregarded. The trial being had after the expiration of the year for which the rates in question were fixed, the amounts of revenue and expenses are capable of exact proof.

With regard to the question of the depreciation of the plant by use, it is sufficient to say that ordinary repairs should be charged to current expense, that substantial reconstruction or replacement should be charged to the construction account, and that depreciation should not otherwise be considered. It is doubtless difficult in many cases to properly discriminate between current and ordinary repairs and such repairs as amount, in effect, to new construction. Such difficulties, when they arise, must be solved by the application of the principles on which ordinary business enterprises are conducted. It may be added that when, as appears to have been the case in this instance, portions of the company's expenses are specifically repaid by the consumers, such expenses should be eliminated from the computation. This will apply, at least, to the "taps" put in for private consumers.

5. Among other things, the court below made the following finding: "(10) That the taking of evidence as to the value of the plaintiff's plant, and the rates that should be fixed by the common council of said city, during the month of February, 1890, for the year commencing July 1, 1890, was by said common council delegated to a joint committee, consisting of three members from the board of delegates and three members from the board of aldermen of said common council. That said joint committee proceeded to, and did, take evidence from the plaintiff and its officers and other witnesses for a number of days; and that on the 21st day of February, 1890, the plaintiff then being before said committee by its attorney, said attorney inquired of said committee whether other evidence would be taken, and announced that, if other evidence would be taken, he (the said attorney) desired to be present, and especially that if evidence was given by members of the board of public works of said city, or estimates were taken from said members of the value or cost of the plaintiff's plant, that he (said attorney) desired to be present, and examine said members of the board of public works as to the evidence given by them or the estimates furnished. That it was announced by one of said committee at that time, in the presence of the other members, that he did not know of any other evidence that was to be taken, which was not disputed by any other member of the committee. That there, at that time, and immediately following the demand of said attorney as aforesaid, the city engineer of said city, who was present, was privately and secretly informed that the committee desired to have him present at a meeting to be held the following day, to give an estimate of the value of said plant. That on the following day said committee met secretly, and without notifying the water company or its said attorney, and took the testimony of said city engineer and one Schuyler, a member of the board of public works of said city, and took from them their estimates of the value and cost of every part of the distributing system, pumps, wells, and other property of the plaintiff, not including its water rights, rights of way, or real estate. That said meeting was held secretly, in a back room of the office of the city attorney, while all of the other meetings of the committee had been held publicly in the room of the board of aldermen; was held on a legal holiday, when the offices of the city in the city hall were closed; and said meeting was held with the doors closed and locked. That the plaintiff had no notice or knowledge of said meeting or the taking of said evidence, and was not present, either by its officers or its attorney or otherwise, and was given no opportunity to be present or investigate or cross-examine with reference to the evidence given and estimates furnished. That said estimates so furnished were largely less than the cost as proved or estimated by the evidence of the officers of the plaintiff taken by said committee, and sworn statements furnished by its officers; and the estimates so furnished in the absence of the plaintiff were taken, but with few exceptions, and as to small amounts, as the value and cost of said plant by said committee, and made the basis of their report and of the rates fixed by them, and subsequently adopted by the ordinance of the common council. That the report of said committee was made up and concluded on the 24th day of February, 1890, was presented to both houses of said common council on the evening of that day, and was then adopted by each of said bodies without change. That the attorney of the plaintiff appeared before each of said bodies, and demanded that the plaintiff be allowed to offer evidence to said common council with reference to the fixing of said rates; but his right to offer said evidence was denied, and no evidence was received or heard. That the evidence taken by the committee was taken down by a stenographer, and transcribed, but was never read to or submitted to either board of said common council; but that the members of said committee, or some of them, stated their recollection of the evidence upon which their said report was based. That the ordinance mentioned in the complaint, fixing said rates, was passed and adopted by both of the bodies of said common council on the evening of the 25th day of February, 1890, without any further hearing, or opportunity to be heard, on the part of plaintiff."

It is claimed that this finding is not altogether in accord with the evidence; but, though we find some verbal inaccuracies, we think that in all material particulars it is sufficiently supported. It is plain that these facts show so much of unfairness in the investigation had by the common council as to overcome the presumption of the correctness of its decision. It was clearly the duty of the council to give to the water company, at least when requested to do so, a reasonable opportunity to be heard, not merely for the purpose of presenting its own evidence, but also of explaining or overcoming, if it could, evidence presented by others. The company, of course, could not claim as a right to be heard at any time it chose; but it certainly was entitled, upon reasonable request for that purpose, to be present when evidence was being produced before the council or its committee, or to be otherwise informed of that evidence, and allowed to overcome it if possible. The action of the committee, for which no sufficient excuse was given, appears to have been taken for the very purpose of excluding the plaintiff when that evidence was received, and it therefore seriously impugns the fairness of the investigation. Indeed, such an investigation ought to be held publicly, and upon such reasonable public notice of the times and places of the meetings as will enable those interested to be present; and a neglect of this precaution, when unexplained, must always give rise to injurious suspicions.

A number of other points have been discussed by counsel, but they are all either covered by what has been said, or have been thereby rendered unimportant. For the reasons above set forth, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: Henshaw, J.; McFarland, J.

Garoutte, J., concurring:

The findings of fact made by the trial court which are deemed necessary to a consideration of the questions presented before us are as follows: "(1) On the 24th day of February, 1890, and at the time the ordinance mentioned in plaintiff's complaint was enacted by the common council of said city, the water plant and system of the plaintiff was of the value of \$750,000. (2) The necessary operating expenses of plaintiff in conducting its property from July, 1890, to July, 1891, and the sum actually expended, was \$40,000. (3) Plaintiff was and is indebted upon its outstanding bonds, regularly issued, in the sum of \$1,000,000, bearing interest at 5 per cent per annum, of which sum \$750,000 was necessarily expended in the construction of the plant, and the interest upon which is \$50,000 per annum. (4) The total receipts received under said ordinance from July 1, 1890, to July 1, 1891, amounted to \$85,788.95, and no more. (5) The annual depreciation of plaintiff's plant is $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent per annum. (6) The rates, as fixed by the ordinance, for the year commencing July 1, 1890, were not just or reasonable, and were grossly oppressive, unjust, and unreasonable."

Owing to the fact that the case was not brought to trial in the lower court until the year had expired covered by the ordinance, it will be observed that the court was enabled to find the actual receipts to the plaintiff from ratepayers during that period. In the discussion of the questions presented by this appeal, we shall assume that the findings of the court to the effect that the water plant of the plaintiff corporation was of the value of $750,000, and that its operating expenses for the year would be and were $40,000, have support in the evidence, and stand as facts on the record. In the fixing of water rates by a city, as contemplated by the Constitution, it is evident that the valuation of the plant is the basic element upon which the whole investigation rests. The original cost of construction is simply an element to be considered in fixing the present valuation. It is a circumstance, strong or weak, entering into the final conclusion of the municipality upon the question. But as to the amount of the bonded indebtedness, or the amount of interest annually accruing thereon, we fail to see their materiality in determining the value of the plant, or the sum total of revenue to be raised from the sales of water. It is not a question in which ratepayers are concerned whether the water company has no outstanding indebtedness, or is floundering under a bonded debt, which threatens to sink it at any moment. If the municipality is required to establish a scale of rates which will produce a revenue sufficient to pay interest upon outstanding bonds, this provision of the Constitution would not only be a perpetual guaranty to the bondholders for the payment of their annual interest, but a constant incentive to additional issues of bonds. Such conditions were never contemplated by anybody. It is the duty of the municipality, when it has arrived at a determination as to the valuation of the plant, to determine the necessary outlay for the ensuing year; then to determine what would be a reasonable, just, and fair compensation to the company, based upon the valuation of the plant; and thereupon to fix a schedule of rates which will produce that sum of money. If there be outstanding bonds, the company may apply its income to the payment of interest thereon. If there be no outstanding bonds, this income may pass to the pockets of the stockholders, in the shape of dividends declared. A municipality must fix a fair and just rate for the water, based upon the valuation of the plant; and, when it has done this, its duty has been performed, and the revenue collected under such rates is the property of the company, to do with as it seems best.

Under and pursuant to constitutional authority (Const. art. 14, §§ 1, 2), the legislature (Stat. 1881, p. 54), passed an act, by the terms of which it was made the duty of the board of supervisors, town council, board of aldermen, or other legislative body of any city and county, city or town, in the month of February of each year, to fix the rates which shall be charged and collected by any person, association, company, or corporation, for water furnished to any such city and county, or city or town, or the inhabitants thereof. It is now contended by appellant that, the authority to fix water rates coming directly from the Constitution to the municipality, the rates fixed under such authority have the same binding force and effect, and occupy the same position as to the law and the courts, and should receive the same consideration, as though fixed directly by the legislature, in the absence of the aforesaid constitutional provisions. Let it be conceded; still the claim is unsound that this action of the municipality is conclusive. It is neither above nor beyond the law, and a court of equity will reach out and review it whenever the facts so demand. The legislature itself has no right or power to legislate a man's property away from him, and beyond doubt courts are vested with jurisdiction to declare all such attempts void, and will exercise that jurisdiction whenever the occasion presents itself. The legislature of the state of Minnesota enacted that the rates for freights and fares fixed by the railroad commission of that state should be conclusively presumed to be reasonable. In Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota Railroad & W. Commission, 184 U.S. 418, 83 L. ed. 970, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 209, this enactment was declared void, as depriving a person of his property without due process of law, the court saying: "If the company is deprived of the power of charging reasonable rates for the use of its property, and such deprivation takes place in the absence of an investigation by judicial machinery, it is deprived of the lawful use of its property, and thus, in substance and effect, of the property itself, without due process of law and in violation of the Constitution of the United States; and in so far as it is thus deprived, while other persons are permitted to receive reasonable profits upon their invested capital, the company is deprived of the equal protection of the law." Again, it is said in Stone v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. ("Railroad Commission Cases"), 116 U.S. 307, 29 L. ed. 636: "From what has thus been said, it is not to be inferred that this power of limitation or regulation is itself without limit. This power to regulate is not a power to destroy, and limitation is not the equivalent of confiscation. Under pretense of regulating fares and freights, the state cannot require a railroad corporation to carry persons or property without reward; neither can it do that which in law amounts to a taking of private property for public use without just compensation, or without due process of law." The same doctrine is also declared in Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 128 U.S. 174, 33 L.

ed. 377; Budd v. New York, 143 U.S. 517, 86 L. ed. 247, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 45; Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co., 154 U.S. 863, 40 L. ed. 1014; and St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gill, 156 U.S. 649, 39 L. ed. 587.

As far as we are given light to see, from the consideration of the doctrine enunciated by the many cases coming from the highest court of the land, it would appear to be immaterial whether this power to fix a schedule of rates is vested in the legislature, or delegated by the legislature to some inferior board or tribunal, or given to such board or tribunal by direct grant from the Constitution. Whether it be done by the express act of the legislature, or by council or commission, under authority from a higher power, or whether the act of such council or commission in fixing rates be judicial or legislative, are matters outside the question. If we understand the doctrine declared by the highest judicial tribunal, it is that the courts have no power to declare rates fixed by the body legally authorized so to do unreasonable, unless those rates are so unreasonable and oppressive as to deprive a party of the equal protection of the law, and result in a practical confiscation of his property. But that, when any attempt is made to despoil the owner of his property, it is the highest duty of a court of equity under the Constitution to afford him shelter and protection. In Spring Valley Waterworks v. San Francisco, 82 Cal. 306, 6 L. R. A. 756, an exact duplicate of the present question was before this court, and it is there said: "But the courts cannot, after the board has fully and fairly investigated and acted, by fixing what it believes to be reasonable rates, step in and say its action shall be set aside and nullified because the courts, upon a similar investigation, have come to a different conclusion as to the reasonableness of the rates fixed. There must be actual fraud in fixing the rates, or they must be so palpably and grossly unreasonable and unjust as to amount to the same thing." Aside from any question of actual fraud, rates that are so unreasonable and unjust as to deprive the owner of any revenue whatever from his property would amount in law to fraud upon his rights under the Constitution. In disposing of appellant's contention that the schedule of rates fixed by the city council is conclusive upon the court, we have also disposed of respondent's contention that the law giving to the city the right to fix water rates is violative of the Constitution of the United States, as depriving a man of his property without a hearing before a judicial tribunal. Both positions are equally erroneous.

This court is not here to declare what are reasonable rates. The Constitution has vested that power and duty in the council of the city of San Diego, and the exercise of that power by the council cannot be questioned by the courts unless constitutional rights are violated. The question is not, what rate would this court fix if the duty were cast upon it of fixing rates? but, rather, will the owners of the plant be deprived of constitutional rights by an enforcement of the order of the council fixing rates? If the rate fixed by a municipal council was twice too large, I know not what jurisdiction of this court could be invoked to right the wrong. Hence it is apparent that it is only in exceptional cases that an order fixing rates may be set aside by judicial decree. Taking the findings of fact as they stand, the schedule of rates fixed by the city should not be disturbed. The valuation of the plant is \$750,000. The operating and current expenses are \$40,000. The revenue from the sale of water under the schedule of rates would be, and actually was, \$65,000. This leaves a profit of \$25,000 upon the investment. To be sure, it is small when we consider the amount of money invested. To be sure, it is not enough, and possibly not one half the sum that could be earned if that amount of money was invested in other business undertakings. But with these things we have nothing to do. Those are matters passed upon by the city in the exercise of a discretion granted by the Constitution, and its decision as to the reasonableness of the amount of revenue to be derived by the company from the rates is conclusive upon the courts. While this sum is not enough upon this character of investment, still it is $8\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, and such return is a substantial profit. We mean it is so substantial that a court of equity, in view of the law of the land, cannot say that the rates are so unreasonable as to be confiscatory in character, and thus violative of any principle of constitutional law. Mr. Justice Brewer, of the Supreme Court of the United States, has probably given this question more thought and investigation than any other jurist in this country; and he says, in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Dey, 85 Fed. Rep. 866, 1 L. R. A. 744, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 325, "Counsel for complainant urge that the lowest rates the legislature may establish must be such as will secure to the owners of the railroad property a profit on their investment at least equal to the lowest current rate of interest, say 8 per cent. Decisions of the supreme court seem to forbid such a limit to the power of the legislature in respect to that which they apparently recognize as a right of the owners of the railroad property to some reward; and the right of judicial interference exists only when the schedule of rates established will fail to secure to the owners of the property some compensation or income from their investment. As to the amount of such compensation, if some compensation or reward is in fact secured, the legislature is the sole judge." Subsequently the same question was again presented to him in Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 382, 40 L. ed. 1014, and also in Ames v. Union P. R. Co. 64 Fed. Rep. 165, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 835; and in those cases neither he nor any other of the justices of that court retreated or advanced from that position.

This balance of \$25,000 is profit, unless it is swallowed up by the finding of the court that plaintiff's plant suffered an annual depreciation of $8\frac{1}{4}$ per cent and the conclusion of law therefrom that a percentage upon the investment to that amount shall be added to the operating expenses before the point is reached where profit begins. We are satisfied that this finding has no support in the evidence, even conceding the conclusion of law drawn therefrom sound. In the first place, the evidence develops that there can be no general depreciation of this plant as a whole. There are tunnels, wells, reservoirs, water rights, and real estate, amounting to more than one half of the valuation of the plant. There is no depreciation of these things. There is no wear and tear; no permanent and gradual destruction by use and age. Most of them stand as everlasting as the hills. The theory of plaintiff in this regard seems to be that the life of a plant of this character may be approximated at thirty years, and that a sinking fund of one thirtieth of its value should be collected from the ratepayers annually, and laid aside to be handed to the stockholders upon the sad occasion of its demise, as an alleviating salve to their sorrow. But such a thing is all wrong, for it results in the consumers of water buying the plant and paying for it in annual instalments. Consumers of water cannot be charged with cost of construction. They are only to pay a fair interest upon such cost; and, as we look at this matter, if this $8\frac{1}{4}$ per cent is not stowed away in the vaults as a sinking fund to make glad the hearts of the stockholders upon the expiration of the thirty years, which theory cannot be tolerated for a moment, then it must go into the plant as cost of construction, and therefore not chargeable against the consumers. The result of such expenditure is only to increase the valuation of the plant, and to thereby draw from the consumers an income from the amount of the investment. If improvements are to be made in the plant, the cost of these improvements should be charged against the construction account. If repairs are to be made upon the plant as it stands,—as, for example, a new pipe substituted for an old piece of the same size and quality,—such charge should be considered operating expenses.

Upon an examination of the record, we find these views fully corroborated in the evidence of the water company, given by one of its most important witnesses. He testified: "Where we took up one pipe line or a portion of it on the street, and put down another, if it was the same size pipe, to renew it, we would charge it to expenses. If it was a different size, we would charge the difference between them—the increased size—to construction. Where we sell pipe that we take up, we credit that to construction. If we have to renew any portion of the same size pipe, we charge it to expenses." This question has arisen incidentally in Union P. R. Co. v. United States, 99 U. S. 402, 25 L. ed. 274, and also in Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 382, 40 L. ed. 1014, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560, but neither case looks the other way from the views we have expressed. When the question arises between the corporation, upon the one side, and its bondholders or stockholders, upon the other, or when it arises upon a construction of a contract with the government, as in one of the cases just cited, operating expenses, cost of construction, and net earnings may stand upon a different footing. Those cases are not this case. This is neither a question of bookkeeping nor net earnings. The particular system pursued by corporations in segregating and applying their gross receipts is likewise immaterial. The whole matter is a pure question of what is just and right between all parties interested.

The consumers of water have rights and possess equities which must be considered equally with those of the company. They are to be taxed to pay the amount called for by the schedule of rates, and these rates, in justice to them, should be fixed at the smallest possible amount, taking into consideration what is just and equitable to the owners of the property. In cases of the present character, under the head of operating expenses, the company is entitled to charge for keeping the plant in its normal condition; and the sinking of new wells, the building of new reservoirs, the erection of additional buildings, and the substitution of larger and better pipe (to the extent of the difference), do not come under the head of operating expenses, but should be charged to construction account. If this were not so, a water plant inferior in all things in a few years could be transformed into a water plant superior in everything, at the expense of the consumer. This would be an advantage to the owner, and a burden to the ratepayer neither contemplated nor justified by the law. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

Temple, J., concurring:

I agree generally in the views expressed by Mr. Justice Garoutte. I do not comprehend how in this case the exercise of the power to regulate charges or to fix compensation for furnishing water is a taking, within the meaning of § 14 of article I of the Constitution. The waterworks were all constructed subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution of 1879. The city owns no waterworks. It is provided in § 19, art. 11, of the Constitution that any individual or company shall have the use of the streets, for laying down pipes and conduits and making connections therewith, so far as necessary for introducing into and supplying the city and the inhabitants with fresh water, "upon the condition that the municipal government shall have the right to regulate the charges thereof." The corporation therefore constructed its works, and invested every dollar of its capital upon this express condition. The privilege of distributing water for pay is a franchise which might have been withheld altogether. It is really a privilege granted to a private individual to perform a public service for pay. It is granted to all upon this express reservation of the right to regulate charges. Article 14 is the complement to the section before quoted. It declares that the use of all water appropriated for sale or distribution is a public use, subject to the control of the state, and that in cities the "rates or compensation" shall be fixed annually by the governing body of such city, which rates shall continue in force for one year only; and, further, that any individual or company collecting water rates otherwise than as so established shall forfeit his or its franchise and works of the city. There is here no taking under the power of eminent domain, nor in any other sense than is implied in every service rendered for hire. There is, then, no obligation to remunerate water companies for investments made or to allow interest thereon, either upon first cost or present value. The obligation is to compensate for service rendered. What will constitute just compensation involves many considerations. Certainly no allowance need be made for unnecessary expenditures, either in construction or management. Nor is the test always the cost of the companies. There is no limit to the number of companies which may bring water into a city. The franchise is freely offered to all in the Constitution. If there are many companies, and thereby the cost of management is increased, this fact would not call for increased rates. The service is worth no more when rendered by ten companies than when one company furnishes all the water. Incidentally to the inquiry as to what is a fair compensation for the service, the governing board may well inquire into the cost which the company whose rates are to be regulated have incurred in bringing water to the city, and in distributing it. But these matters are merely incidental, and never determinative of the question.

All the elements entering into the question having been determined, opinions would still vary as to what would be fair compensation. The Constitution has imposed upon the governing body of the city the duty of determining that question, and granted the privilege of the streets and the franchise to distribute water upon the express condition that such boards may determine the question. As already shown, the works have been constructed under this express agreement. The court cannot fix the rates,—is, in fact, expressly prohibited by the letter of the Constitution from so doing. The company will forfeit its franchise and property if it collects rates "otherwise than as so established." This prohibits them from collecting charges as fixed by the courts. The only proper judicial question is whether compensating rates have been fixed. Whether they are too high or too low is not a judicial question. The judge cannot substitute his judgment for that of the body to whom the discretion is given by the Constitution. There is much learning upon this subject in the law books, and a great variety of opinions, not to say contrariety, can be found. I know of none which—the facts considered—need be deemed adverse to these views. If there were no such constitutional provisions, the case might be different. I notice that § 19 of article 11 applies only to cities which own no public works. Whether the privilege of using the streets, or the right to distribute and sell water, exists or can exist in cities which do own such works, may be a question. If they do exist, there can be no doubt of the application of article 14 to persons or corporations selling water in such cities. In such cases could the city be compelled to take and pay for other works which only diminish the value of its own property?

Harrison, J., concurring:

I concur in the reversal of the judgment and order of the supreme court. In finding the value as well as the cost of the plant, the court included many items which were not proper to be considered for that purpose, and which are mentioned in the opinion of Mr. Justice

Van Fleet as improperly constituting a part of the cost of the plant. While the cost of the plant may be properly considered as an element of evidence in ascertaining its value, I am clearly of opinion that it should not form the basis of estimating the revenue which the water company is entitled to receive. The value of the plant may change from year to year as materially as may the cost of operating the works, and there is good reason for holding that the Constitution requires the rates to be fixed each year, in order that they may be adjusted to this changing of value. It is not necessary here to lay down a rule which shall be applicable to all conceivable conditions, since the conditions governing in one municipality, or attending the supply of water to its inhabitants, will hardly ever be the same elsewhere; and it is only proper in the present case to consider the circumstances attending the water company and the municipality now before the court.

In designating a city council as the body to fix these rates, the Constitution has clearly indicated that they are not to be fixed by the courts. The water company has the right to protection by the judiciary from the enforcement of such rates as will deprive it of compensation for furnishing the water; but, if the rates fixed by the council afford compensation to the water company, the question of the reasonableness of this compensation is a question of fact, which is not open to review by the courts. If the courts are authorized to determine the amount of compensation which will be reasonable, the rates will be fixed by them, rather than by the city council; and, for the same reason, the city council, and not the courts, are authorized to determine whether the rates, to be reasonable, shall be fixed at such an amount as will yield to the water company any definite rate of interest.

Even if it should be conceded that reasonable rates would be such as will yield to the water company a return equal to the lowest current rate of interest on the value of its property, it appears from the findings of the court that the rates fixed herein yielded a return of more than 8 per cent upon the value of the plant; and it is a matter of general notoriety that this is more than is on an average received by capitalists from permanent or fixed investments, with the guaranty of the government as their security. What may be the lowest current rate of interest upon an investment depends upon so many circumstances that no particular rate can be predicated in advance of any particular investment; but it is in all instances a question of fact, and not of law, and is not to be determined by the judiciary. After it has been determined by the city council, the judiciary are not authorized to set aside its determination on the ground that in its judgment it is too small, any more than it could set aside the rates on the ground that the income yielded thereby would be too great.

Beatty, Ch. J., dissenting:

I think the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed. In fixing water rates, it is the duty of the city council to provide for a just and reasonable compensation to the water company. Anything short of that is simple confiscation, and is not only a violation of constitutional rights, but is an extremely shortsighted policy. Rates ought to be adjusted to the value of the service rendered, and this means that the water companies should be allowed to collect annually a gross income sufficient to pay current expenses, maintain the necessary plant in a state of efficiency, and declare a dividend to stockholders equal to, at least, the lowest current rates of interest, not on the par or market value of the stock, but on the actual value of the property necessarily used in providing and distributing the water to consumers. To arrive at the actual value of the plant, water rights, real estate, etc., cost is an element to be considered, but is not conclusive. The plant may have cost too much. It may have been planned upon too liberal a scale. Its construction may have been extravagantly managed. The real estate and water rights may have cost less or more than their present value. And therefore cost will seldom represent the actual capital at present invested in the works, but such present value is the true basis upon which compensation, in the shape of dividends, is to be allowed. As to current expenses, all operating expenses reasonably and properly incurred should be allowed, taxes should be allowed, and the cost of current repairs. In addition to this, if there is any part of the plant, such as main pipes, etc., which at the end of a term of years—twenty years, for instance—will be so decayed and worn out as to require restoration, an annual allowance should be made for a sinking fund sufficient to replace such part of the plant when it is worn out. In its findings and conclusions the superior court seems to have conformed to these views; and, making every allowance for any minor errors that may appear in the record, the evidence is amply sufficient to sustain every material finding, and the findings clearly sustain the conclusion that in this case the rates fixed were grossly and palpably unjust to the water company. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

APPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Superior Court for Hartford County remanding the minor to the custody of defendant in a habeas corpus proceeding for the purpose of obtaining the custody of a minor child of Ferdinand Ward. Affirmed.

Statement by Andrews, Ch. J.:

The return was as follows: "The respondent, in obedience to said writ, brings the said Clarence Ward into court, and says that he is in no manner, without law or right, confined, imprisoned, restrained, or deprived of his liberty, and further avers with reference thereto as follows: (1) The said Clarence Ward is the son of Ferdinand Ward, now of Geneseo, in the state of New York, and of Ella Ward, the wife of said Ferdinand Ward, and the nephew of the respondent. (2) The said Ella Ward died at Stamford, Connecticut, on or about March 1, 1890. (3) The said Ferdinand Ward at the time of the decease of said Ella Ward, and for some time prior thereto, was a convict confined in the penitentiary at Sing Sing, in the state of New York; having been convicted in the courts of said state of a felony, and lawfully sentenced to imprisonment in said prison. (4) From the time of the sentence of said Ward, as set forth in paragraph 3, until her death, the said Ella Ward and her said son, Clarence Ward, resided in Stamford, in this state; having removed from New York to Stamford with the knowledge and approval of said Ferdinand Ward. (5) The said Ella Ward, at her decease, left a considerable estate, and a last will and testament, by virtue of the provisions of which a trust was created for the benefit of the said Clarence; the income of said estate, or so much thereof as might from time to time be found necessary to be expended by the trustees for the maintenance and education of the said Clarence until he shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years; the principal to be paid to him when he shall have arrived at said age, or, in case of his decease prior thereto without issue, said income to be paid one half part to his said father, and the balance to other beneficiaries named in said will. (6) Said will was proved and approved at East Haddam, in the state of Connecticut, before the court of probate for said district, and was also proved and approved in the proper tribunal in the state of New York. (7) The trustees named in said will declined to accept said trust, and thereupon the Franklin Trust Company, a corporation located in Brooklyn, New York, was duly appointed trustee under the provisions of said will, both in Connecticut and in New York, accepted said trust, duly qualified in both states, and is now in the discharge of its duties thereunder. (8) To all these proceedings the said Ferdinand Ward was duly made a party, and gave his consent and approval thereto. (9) Upon the decease of the said Ella Ward, the question presented itself as to the proper disposition to be made of the person of the said Clarence, as said the Franklin Trust Company, under its charter, had no power to act as guardian of the person of the said Clarence; his father being then confined in the state prison, and the nearest relatives on the side of the father positively declining to assume any personal care of, or custody of, the said Clarence. (10) It was finally agreed between all the relations upon both sides, including the father, and with the concurrence of the Franklin Trust Company, that said Clarence should be placed under the care and custody of his uncle, the respondent, at Thompson, in this state, and the respondent, without legal action being taken in reference thereto, should assume and thereafter occupy the position of a guardian over the person of the said Clarence Ward. (11) In accordance with the arrangement aforesaid, the said Clarence was forthwith removed from Stamford, Connecticut, where he was then residing, to the house of the respondent, in said Thompson, and has continued to reside there until the present time. (12) The said Ward was released from state prison on or about 1892. After being so released, the said Ward approved and ratified said arrangement with reference to the custody of Clarence. (13) Some time after the release of the said Ward from prison, he demanded of the respondent the custody of Clarence; but the respondent did not feel authorized to assume the responsibility of disregarding the terms of the arrangement hereinbefore mentioned without the consent and approval of the other contracting parties thereto, and referred the said Ward to such other parties for such consent and approval. (14) The other parties interested in the welfare of the said Clarence as aforesaid declined to consent to the change in the child's status as contemplated by the said Ward. (15) The respondent thereupon suggested that the question as to the right of the said Ward to the custody and control of the said Clarence be referred to the adjudication of the proper court upon the application of the said Ward. (16) The said Ward refused to take any legal action in the matter, but did on the 18th day of September, 1894, acting through his agents thereto by him employed, enter the state of Connecticut and the town of Thompson forcibly, and without prior demand upon the respondent, and, contrary to the wishes of the said Clarence, did attempt to abduct the said Clarence, and remove him from the custody and care of the respondent, and beyond the limits of this state and of the jurisdiction of its courts. (17) Thereupon, on the 8th day of October, 1894, after due hearing had, and upon legal motion thereof, the court of probate for the district of Thompson did appoint the respondent the legal guardian of the person of the said Clarence, which said appointment the respondent accepted, and is now in the discharge of his duties thereunder, the same having never been annulled or set aside." "(21) The said Clarence, ever since the date of his residence with the respondent as hereinbefore set forth, has remained with the respondent of his own free will and accord, and has been supported, maintained, and educated by the respondent under the arrangement hereinbefore stated, and the said Clarence still desires to remain with the respondent. (22) The respondent is the legal guardian of the said Clarence, and as such is entitled to his care and custody, and is desirous of maintaining, supporting, and educating him as aforesaid, and it is for the best interests of the said Clarence to remain in the care and custody of the respondent; and the petitioner is not the guardian, and in no manner entitled to have the care and custody, of the said Clarence."

To this return the plaintiff replied as follows: "(1) Paragraphs 17 and 22 are denied. (3) All the other paragraphs of the return are admitted. Second. And by way of further reply to said return the petitioner says that the residence of said Clarence Ward was not at Thompson at the time of said Green's alleged appointment as his guardian, nor has it ever been at said Thompson, or elsewhere in the state of Connecticut, but is now, and always has been, in the state of New York, and that the court of probate of Thompson had not jurisdiction to make the appointment alleged in paragraph 17 of said return. And the petitioner says that on the 1st day of July, 1895, the residence of said Clarence Ward was and for a long time previous thereto had been, at Geneseo, Livingston county, in the state of New York, and within the jurisdiction of the surrogate court of said county, and that on that day said court, having jurisdiction therefor under the laws of the state of New York, duly appointed said petitioner to be the guardian of said Clarence Ward, which appointment has never been annulled, and is in full force." The defendant denied this reply.

The court found that the defendant was lawfully appointed guardian of the person of said

Clarence Ward on the 8th day of October, 1894, by the court of probate for the district of Thompson, in this state; that the plaintiff was appointed such guardian on the 1st day of July, 1895, by the surrogate court for the county of Livingston, in the state of New York. The finding then proceeds: "(6) It was admitted that at the time of the appointment of the respondent as such guardian the said Ferdinand Ward was, and for a long time had been, a legal resident of the state of New York, and that at the time of the appointment of the petitioner as aforesaid the residence of said Ferdinand Ward was Geneseo, New York. (7) Excepting as above stated, no evidence was offered at said hearing by either of the parties to said proceeding. (8) From the facts set forth in said return, I find it to be for the best interest of said minor child that he remain in the care and custody of the respondent. (9) Upon said hearing, counsel for the petitioner claimed, as matters of law, that the appointment of the respondent as guardian as aforesaid was void, and that because the said Ferdinand Ward, at the time of said application and appointment of the respondent, was a legal resident of New York state as aforesaid, said court of probate of Thompson had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of said application and appointment, and that the same was of no effect, and that, because of said appointment of the petitioner by said surrogate court of New York state as aforesaid, it was the duty of the court, upon the facts set forth in said return to said writ, to award the custody of said minor, Clarence Ward, to the petitioner." The said judge found the issue for the defendant, denied the writ, and remanded the said Clarence Ward to the care and custody of the defendant. From that judgment the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

It is, to say the least, doubtful whether a guardian appointed in another state can bring a suit, as guardian, in the courts of this state. He is in the same position as an administrator.

Smith v. Madden, 73 Fed. Rep. 833.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Two errors are insisted on: (1) That the judge erred in holding that the question of the interest of the minor could affect the right of the plaintiff to the custody of his ward; (2) that the judge erred in overruling the claims of the plaintiff that the appointment of the defendant as guardian was void for the reason that the court of probate in the district of Thompson had no jurisdiction to make the appointment.

Most of the argument which is made in behalf of the plaintiff seems to us to be misapplied. The contention here is not between the father, on the one hand, and a stranger, as guardian, on the other, but between two guardians,—one appointed by a court at the place where the minor has had his actual dwelling place for six or eight years, and the other by a court at the place where it is said the technical domicile of the minor's father is. This writ, if granted, would not put the minor into the care and custody of his father, but into the hands of an utter stranger in fact, as well as in blood, who, although a fit man to be a guardian, can have no kindness or affection for the minor, nor for whom can the minor have any affection or good will. Prima facie, it is true, a father has the legal right to the custody of his minor child. But he has no absolute right, which he can at his own will transmit to another, to the detriment of the child. The plaintiff was appointed guardian of the person of Clarence Ward by a court in the state of New York on the application, as the record shows, of Ferdinand Ward, the father of Clarence. By that appointment, made on that application, it is very likely that the father has excluded himself from the right to claim the custody of his son. It is certain that the appointment of the plaintiff, made on that application, gains therefrom no added merit or force. The stress of the argument made here, that the parental relation ought to control, has nothing to rest upon. But were it otherwise, and the case was between the father and a guardian, we think the court did not err in considering the interest of the minor, in determining into whose hands he should be placed. "While it is the strict legal right of the parents, and those standing in loco parentis, to have the custody of their infant children, as against strangers, a court will not, on habeas corpus, regard this right as controlling, when to do so it would imperil the personal safety, morals, health, or happiness of a child in controversy. The right of the father or mother to the custody of their minor children is not an absolute right to be accorded to them under all circumstances for it may be denied to either of them, if it appears to the court that the parent, otherwise entitled to this right, 'is unfit for the trust.' And in contests between parents and third persons as to the custody of a child of such parents the opinion is now almost universal that neither of the parties has any rights that can be allowed to militate against the welfare of the infant. The paramount consideration is what is really demanded by its best interests. And the rule is virtually the same in contentions between parents for the possession. The court is not bound to award the custody to either contending party in such controversies, but may, subject to the welfare and best interests of the child, award it to a third party. The child in contentions of this kind has the right to the court's protection against 'such misfortunes of its parents, or the influences of such gross or immoral practices in their lives, as will seriously imperil its life, health, morals, or personal safety.' But what measure of wickedness or profligacy on the part of the parent will be sufficient to warrant the court in depriving the parent of his natural right to the possession of his minor child must necessarily depend upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case." Church, Habeas Corpus, § 440. Authorities to support the rule thus expressed may be almost indefinitely cited. Thus, in Richards v. Collins, 45 N. J. Eq. 283, it is said: "In resolving the general question of what will best subserve the interest and happiness of the child, its own wish and choice may be consulted and given weight, if it be of an age and capacity to form a rational judgment. There is no fixed age which capacitates such choice. It depends upon the extent of its mental development. . . . The wishes of children of sufficient capacity to form them are given especial consideration, where parents have for a length of time voluntarily allowed their children to live in the family of others, and thus form home associations and ties of affection for those having their care and nurture, and when it would mar the happiness of the children to sever such ties. The relation of parent and child is regarded as not fully characterized by the relative duties or service and support. Nature's provision of mutual affection commonly exists as the incentive to parental and filial duty and the bond of family union. It is the instinct of childhood to attach itself and cling to those who perform toward it the parental office; and they become endeared to it by ministering to its dependence. A parent, by transplanting his offspring into another family and surrendering all care of it for so long a time that its interests and affections all attach to the adopted home, may thereby seriously impair his right to have back its custody by judicial decree. In a controversy over its possession, its welfare will be the paramount consideration in controlling the discretion of the court. The strict right of the parent will be passed by, if a judgment in observance of such right would substitute a worse for a better condition." In Re O'Neal, 8 Am. Law Rev. 578, Judge Hoar gave this opinion: "Suppose by a pure misfortune, as insanity, or being cast away . . . a father has left his child destitute and dependent upon charity, does that give the child the right to form such new relations as to take from the father the right to the custody of the child? Upon the best reflection, I am satisfied that it does. When the father, by misfortune, is compelled to leave the child utterly helpless, the child ought to be considered as emancipated by the father. If . . . the child has made new relations in life, so deep and strong as to change its whole nature and character, the father has no right to reclaim it. I am satisfied that this is a sound proposition. The child is not the father's property. It is a human being, and has rights of its own. The father has a right to the custody of his child, because, from general experience, the natural and trained affections of the child attach to the father and those of the father to the child. If the father has left the child at an age too early for it to remember him, and it is placed in circumstances so that it must perish unless cared for, and other persons have expended money and become attached to the child, and the child has formed such associations as cannot be severed without injury to it, then the father has no legal right to sunder those ties. . . . It is within the judicial duty of the court to determine that the assent of the father has been given to the arrangement, which cannot be terminated without injury to the child. This principle would apply under the same circumstances if a father became insane. A human being cannot be treated like a piece of property." In State, Lynch, v. Bratton (Del.) 15 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 350, the court uses this language: "The father's right [to the custody of his infant child] is not absolute or unqualified. He may relinquish or forfeit it by contract, by his bad conduct, or by his misfortune in being unable to give it proper care and support. Where a father has, through his fault or his misfortune, lost or forfeited his right, and subsequently, by reformation or otherwise, reinstates himself in a position to properly care for and maintain his child, his right does not necessarily revive, but a court, upon habeas corpus, will exercise a sound discretion in view of all the circumstances with reference to the welfare of the child itself." On a hearing of a habeas corpus relative to the possession of a child, the question is one of discretion, and the further question whether the father is the proper person to have the care of it is legitimate. Johnson v. Terry, 34 Conn. 262; Chapsky v. Wood, 26 Kan. 650, 40 Am. Rep. 321; Mercein v. People, 25 Wend. 64, 85 Am. Dec. 653; Verser v. Ford, 37 Ark. 27; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 243; Prime v. Foote, 63 N. H. 52; Re Goldsworthy, L. R. 2 Q. B. Div. 75.

The court of probate in Thompson had jurisdiction to appoint a guardian to Clarence Ward. His actual stated residence was in that district. General Statutes, §§ 458, 459, use the word "resides" in this sense, rather than in the sense of strict technical domicil. Denslow v. Gunn, 67 Conn. 361. In other sections of our statutes, generally, the word "reside" is used in a sense which includes all who are the actual, stated dwellers in any given place, even though they may have a technical domicil elsewhere. Yale v. West Middle School Dist. 59 Conn. 489, 18 L. R. A. 161; Connecticut Hospital for Insane v. Brookfield, 69 Conn. 1.

RESERVATION by the Superior Court for N. Hartford County for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Errors in a suit brought to enjoin defendant from interfering with complainants' right to the flow of water in a river. Judgment for defendant advised.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Robinson & Robinson and William F. Henney, for plaintiffs:

Unless the city proceeds under the act of 1882 it has no right to proceed at all.

NOTE.—As to the diversion of streams for city water supply, see also Haupt's Appeal (Pa.) 8 L. R. A. 536; Rigney v. Tacoma Light & W. Co. (Wash.) 23 L. R. A. 423; Tampa Waterworks Co. v. Cline (Fla.) 33 L. R. A. 373.

That general powers to protect public health and build sewers do not confer upon municipalities the right to take innocent lands, water rights, etc., is very clear. The power calls for a special grant, and provision must be made in the grant for compensation.

Cavanagh v. Boston, 189 Mass. 426, 52 Am. Rep. 716.

The diversion of the stream as alleged in the bill is not an abatement of a public nuisance.

A permanent appropriation of innocent land to the public use can never be made without compensation.

Re Cheesebrough, 78 N. Y. 232.

Municipal authorities themselves cannot arbitrarily declare a thing to be a nuisance until such fact has been lawfully ascertained, and that by judicial adjudication.

Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984; Salem v. Eastern R. Co. 98 Mass. 431, 96 Am. Dec. 650; State, New Jersey R. & Transp. Co., v. Jersey City, 29 N. J. L. 170; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1179, note 1; Tiedeman, Pol. Power, p. 427.

Even an express power to abate nuisances doesn't warrant the destruction of valuable property, which was lawfully erected, or anything that was erected by lawful authority.

Clark v. Syracuse, 13 Barb. 32; People v. Albany, 11 Wend. 539, 27 Am. Dec. 95.

A city cannot take water from a running stream for purposes of health, or any other public purpose, without compensating the millers on the stream who are entitled to the usufruct of the water.

Harding v. Stamford Water Co. 41 Conn. 87; Kellogg v. New Britain, 63 Conn. 238; Tiedeman, Mun. Corp. § 354, p. 729, note 4.

If such facts were pleaded in the complaint as showed as a matter of law that the river was a nuisance, that could not be set up by the city in defense of this proceeding, because, if the stream is in any sense a nuisance, it is so simply because of the city's own use of it.

An injunction is a proper remedy.

Messrs. Lewis E. Stanton and William J. McConville, for defendant:

The interceptor is built by the street board under the ordinances of the court of common council.

Charter and Ordinances, pp. 271-281.

The interceptor is a great appliance or structure, which is built under the health laws.

The city is acting under its police powers; the court will not, by injunction, arrest the city when proceeding under health laws and exercising police powers.

Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 31 L. ed. 894; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 124, 24 L. ed. 83.

Offensive trades may be prohibited as public nuisances, and private parties are not entitled to damages for the destruction of their business.

Taunton v. Taylor, 116 Mass. 254; Watertown v. Mayo, 109 Mass. 315, 12 Am. Rep. 694; Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 52.

It makes no difference how the nuisance originated. The city must abate it, and it ought not to be arrested by a court of equity in its attempt to do so.

Re Cheesebrough, 78 N. Y. 232; Russell v. New York, 2 Denio, 461; Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 509, 30 Am. Rep. 323; Morgan v. Danbury, 67 Conn. 484; Wood, Nuisances, §§ 743, 745; Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 25 L. ed. 336; Baker v. Boston, 12 Pick. 184, 23 Am. Dec. 421.

Injury to private parties in such a case is damnum absque injuria; no private property is taken by the construction of the interceptor.

Morgan v. Danbury, 67 Conn. 484; Morgan v. Binghamton, 103 N. Y. 500; Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 25 L. ed. 336; Atwater v. Canandaigua, 124 N. Y. 602; Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 542-544.

Even if the plaintiffs are entitled to compensation they have not sought the proper remedy. Court will not issue an injunction to prevent the city from laying out a street; even if a private party be injured to some extent his remedy is not in equity.

Fellows v. New Haven, 44 Conn. 240, 26 Am. Rep. 447; Woodruff v. Catlin, 54 Conn. 297; Hoey v. Mayo, 43 Me. 322; Benjamin v. Wheeler, 8 Gray. 408; Diamond Match Co. v. New Haven, 55 Conn. 510; Judge v. Meriden, 38 Conn. 90; Torbush v. Norwich, 38 Conn. 225, 9 Am. Rep. 395; Jewett v. New Haven, 38 Conn. 368, 9 Am. Rep. 362; Mead v. New Haven, 40 Conn. 72, 15 Am. Rep. 14; Healey v. New Haven, 47 Conn. 805.

An injunction ought not to be granted in this cause, for the reason that the plaintiffs' right is doubtful, and they have full and adequate remedy at law for any consequential damages which may be inflicted upon them.

Hawley v. Beardsley, 47 Conn. 571; Dodd v. Hartford, 25 Conn. 232; Sheldon v. Centre School Dist. 25 Conn. 224; Gould, Waters, § 212, and note.

The city is acting under its powers to suppress a public nuisance. The prompt and immediate use of the interceptor is of the highest public importance. Courts will not for light reasons interfere with cities which are engaged in suppressing nuisances.

Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

To the original complaint in this case (which sought to enjoin the defendant from diverting, in the manner therein alleged, the flow of water into Park river) a demurrer was filed, and sustained, with leave to amend. The complaint was then amended; a demurrer thereto was filed; and thereupon the questions arising upon both demurrers were reserved for the advice of this court. As the determination of the questions arising upon the demurrer to the amended complaint disposes of the case reserved, it will be unnecessary to consider those arising upon the demurrer to the original complaint. The amended complaint consists of two counts.

The substance of the material parts of the first count, by paragraphs, may be stated as follows: (1) The plaintiffs are the owners of a valuable mill property on Park river, in the city of Hartford, with mills upon both sides of the river, one upon Elm street, and the other immediately opposite, upon Wells street. They are the owners, at that point and for a considerable space upon each side of it, of the banks of the river and of its bed, and the exclusive owners of the water privileges at that point. (2) The water power available at this point to the plaintiffs, by means of their dam, is equivalent to about 200 horse power upon the average. (3) The water privilege is an ancient one, having been established, used, and occupied as such for more than 250 years. (4) The value of the mill property in connection with the water privilege is $250,000, and the plaintiffs have established a large and profitable business thereon as millers, and the water power is sufficient, without the assistance of steam, to carry on the entire business of the plaintiffs as such millers. (5) The defendant is the owner of a large and important system of reservoirs, for the use of the citizens of Hartford, for domestic and other purposes. The water of all these reservoirs is communicated to a certain distributing reservoir, whence by leading pipes it is carried to the streets, houses, stores, and lands in the city, and is thence nearly in whole returned to Park river, above the plaintiff's dam, by the present drains, pipes, and sewers of the city, and is thereby made available to the plaintiffs in the use of their said water privilege. (6) All the water collected and carried by the city in all of said reservoirs is from brooks, streams, and springs which are tributary to Park river, to the entire current and flow of which river the plaintiffs are entitled, by their mill and riparian ownership aforesaid. (7) Since the introduction of the system of water supply by said city, referred to in paragraph 5, down to the present time, the water collected in such reservoirs, as they were severally completed and put in operation, has been largely, if not entirely, returned to said river, and made available for the uses of plaintiffs in the enjoyment of the said mill privilege, as set forth in paragraph 5. "(8)

The said city has recently, to wit, within about a year from the date of this complaint, built and completed a reservoir in the town of Bloomfield, known as the 'Tumbledown Brook Reservoir,' of very extensive area, in which the said city has accumulated, and still continues to accumulate and hold, vast quantities of water from the watershed, streams, brooks, and springs tributary to said Park river, and to whose usufruct the plaintiffs are entitled as aforesaid, and has connected the same by canals with said distributing reservoir, whence the said water is returned to said river, and made available for the uses of the plaintiffs in their mill work, as set out in paragraph fifth. (9) The surface water flowing from all points this side of the distributing reservoir now finds its way, either by direct surface flowage, or by the existing drains, pipes, and sewers of the city, into Park river. Some small portion of said surface water, however, and also a small portion of the water brought from the reservoirs, is carried into Park river below the complainants' dam, and into the Connecticut." (10) The city is now constructing an immense intercepting sewer, designed to divert, and which will divert, all the water now conveyed by pipes, drains, and sewers, and by surface flow into Park river, above plaintiff's dam, away from Park river, into the Connecticut river; and it intends to and will wholly divert said water, as aforesaid, unless restrained by injunction. "(11) The proposed intercepting sewer is particularly described in an exhibit which, by reference, is made part of this complaint, and will be filed in court as 'Exhibit B.'" (12) This diversion will deprive the plaintiffs of the use of from one third to one half the volume of water whose usufruct belongs to them, and will be a great and irreparable injury and damage to them. (13) By an act of the general assembly passed at its session in 1882, authority was given to the city to take, occupy, and appropriate any stream, or part of a stream, running in or through said city, and to remove dams, walls, and other obstructions to the free and healthful flow of such stream, or part of a stream, and to raise said dams and to build other dams where the public health or convenience may require, and to cause it to flow through a sewer or other aqueduct built in or upon the bed of said stream, or laid in the earth in or near the bank thereof; or by said act it was required that the city should agree, if possible, with parties interested, upon the damage on account of such improvement; and, if unable to so agree, that the city should have the damages appraised, and paid in the manner prescribed in said act. (14) In March, 1894, the plaintiffs presented their claim for damages in the manner prescribed by said act to the proper authority; but neither the city, nor anyone in its behalf, has "ever made any offer to compensate to any extent the plaintiffs for the damages which will arise from said so-called 'improvement,' nor have they agreed or attempted to agree with the plaintiffs upon such damages, although frequently requested by the plaintiffs." (15) Neither the city, nor anyone in its behalf, has taken any of the steps in said act prescribed, or otherwise, to have the plaintiffs' damages aforesaid ascertained or appraised; but it "threatens to continue the building and completion of said intercepting sewer, and to divert from said stream of water, and from plaintiffs' use, nearly one half of its flow and current, without any compensation whatsoever to the plaintiffs for their damages resulting from said so-called 'improvement.' (16) Such diversion will injure the plaintiffs to the amount of at least $100,000. (17) If the city does what it threatens to do, without agreeing with the plaintiffs as to their damages, or having the damages appraised and paid, the injuries inflicted upon the plaintiffs will be irreparable and incapable of estimate, and plaintiffs will be without adequate remedy. (18) On the 24th of July, 1893, the common council of the city were of opinion, and expressed that opinion by action at the time, "that the proper sewage of the city required the diversion of the water from Park river," and then passed certain votes, "whose effect will be to cause a large part of such stream which now flows into the natural channel of said river to flow through a sewer to be built in part in and upon said bed of said such stream, and in part upon either bank thereof." (19) On the same day the court of common council "passed a vote proposing said so-called 'improvement,' and referred the same to the board of street commissioners and the said court of common council and the said board of street commissioners prepared a descriptive survey of the improvement proposed, with a careful estimate of the cost of completing the same." (20) In February, 1894, the board of street commissioners gave proper notice of a time and place for hearing all parties interested in said improvement, and the plaintiffs appeared at the proper time and place, and made their claims to said board for the damages which would be caused to them by said improvement, and the consequent diversion of water as aforesaid. (21) At said meeting no agreement was made with the plaintiffs with reference to said damages. The relief prayed for was as follows: "The plaintiffs claim: An injunction restraining the defendant city from diverting into said intercepting sewer, or any part of the same, or elsewhere, the present current and flow of water into said Park river, at and above the said dam of plaintiffs, whether such present current and flow be through drains, pipes, sewers, surface flowage, or otherwise, until an assessment of the damages resulting to plaintiffs from such diversion shall have been assessed or agreed upon, and the payment thereof made or secured, in accordance with the provisions of an act of the general assembly entitled 'An Act Granting Control of Park River to the City of Hartford,' approved March 22, 1882."

The first sixteen paragraphs of the first count were made part of the second count, and the remainder of said second count, with the relief prayed for, was as follows: "(2) The defendant threatens to divert from said stream of water, and from the plaintiffs' use thereof, nearly one half of its flow and current, without any compensation whatsoever to the plaintiffs for their damages directly resulting from said so-called 'improvement.' (3) The diversion of said water, as aforesaid, by the defendant, will cause an irreparable damage to the plaintiffs, and damages incapable of estimate. (4) The defendant has never compensated nor paid in any way the plaintiffs for the accumulation of the water of Tumbledown Brook Reservoir, as described in the eighth paragraph of the first count, nor have they attempted to agree with the plaintiffs as to the amount of said damages. (5) Until the plaintiffs are deprived of the use of said water, which is now returned to them as hereinbefore set out, they suffer no substantial damage; but when said water is carried past the plaintiffs' dam, as proposed by the construction and use of said intercepting sewer, as aforesaid, the same will be of great and irreparable damage to them. (6) For the accumulation of the waters of the stream and its tributary springs and brooks, described in paragraphs 6 and 7 of the first count, no compensation has ever been made to the plaintiffs on their predecessors in the ownership of the mill privilege aforesaid. (7) The storage capacity of said reservoirs is as follows: No. 1, 145,000,000 gallons; No. 2, 284,000,000 gallons; No. 3, 146,000,000 gallons; No. 4, 601,000,000 gallons; No. 5, 94,000,000 gallons; No. 6, 800,000,000 gallons. No. 6 is Tumbledown Brook Reservoir. The average daily consumption of said water by the defendant's water department is about 7,000,000 gallons. The plaintiffs amend the prayer for relief by making the same as it now stands paragraph 1 of plaintiffs' claims, and adding thereafter the following: (2) An injunction restraining the defendant city from diverting into said intercepting sewer, or any part of the same, or elsewhere, the present current and flow of water of the said Park river at and above said dam of the plaintiffs, whether such present current and flow be through drains, pipes, sewers, surface flowage, or otherwise, until the injury aforesaid done and to be done to the plaintiffs is compensated and paid for. (3) Such other and further relief as may to equity pertain."

After the complaint as thus amended was filed, it was further amended, by way of more specific statement, as follows: "The plaintiffs herewith amend the complaint by making more specific statement, as follows: (1) At the end of paragraph 19 add the following: The action and opinion of said court of common council referred to in paragraphs 18 and 19 were expressed by certain votes, copies of which, with the subject-matter and the correct date thereof, appear in the annexed journals of the board of common council and the board of aldermen of said court, which are marked Exhibit 'C' and 'D,' respectively, at pages 185-217, inclusive, and 251 of Exhibit C, and pages 222, 336, 337, 446, and 461 of Exhibit D. The plans, maps, and surveys referred to at page 217 of Exhibit C are made a part hereof by reference, the same being in the possession of the defendant, and of such a character that the plaintiffs are unable to file the same. The report of the committee with the resolution therein submitted, a copy of which appears at pages 336 and 337 in said Exhibit D, is still pending in said court of common council. (2) At the end of paragraph 20 add the following: The action of said street board referred to in this paragraph was pursuant to a vote of said court of common council, a copy of which, with the subject-matter and the correct date thereof, appears in said Exhibit C, at pages 479-481, inclusive. A copy of the publication of the resolution therein mentioned, so far as there was any publication thereof, is the plaintiffs' Exhibit B. A copy of the publication of the notice given by said street board, and referred to in this paragraph with the correct date of such publication, is hereto annexed, and marked 'Exhibit E.'

Exhibit C shows, in substance, that the city, in July, 1898, resolved to construct the intercepting sewer complained of, in order to remove what is called in said exhibit C the "Park river sewage nuisance," and also as "an improvement to the city's sewerage system in general." Exhibit D shows, in substance, that in July, 1893, the common council appointed a committee to ascertain and report the probable cost of extinguishing the flowage rights of the plaintiffs, and of acquiring their entire mill property; that in November of that year said committee made a report, and asked for further power in the premises. This report was eventually tabled by the board of aldermen, in March, 1894, and so remains. Exhibit E is as follows: "Board of Street Commissioners, Hartford, Conn., March 19, 1896. This board will meet Monday evening, March 19, 1896, at 7:30 o'clock, to hear all parties interested in the matter of damages for the right of way for the proposed system of intercepting sewers and branches thereof. Parties interested are invited to be present. Charles H. Northam, President."

So far as it is deemed necessary to set out the demurrers, they are as follows: To the first count. "The defendants demur to the first count of the plaintiffs' complaint, for the following reasons: None of the votes or resolutions passed by the court of common council of the city of Hartford, referred to in paragraphs 18 and 19, or any paragraph of the first count, as amended, or in plaintiffs' specific statement, have the effect, or, as matter of law, contain any vote or determination of the common council, to divert any part of the Park river, or to take the waters of said river out from its stream, or any part thereof, or cause it to flow through a sewer or other aqueduct built in or upon the bed of such stream, or laid in the earth in or near the banks thereof. It does not appear from the first count, or any amendment thereof, that, by virtue of any of said votes or resolutions, the city of Hartford took any action under the act of March 22, 1882, referred to in said count." "Because it appears from the first count, as amended, that the notice or notices referred to in paragraphs 19 and 20 of same, as amended by specific statement, or any paragraph of said count, and the action of any of the board of street commissioners and of the common council of the city of Hartford, were each and all of them notices or action in relation to the construction of sewers under the ordinary regulations prescribed by law relating to the construction of sewers in accordance with the charter of the city, and were not either notices or action for any proceeding under the act of March 22, 1882, and were not part of any proceedings to divert the waters of Park river from the stream, or to carry said waters in any sewer laid in its bed near either of its banks." "Because it does not appear from any averments in the first count contained that the special act of March 22, 1882, has any application to the building of the intercepting sewer described in the first count." To the second count: "The defendant also demurs to second count of amended complaint, for the following reasons: It appears from the second count, and from various paragraphs thereof, and especially from paragraph 10, that the defendant is not proposing to divert Park river, nor any streams of water which flow into the same, but is proposing merely to keep sewage out of Park river, to turn sewage or sewage water from certain sewers into an intercepting sewer, and take said sewage into the Connecticut river." "It appears from the second count, and especially from paragraph 10 of original complaint, now made part of second count, that the acts of the defendant complained of are done in the course of the construction of a certain intercepting sewer by the city of Hartford, and the proposed use of the same in order to turn sewage into the Connecticut river; and there are no averments in the second count which tend to show that such construction of a sewer or diversion of sewage on the part of the defendant is unlawful." The defendant demurs to the relief demanded in second count of complaint, because, upon the allegations of the second count, the plaintiffs are not entitled to the relief by way of injunction as therein sought." "The defendant demurs to the entire complaint as amended, for the following reasons: Because the special act of March 22, 1882, and found in Special Acts of 1882 (page 419), is merely a premissive act, authorizing the city of Hartford to do certain things named therein, but not imposing upon the city of Hartford any obligation to take action under the same, and because said act has no application to the building of said intercepting sewer, or to any damages arising therefrom." "Because the city of Hartford has full right, under the laws of the state, to abandon all action under the act of March 22, 1882, and also to resort to another method of drainage, and an injunction ought not to issue in order to restrain it from performing its duty in the premises." "Because, under the charter of the city, its court or common council is vested with full powers to pass ordinances for laying out and constructing and altering public sewers, through the highways, streets, including turnpike roads, alleys, and public grounds within the city, and also through the private inclosures within the same. And, further, by said charter it is made the duty of the board of street commissioners of the city of Hartford to cause the prompt completion of all necessary repairs of streets, highways, sewers, and public works, within the limits of the streets, highways, and thoroughfares of the city, other than public buildings." "Because it appears from the complaint that the defendant city is constructing said intercepting sewer under its police power, in the discharge of a governmental duty, in order to promote and preserve the public health." "Because it appears from the complaint that the object of the same is to compel the defendant city to take action under the act of March 22, 1882, when no obligation rests upon the city to take such action, and, if an injunction should issue, the city would be restrained from making use of a sewer which is constructed in order to promote and preserve the public health." "Because the construction and use of said intercepting sewer is a public work of great importance, and of great necessity to the inhabitants of the city, as appears from the complaint, and especially from the 10th, 11th, and 18th paragraphs thereof; and the city will not be restrained by an injunction from using a public work, in order to force the city to pay damages for diversion of sewage water." "Because it appears from the complaint that all the acts on the part of the defendant complained of are being done by the city of Hartford, in the construction and management of its own system of sewers, and because polluted sewage water, referred to in the complaint, is a public nuisance, and, by law, the city has full right to abate a public nuisance without the payment of damages." "Because the plaintiffs have adequate remedy at law, by proper action against the city, if any of their rights to water, or to the flow of water into the Park river, shall be taken or injured by the city in consequence of the construction of said intercepting sewer."

Although the record in this case is somewhat voluminous, the facts decisive of it lie in narrow compass, and may be briefly stated as follows: The plaintiffs are the owners of a valuable water privilege and mill property on Park river. Prior to the acts complained of, the city of Hartford had constructed a system of reservoirs, at great expense, to supply itself and its inhabitants with water for domestic and other purposes. This water supply is all taken above the plaintiffs' dam, from brooks, streams, and springs which are tributary to Park river, to the entire current and flow of which river, including the water so taken by the city, the plaintiffs are exclusively entitled at their mills. The water so taken by the city is from one third to one half the volume of said river. This water is carried to a distributing reservoir, and thence, by leading pipes, to the city, where it is sold and distributed to the citizens through service pipes for use, and, after such use, is returned in great part to Park river, through the sewerage system of the city. This has been done ever since the city began to use such water supply, and, by reason of such return, the plaintiffs thus far have suffered no substantial damage from the use of said water by the city. The city now proposes to divert all the water thus flowing through its sewerage system, as aforesaid, into Park river, above the plaintiffs' mills, into a great intercepting sewer, which it is engaged in constructing, and, by means of such sewer, to carry such water directly into the Connecticut river. This, if done, will divert and take away from the plaintiffs' water privilege from one third to one half of the volume of Park river, as it has been accustomed to flow there, and will very greatly damage the plaintiffs. It further appears that under the act of 1882, referred to in the complaint, authority was given to the city to do the things set forth in said act with reference to "any stream, or part of a stream, natural or artificial, running in or through said city;" and also that the city took such action with reference to purchasing or condemning the property of the plaintiffs, and appropriating Park river, under the act of 1882, as is set forth in the complaint and the exhibits which are made a part of it. It further appears that, in the opinion of the city authorities, the sewage and waste water thus returned to Park river created a nuisance, which ought to be abated in some other way; and that said authorities finally determined to abate such nuisance by building the intercepting sewer, and, through it, diverting said waste water and sewage into the Connecticut river.

These are the main controlling facts in the case, and the question is whether, upon them, the plaintiffs are entitled to the precise relief which they now seek. If the complaint could be regarded as one brought simply to enjoin the city from taking its water supply, or any part of it, from the tributaries of Park river, the case thus presented would be a very different one from the present case; but it cannot be so regarded. The complaint is not brought to have the city enjoined from diverting the water of Park river or its tributaries into the reservoirs and distributing pipes of the city, or from using the water so diverted, but it is brought to restrain the city from diverting its sewage into the intercepting sewer; and this is the very gist of the complaint. The allegations of the complaint are, in effect, that this sewage has heretofore been permitted to flow into Park river; that it is available for use at the plaintiffs' mills; that the city now intends to divert it into the intercepting sewer, past the plaintiffs' mills; that this will greatly lessen the flow of the river, to the plaintiffs' damage; that the city has no right to thus divert its sewage from Park river, and should be enjoined from doing so until it has paid or satisfied the plaintiffs' damages. It is true the complaint may be fairly said to allege, in effect, that the city gets its water supply from waters which belong to the plaintiffs, and that it has no right, as against the plaintiffs, to take and use such water as it does. But the complaint does not ask to have such taking and use enjoined against. It only asks to have the city enjoined from disposing of that water after it has become sewage.

Now, it is quite clear that the city either has, or it has not, the right, as against the plaintiffs, to take and use the water which constitutes its supply, as set forth in the complaint; and in either case we think it is equally clear that the city has the right, as against the plaintiffs, to dispose of that water after it enters the sewerage system as sewage, under its charter, as it sees fit. In other words, the plaintiffs may or may not have the right to have the whole or a part of the water supply of the city returned as water to Park river; but in either case they have no right to have it so returned after it has become sewage, or to have it returned through the sewerage system of the city, which are in effect the rights claimed in the present case. If the city has the right, as against the plaintiffs, to take and use the water in its reservoirs, then, clearly, it has the further right, as against them, either before or after it is used, to dispose of it under its charter as it sees fit. If, on the other hand, it has no right, as against the plaintiffs, to take or use the waters in its reservoirs, which is, we think, the case stated in the complaint, this fact of itself does not give the plaintiffs a right to control the disposition of such water after it has entered the sewerage system, and become sewage. That control still remains with the city, and ought to remain with it.

As the court is bound to take judicial notice of the city charter (Gen. Stat. § 1087), we know that full control over its sewerage system, and over the disposal of sewage, is conferred upon the city; and there is nothing in the entire record which shows any loss of such control, or which shows that the plaintiffs have any rights which the city is bound to consider in dealing with its sewer system, or in dealing with the disposal of sewage. In this view of the case, it makes no difference whether the sewage is or is not injurious to health, or whether its open flow has or has not otherwise become a nuisance. In either case the city still has, and ought to have, full control over it, and the pipes, drains, and sewers through which it flows, or can be made to flow. If the city wrongfully takes and uses the plaintiffs' water, the remedy for such a wrong is ample, either by an action at law for damages, or, in a proper case in equity, by injunction; but where, as in this case, the plaintiffs apparently condone the wrongful taking and using of the water, on condition that it shall be allowed to come back to them in the form of sewage through the city sewers, and assert a right to sewage as such, and to have it flow through the sewers as it has been accustomed to flow, they cannot have the remedy which they now seek, simply because they have not shown that they possess any such right. The complaint clearly shows that it is the sewage of the city, and not the waters of Park river or its tributaries in any proper sense, which the city is about to turn into the intercepting sewer; and it is this precise diversion, and nothing else, which the plaintiffs seek to have enjoined. For the reasons given, we are of opinion that they are not entitled to the injunction.

In this view of the case, the question whether the city, in what it has done or intends to do, as alleged in the complaint, is or is not acting under the act of 1882—a question much discussed upon the argument—becomes of secondary importance. We think, however, that the record clearly shows that the city is not acting in this matter under the authority conferred by the act of 1882, but under the provisions of its charter, without regard to that act. Furthermore, we think that what the city has done, and what it intends to do, as alleged upon the record, do not constitute a taking or appropriation of Park river, or any part of its bed or banks, or of any part of its waters, within the meaning of the act of 1882; and that its charter gives it full power to do what it has done and intends to do, as these matters are alleged in the complaint.

The Superior Court is advised that the complaint is insufficient.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

EAGLE MANUFACTURING COMPANY
v.

City of DAVENPORT, Appt.

Frances W. FRENCH

v.

SAME, Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. The lien of an assessment for a street improvement attaches from the time when labor is first done or material furnished by the contractor in making the improvement after the contract is made, and not from the time of adopting a resolution for doing the work or the letting of the contract therefor under acts 23d Gen. Assem. chap. 14, § 12, providing that the assessment shall be a lien from the commencement of the work.

2. The sale of a narrow strip from the front of property for the sole purpose of avoiding a street-improvement assessment after the city has entered into a contract for the improvement but before the lien of the assessment attaches is void for the purpose of the assessment.

3. Land purchased after the execution of a contract for a street improvement with the knowledge, actual or constructive, on the part of the purchaser, that a strip of land 2 feet wide between the land purchased and the street to be improved had previously been sold by his grantor for the sole purpose of avoiding the assessment, is liable for such assessment although the purchase was made for a lawful purpose.

NOTE.—The effect of selling a narrow strip abutting on a street in order to avoid a street assessment upon the remaining property is a question 38 L. R. A.

4. The owner of land abutting on a street for the improvement of which a contract has been entered into may lawfully sell a strip from the front of his property of less width than the 150 feet which would otherwise be liable for the assessment, and thereby avoid the assessment if such sale is in good faith for legitimate purposes and not merely a subterfuge to defeat the assessment.

Amery v. Keokuk, 72 Iowa, 701.

On petition for rehearing.

Our statute, in both affirmative and negative phrase, and in language which cannot be misunderstood, confines the lien of the tax to lots or lands bounding or abutting on such street or streets.

This decision abrogates that very important part of the statute, and holds that the lien of the tax may be extended to land which is not abutting, and which was not abutting at the time the lien of the tax took effect.

It not only does that, but it also overrules a former decision of this court.

Amery v. Keokuk, 72 Iowa, 701.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the year 1886, George H. French became the owner of block numbered 123 in Le Clair's Ninth Addition to the city of Davenport. He died testate in the year 1888, and Frances W. French became the executrix of his will. That gave to her a life estate in the property described, and by subsequent conveyances she became its owner in fee simple. On the 7th day of January of the year 1891, the paving committee of the defendant presented to its city council a report which recommended that designated portions of certain streets which were specified be paved during that year. The report was adopted, and resolutions which provided for paving according to the recommendations of the committee were also adopted on the same day. On the 26th day of the same month, after due notice, contracts for the paving contemplated by the resolutions were awarded. On the 2d day of May, 1891, a resolution was adopted which provided for the issuing of paving bonds on each of the contracts, and bonds to the amount of $71,500 were issued in accordance with that resolution. A part of the paving provided for by the resolutions and contracts to which we have referred was of that portion of Front street which is adjacent to the block specified. That has the general outline of a truncated triangle. The west side is 216.6 feet in length; the north side, bounded by Fourth street, is 305.5 in length; and the south-east side is 365.4 feet in length. In addition, there is a side at the east end 14.1 feet in length. The block was divided into two parts by a railway side track, which entered the block on the north boundary line 58 feet west of the east end, and thence extended in a south-westerly direction on a line slightly curved, crossing the west boundary line 62.5 feet north of the southwest corner. On the 7th day of April, 1891, Mrs. French conveyed to E. C. Westwood a part of the block next to Front street, 2 feet in width, and extending the entire length of the block on that street. On the 22d day of the same month she conveyed to the Eagle Manufacturing Company all of the remainder of the block, which was between the part conveyed to Westwood and a line parallel with, and 6 feet south of, the railway track. The outline of the block, the adjacent streets, the location of the side track, and the parts conveyed, are shown by the following plat:

The paving was completed in accordance with the contracts in the latter part of the year 1891. On the 4th day of November of that year the city engineer presented to the city council a report and plat which showed the amount of paving tax to be assessed on the lots and land abutting on the streets where paving had been done. Notice to all persons having objections to the plat was published, and in due time the Eagle Manufacturing Company and Mrs. French filed objections to the assessment of the paving tax on the portions of the block in question which they then owned. The substance of the objections was that the objectors did not own, and had not since the paving was ordered, or since work thereon had been commenced, owned any part of the block which fronted or abutted on the part of Front street, which had been paved. The objections were overruled, and the tax for paving the part of that street upon which the block abutted was assessed upon the entire block at the rate of $3,537.56 for each front foot. No attention was paid to the depth of the block. These actions were brought to enjoin the enforcement of the tax against the portions of the block now owned by the plaintiffs. The district court rendered a decree in each case granting the relief asked.

1. It will be observed that no part of the block abuts on Front Street, excepting the strip which was conveyed to Westwood; and we are required to determine whether the conveyance to him, and the subsequent one to the Eagle Manufacturing Company, were effective to cut off the right which the defendant would have had, if they had not been made, to assess the tax against that portion of the entire block within 150 feet of Front street. The paving was done under an ordinance of the defendant, not set out, but which was similar to chapter 14 of the Acts of the 28d General Assembly; hence the provision of that act will be treated as applicable and controlling. The act provides for the paving and curbing of streets, and for the assessment of the cost thereof "upon the property fronting or abutting on said improvement." Section 12 contains the following: "Said assessment, with interest accruing thereon, shall be a lien upon the property abutting upon the street or streets upon which any said improvement is made, or upon such improvement from the commencement of the work, and shall remain a lien until fully paid, and shall have precedence over all other liens except ordinary taxes, and shall not be divested by any judicial sale, provided that such lien shall be limited to the lots or lands bounding or abutting on such street or streets, or on such improvement and not exceeding in depth therefrom 160 feet." It is important to determine the time when the lien of the assessment in question must be regarded as having attached to the property subject to it. It is contended on the part of the appellant that it attached when the resolution ordering the paving to be done was adopted, or at the latest when the contract for it was entered into. It is the general rule that taxes are not liens upon property, unless made so by statute, or by virtue of authority conferred by statute. Jaffray v. Anderson, 66 Iowa, 718; Cooley, Taxn. 445 et seq. And that is true of special assessments made on account of the improvement of streets. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 659; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 76.

Where a tax or special assessment is made a lien, the time at which the lien attaches must be ascertained from the statute or other authority which provides for it, and in this case it attached at "the commencement of the work." Is the adoption of a resolution directing that certain paving be done, or the letting of the contract therefor, or both, with the various preliminary steps which lead to them, the commencement of work, within the meaning of the statute? It is undoubtedly true that there are many good reasons, independent of the statute, for making the lien of the assessment commence with the letting of the contract for making an improvement, if not from the adoption of the resolution ordering it; and it is also true that legislative intent, if properly expressed, is controlling. We must gather that intent in this case from the statute itself. Section 2 of the statute refers to paving and curbing of streets and the construction of sewers, and authorizes contracts "either for the entire work in one contract or parts thereof in separate and specified sections." Section 3 provides for a notice to bidders, which shall state as nearly as practicable "the extent of the work, the kind of materials to be furnished," and "when the work shall be done." Section 5 makes it the duty of the city engineer "to furnish proper grades and lines, and see that the work is done in accordance with the ordinances and regulations of the city, with respect to said grades and lines." Section 6 provides for the issue of bonds "from time to time as the work progresses." Section 9 provides for the payment, on requisition, of money received from the sale of the bonds, upon proof "that work has been done or materials furnished to the amount of said requisition." In each of these cases the word "work" is used to designate labor, or the product of labor and material combined, required to make the improvement as separate and distinct from the acts of the agents of the city preliminary to, and which terminate in, the formal execution of the contract. The word is next found in that part of § 12 which we have set out, and we are of the opinion that it is there used as in preceding sections to designate that which is required of the contractor to perform his part of the agreement. It follows that the lien of the assessment for an improvement made under the act in question attaches from the time when labor is first done or material is first furnished by the contractor in the making of the improvement after the contract is made. The record submitted to us fails to show when the work in question was commenced. A resolution adopted by the city council of the defendant on the 2d day of May, 1891, to authorize the issue of bonds, recites that "work has been commenced and is progressing" under the contracts. But, if that be treated as competent evidence to show the commencement of the work, it does not show that it was commenced before the deeds of Mrs. French to Westwood and to the Eagle Manufacturing Company were executed, and there is evidence on the part of the plaintiffs that nothing had been done under the contract for paving the part of Front street in question when the last of the two deeds was delivered. We therefore conclude that the work is not shown to have been commenced, within the meaning of the statute, and that the lien of the assessment in controversy is not shown to have attached, when the deeds of Mrs. French took effect.

2. It is insisted, however, that the deeds were executed for the purpose of evading the lien of the assessment, and that, as against the defendant, they are fraudulent and void. The avowed purpose of the deed to Westwood was to defeat the assessment on all of the block excepting the part conveyed to him. Mrs. French was represented, in all of the transactions which ended in the giving the deeds, by her son, Judge French. He attempted to compromise the claim of the defendant for the assessment which would be made if the improvement should be completed, on the basis of paying according to the area of the block, but his offer was rejected. He then went to Chicago with a deed executed by Mrs. French for the Westwood strip (excepting that a blank was left for the name of the grantee), was introduced to Westwood, who was a practising lawyer of Chicago, and said: "Can I transfer you 2 feet of a block over in Davenport?" and Westwood answered, "What in the world will I do with it?" French replied: "I know what you can do with it. I will sell you a 2-foot strip, and I will personally take an option on that property. I will lease it for a year, and take an option to lease it for another year; and I want an option to buy it, and I will pay you $41 for it now. That is what you can do with the property." Westwood said: "What will I have to pay?" French answered: "You will have to pay $25." Westwood then asked for an explanation, and French told him the condition of the lot, and what the defendant was proposing to do. Westwood then consented to take the deed, and was paid $41, of which $25 were returned. It thus appears that Westwood was paid $16 to accept the deed. There is not now, and never has been, any attempt to conceal the fact that the conveyance to Westwood was intended to defeat the assessment in question upon all of the block not conveyed to him. To justify the conveyance, it is said that the entire block was worth but about $3,000; that the assessment in question amounts to $1,292.62; that the paving of Fourth street on the north side of the block has been agitated, and that, if it is done, the assessment therefor on the block would be $2,090; and that the two assessments would amount to more than the entire value of the block. The case thus suggested would be one of much hardship, which might well be provided against by legislative enactment. But the question we are required to determine is whether the conveyance to Westwood should operate to relieve the portions of the block not conveyed to him from the assessment actually made. The transaction was not designed to be of any benefit to the grantor, excepting as it might enable her to evade the payment of a valid assessment. The grantee had no use or desire for the strip conveyed to him, and had to be paid money to induce him to accept it. The strip, considered by itself, had little or no practical value. It is said it is valuable to sell to the owner of the adjoining part of the block, or to the defendant, to add to the street, or to erect thereon bill boards for advertising purposes. It is plain, however, that Westwood did not accept it on account of its intrinsic value, but for the money paid him, and for what he might receive in addition if it should be taken from him under the option reserved. The entire transaction on the part of the grantor, from its inception to its close, was for the sole purpose of defeating the collection of a valid claim which it was known would accrue. The defendant had incurred an obligation by its contract for the paving when all of the block within 150 feet of the street appeared to be liable for its proper share of the cost of the improvement; and, while no lien upon the block was then created, the conveyance to Westwood, if given effect, would operate as a fraud upon the defendant, for the reason that it was not made in good faith, nor was it a legitimate transaction. In law, it was fraudulent, and a court of equity will not interpose to give it effect; and the defendant, for the purposes of the assessment in question, may treat it as void. See Dougherty v. Miller, 86 Cal. 83.

3. We are next required to consider the effect of the conveyance to the Eagle Manufacturing Company. It was not a part of the transaction with Westwood, although it may have resulted in part from that transaction, and it may have been designed in part to protect the remainder of the block from assessment. But the company was at the time trying to acquire more property, and bought that adjacent to what it owned, whenever offered, on the best terms it could obtain. It had leased the part of the block north of the side track, and used it for a lumber yard. The part south of the side track not conveyed to Westwood was not accessible from a street, excepting at one point on Fourth street. Judge French proposed to sell it to the company, and accepted therefor its offer of $400. In view of its situation, that price does not appear to have been an unreasonable one for the grantor to accept. The part sold was a substantial portion of the block, large enough to be used for ordinary business purposes. It was leased by the company to a lessee which erected thereon a shed in the summer of the year 1891, which it has since used as a storehouse. It is not unlawful for a person to buy and sell property with reference to taxes which may be levied upon it. Liability for taxes is always an element affecting the value of taxable property which is considered by the careful investor. Nor is it unlawful for a person to so use property, or to divide it in such a manner, as to reduce the burden of his taxes upon it, provided the use or division be in good faith, for legitimate purposes, and not merely a subterfuge to defeat a proper and valid assessment. Applying these rules to the conveyance to the company, we conclude that the evidence fails to show that it was invalid or made for an illegal purpose, but that it was a reasonable and proper business transaction.

4. The effect of the conveyance remains to be determined. We have seen that the conveyance to Westwood was in law fraudulent, and of no effect as against the assessment in question. The company was represented in the purchase it made by its president, George W. French. He knew that the paving had been ordered. He states that he knew of the conveyance to Westwood when the purchase was made, but that he did not inquire why the conveyance had been made. He does not deny that he knew the object it was designed to accomplish. He and Judge French were brothers. They owned two thirds of the capital stock of the company, both were officers of it, and they occupied the same office. They conferred together in regard to important matters which pertained to their mother's business. The knowledge of George W. French, in his mind when he acted for the company in making the purchase, must be held to be the knowledge of the company. We are satisfied that he knew why the Westwood conveyance had been made when he acted for his company, or, if he did not have actual knowledge of it, that the facts which he knew would have caused a man of reasonable prudence to make inquiries which would have disclosed the purpose of the conveyance. Therefore the company purchased the portion of the block which it now owns with constructive, if not actual, knowledge of the fact that it was subject to the assessment in question for the reason that the conveyance to Westwood was, in law, fraudulent, as against the defendant. Hence the part of the block acquired by the company is liable, with the strip conveyed to Westwood, for the assessment. But, since the conveyance to the company was for a lawful purpose, it had the effect to relieve the portion of the block northwest of it from that assessment. See Amery v. Keokuk, 72 Iowa, 704.

The decree of the District Court in favor of the Eagle Manufacturing Company is reversed, and the decree in favor of Frances W. French is affirmed.

Having instructed Theodore not to receive the deposit there could be no receipt of it that would render the defendant criminally liable unless he were personally present at the time of such receipt and consented thereto.

Kinne, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The indictment charges the defendant with the crime of fraudulent banking, committed as follows: "The said Henry Eifert, on the 15th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three, in the county aforesaid, being then and there engaged in the banking business, under the name and style of Bank of Tripoli, and then and there being insolvent, and well knowing himself to be insolvent, did knowingly accept and receive from C. H. Mohling a deposit in his banking and deposit business, the sum of one hundred dollars, consisting of gold and silver money, national bank bills, United States treasury notes and currency, and other notes, bills, and drafts circulating as money and currency, the particular description to the grand jury unknown, to the amount and of the value of one hundred dollars, contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided." The sufficiency of this indictment was questioned by a demurrer, which was overruled, and an exception taken. It is urged that it is defective, in that it does not state whom the money alleged to have been deposited belonged to, or who was the owner of it, or entitled to its possession; that it fails to aver who, if any one, was defrauded. Section 1 of the act against fraudulent banking prohibits any bank, banking house, or party engaged in banking or deposit business from accepting or receiving on deposit any money when such banking house or deposit office, firm, or party is insolvent. Acts 18th Gen. Assem. chap. 153, § 1. Section 2 is as follows: "If any such bank, banking house, exchange broker, or deposit office, firm, company, or corporation, or party, shall receive or accept on deposit any such deposits as aforesaid when insolvent, any officer, director, cashier, manager, member, party, or managing party thereof, knowing of such insolvency, who shall knowingly receive or accept, be accessory or permit or connive at, the receiving or accepting on deposit therein, or thereby, any such deposits as aforesaid, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison for a term not to exceed ten years, or by imprisonment in the county jail not to exceed one year or both fine and imprisonment, the fine not to exceed $10,000." Acts 18th Gen. Assem. chap. 153, § 2. In support of the contention that the indictment is defective because it fails to state the name of the injured party, counsel rely upon cases decided by this court where it was held that the indictment, in certain cases, must set out the name of the person injured, or attempted to be injured. We do not think it is necessary to discuss these cases. Let it be conceded that the indictment in this case must show who the injured party is, and we think it must be held to conform to the law in that respect. It occurs to us that one reading this indictment would at once understand that the charge was that the money belonged to the person making the deposit; that he was the owner. If the act complained of is stated with such a degree of certainty, in ordinary and concise language, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended to be charged, it is sufficient. Code, § 4305. Can there be any doubt that such a person, on reading this indictment, would understand that it charged that the defendant, knowing that he was insolvent, did knowingly receive a deposit of money from Mohling, and that it was his money which was thus deposited? We think not. Now, one may own money and may send it by someone to be deposited in a bank but we should not speak of the mere carrier of the money as a depositor, but the one for whom it was in fact taken to the bank would be the depositor. The owners of money deposited in a bank are the depositors of that bank; that is, they are the people, who made the deposit. We think that, read in the light of the requirements of our statute, the indictment, to the common understanding, as fairly charges that Mohling was the injured party as if it had in express terms stated that he owned the money which he deposited.

2. It is strenuously urged that the court erred in permitting certain questions to be asked the defendant on cross examination. It appeared from the direct examination that the defendant undertook to state his connection, or rather want of connection, with the making of the alleged deposit. He testified that he left town that morning early and went to Waverly. That, prior to going, he had a conversation with his son about receiving deposits on that day; that he told him that he was going to Waverly to look the ground over, and that, if things did not look favorable, he would send his son a telephone message, through a party who was with him, not to receive any more deposits, and to stop doing business; that he sent the message to his son to stop doing business, and not to receive any more deposits. On cross-examination, over the defendant's objection, he was required to testify when he returned from Waverly to Tripoli, and how long he remained in Tripoli, and as to whether he found any deposits had been made after 2 o'clock that day. The law undoubtedly is that the cross-examination must be confined to the matters about which the direct testimony is given. It is contended that on cross-examination the state was limited to what the defendant did at Waverly. We do not think so. The defendant was put upon the stand to show that Mohling's deposit was received without his knowledge and against his instructions, and to show such facts he testified as we have stated. The defendant having undertaken to explain his connection, or want of connection with this deposit, and to show that it was received without his knowledge and against his will, any line of cross-examination which tended to contradict his testimony in chief, or which more fully disclosed his connection with this deposit, was proper. There was no error in the rulings in this respect. Even if the cross examination was improper, the defendant waived any error connected therewith, because, in the further progress of the trial, he testified to the same facts without objection. State v. Wickliff, 95 Iowa, 386; Strong v. Iowa C. R. Co. 94 Iowa, 380; Bailey v. Bailey, 94 Iowa, 598.

3. The eighth paragraph of the court's charge reads: "In determining whether the defendant received or accepted the alleged deposit of C. H. Mohling, you are instructed that it is not necessary that the evidence should show or that you should find that the defendant in person received such deposit, nor that he was personally present when it was received from said Mohling, if received at all; it is enough if it was received by the cashier or agent of defendant under his authority. But you are further instructed that even though the defendant instructed Theodore Elfert to close the bank, and refused to receive or accept further deposits, and that after such instructions to so refuse deposits, the said Theodore Elfert did accept and receive from said Mohling the deposit in question, if so you find from the evidence, still if the defendant, with knowledge thereof, accepted and retained as a deposit the amount so received from said Mohling from said Theodore Elfert, and placed among and treated it as a part of the funds or assets of the bank, having full knowledge from what source and under what circumstances and by whom it was received, he will be deemed to have knowingly accepted such sum as a deposit. If, however, such deposit was so received without his authority, and was not accepted by him, if at all, with full knowledge of the manner and circumstances of its being deposited, if at all, then he will not be deemed to have knowingly received or accepted such deposit." Exception is taken to so much of this instruction as relates to the action of the defendant in knowingly accepting and retaining the deposit, after full knowledge from whom and under what circumstances it had been made. The argument of defendant is that when the deposit was received and accepted by defendant's son and entered upon the books of the bank and upon the depositor's book the whole transaction was concluded. Now, the facts appear to be that the son had for a long time been in the bank, assisting his father; that the father was in the city of Waverly when the son, who had charge of the bank, received this deposit; that it was received on the afternoon of August 15, 1893, and several hours after the son had received a telephone message from his father to close the bank and to take no more deposits. That the father returned to Tripoli the same evening, and then learned that this deposit had been received, contrary to his orders; that said money was put into the assets of the bank, and that defendant never paid or tendered it back to Mohling. Now, when did defendant "knowingly accept and receive" this money as charged in the indictment? We think he must be said to have done so when he returned home, and first knew of the fact of its receipt, if he had given no directions to stop business and refuse deposits, then it might be said that he should be concluded by the transaction when the money was in fact received by his son, who had authority to act for him. But, having expressly directed the son to cease business and refuse deposits, he had no reason to suspect or believe that his orders would not be obeyed. It cannot therefore be said that he knowingly received and accepted the deposit when it was handed to his son, and by him accepted without the father's knowledge and against his express directions. When, however, he arrived home that evening, he became acquainted with all the facts. He then knew that this deposit had been accepted by the son after he had directed him to take no more deposits; he knew who made the deposit; he knew he was then insolvent, and that he had been before the son had received the deposit; and, knowing all the facts, he did not repudiate the transaction but retained and accepted the money, at the same time knowing that his bank would never open again. It seems to us that when defendant after full knowledge of all the facts on the evening of his return failed to repudiate the act of his son, and took no steps looking to a return of the deposit to Mohling, he then knowingly received and accepted the deposit. It must be borne in mind that this is not a civil action for damages for the recovery of the money deposited. It may be that in such a case recovery could be had of the defendant, notwithstanding the deposit was received by his agent contrary to his directions. But the gist of the offense charged in the prosecution is in knowingly receiving and accepting a deposit, knowing that he was then insolvent. Surely one whose agent, without his knowledge or authority, and in disobedience of his express instructions, receives and accepts for his principal money as a deposit, will not by such act be rendered liable criminally for knowingly receiving and accepting the money, but it cannot be doubted that after coming in possession of all the facts the principal may so ratify the act theretofore done as to make it binding upon himself and the basis of a criminal liability. If the defendant had, on being acquainted with what had been done, promptly disavowed the act of his son, and returned the deposit to Mohling, he would not have been guilty, as it could not then have been said that he had knowingly received and accepted the deposit. It seems to us that the instruction is correct, and quite as favorable to the defendant as he had a right to expect.

4. Finally, it is said that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. This conclusion is reached by council on the theory that the acts considered in the third division of this opinion, and held by us to justify the instruction complained of, do not, if established, show a violation of the statute. We think the evidence fully sustains the verdict. Indeed, it is difficult to understand, under our view of the law, how the jury could have reached a different conclusion.

A rehearing having been had the following additional opinions were handed down on May 15, 1897:

Given, J.:

A rehearing was granted in this case, that we might, with the aid of further arguments, reconsider the objections urged by appellant to the eighth paragraph of the charge to the jury, or, in other words, that we might review the conclusion announced in the third paragraph of the opinion. We have not at any time doubted the correctness of the opinion in other respects, and therefore limit our present inquiry to this one subject. In said instruction the jury was told, in effect, that it was not necessary that they find that the defendant had in person received the deposit, nor that he was personally present when it was received; that it was enough if it was received by the cashier or agent of the defendant under his authority; that though the defendant instructed his cashier to close the bank, and refused to receive further deposits; and that thereafter the cashier did accept and receive this deposit. "Still, if the defendant, with knowledge thereof, accepted and retained as a deposit the amount so received from said Mohling, by said Theodore Eifert, and placed among and treated it as a part of the funds or assets of the bank, having full knowledge from what source and under what circumstances and by whom it was received, he will be deemed to have knowingly accepted such sum as a deposit."

Appellant's first complaint in his argument on rehearing is that there is no evidence to warrant that part of the instruction to the effect that it was not necessary that the defendant should have received the deposit in person, or have been personally present, nor that it was enough if it was received under his authority. It is true there was no evidence to which this part of the instruction, taken alone, could apply; but it was a correct statement of the law, and aided to make plain that which followed in the instruction. Appellant insists that in what follows in said instruction the court attempts to apply to this criminal charge the principle of ratification. He contends that a criminal act cannot be ratified, and cites in support 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 480, and the cases therein referred to. The instruction does not submit the question of defendant's accepting and receiving the deposit by a ratification of what the cashier had done. It rests the question of accepting and receiving upon whether the defendant retained the deposit, and placed and treated it as part of the assets of the bank, with full knowledge of the circumstances under which it had been received by the cashier. The doctrine of ratification is not invoked to charge the defendant with having accepted and received the deposit as of the time it came into the hands of the cashier. The case was submitted upon the inquiry as to whether the defendant accepted and received the deposit after being informed of the circumstances under which it had come into the hands of the cashier. In the instruction under consideration, the jury was told that if the defendant, with knowledge of the circumstances under which the deposit was received, accepted and retained it as a deposit, and placed it among and treated it as a part of the assets of the bank, "he will be deemed to have knowingly accepted such sum as a deposit." In the former opinion we said: "It seems to us that when defendant, after full knowledge of all the facts, on the evening after his return, failed to repudiate the act of his son, and took no steps looking to the return of the deposit to Mr. Mohling, he then knowingly received and accepted the deposit."

Appellant contends that, if the defendant and his bank were insolvent at the time the money was received, Mr. Mohling could pursue it as a trust fund in the hands of either the defendant or his assignee, and recover it in kind, or its equivalent, if it had been so mixed with other money as to destroy its identity. He cites Wasson v. Hawkins, 59 Fed. Rep. 233, and American Trust & Sav. Bank v. Guader & P. Mfg. Co. 150 Ill. 836. Whether such is the law we need not determine, for, if it be, it would apply with equal force if the deposit had been received by the defendant in person, or by his authority. If it be conceded that Mr. Mohling had the right to pursue that deposit as a trust fund, it does not follow that the defendant did not knowingly receive and accept it. He not only failed to repudiate the act of his son in receiving the deposit, and failed to return it, but, within four days after its receipt, included that money in a general assignment made by him for the benefit of his creditors. We have re-examined the case with care, and reach the conclusion that the former opinion is correct, and it is therefore adhered to.

Robinson, J., dissenting:

The defendant was accused and convicted of the crime of fraudulent banking, in that, when insolvent and knowing that fact, he "did knowingly accept and receive from C. H. Mohling a deposit in his banking and deposit business, the sum of $100." The court properly charged the jury that it was not necessary to constitute the offense charged that the deposit should have been received by the defendant in person, but that it was sufficient if the deposit was received under his authority by his cashier or agent. State v. Cadwell, 79 Iowa, 435. But the court also charged the jury that, if the deposit was received by his agent in violation of his authority, "still if the defendant, with knowledge thereof, accepted and retained as a deposit the amount so received, . . . and placed among and treated it as part of the funds or assets of the bank, . . . he will be deemed to have knowingly accepted such sum as a deposit." It seems to me that this portion of the charge, as applied to undisputed facts in the case, was erroneous, and that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the verdict. The law does not forbid an insolvent banker to retain a deposit properly received, but to accept or receive it; and whether the defendant is guilty does not depend merely upon his having retained the deposit in question, but whether, by his acts, he accepted or received it, within the meaning of chapter 153 of the Acts of the 18th General Assembly, after he knew that it had been received by his agent in violation of his instructions. It is the general rule that, to constitute a crime, there must be a wrongful act, done with a criminal intent, or the intentional doing of an act from which a criminal intent is conclusively presumed. 1 McClain, Crim. L. §§ 112-128; 1 Bishop, Crim. L. §§ 364 et seq. Wrongful acts, which create a civil liability, may fall short of crime, and the inquiry in this case is not whether the facts show that the defendant is civilly liable for the deposit in question, but whether his acts amounted to the accepting or receiving of the deposit, within the meaning of the statute. He is not charged with having permitted or connived at the accepting or receiving of the money.

The evidence shows without conflict the following facts: The defendant went from Tripoli to Waverly, in the morning of August 15, 1893. Before going, he talked with his son Theodore, who was left in charge of the bank, and stated that he was going to Waverly, "to look the ground over," and that, if things did not look very favorable, he would send a telephone message to the son to stop business, and not receive any more deposits. The defendant sent a message to that effect before 2 o'clock of that day. It was received by the son, but he did not obey it, because he thought his father took too gloomy a view of the situation, and received several deposits, including the one in question, after he received the message, and before 4 o'clock, when he closed the bank. The defendant returned at night, and was informed by his son that he had closed the bank, but that he had kept it open until 4 o'clock, and had received deposits, including the one made by Mohling. The defendant was dissatisfied that his order had not been obeyed, but did nothing with the money received. There is no evidence whatever that he placed it among the assets of the bank. It had been received and placed with the funds of the bank by his son. There is no pretense that it had been kept apart from the money previously in the bank, nor that it could have been identified and treated as a special deposit. It is not shown that the defendant took actual possession of it, but it seems to have remained where the son placed it until the assignment for the benefit of creditors was made. The bank was never opened after it was closed by the son, as stated. When he received the deposit of Mohling, the amount was entered in the pass book of the latter, and it is not shown that any other entry was made in any book until after the assignee had taken possession of the bank. The son then asked of the assignee the privilege of posting in the books the work done on the 15th of August. Mohling never made any demand for the return of the money he had deposited, and it does not appear that it was ever suggested to the defendant by any one that the deposit should be refunded before he made the assignment for the benefit of creditors. The entire amount due Mohling, including the deposit in question, was $548.44, and it is shown that, before the assignment was completed, the defendant endeavored to have Mohling commence suit, aided by attachment to recover the amount due him, and represented that, if he would do so, he would obtain all of it. The total amount due Mohling, including the deposit in question, was set out in the schedule of claims attached to the assignment, but the defendant did not prepare the schedule. That was done by his attorney and his son, and he does not appear to have given the fact that the Mohling claim included the deposit in question any thought, but, if he had purposely included it, that fact would not have shown that he had accepted or received the money. That had been done, in violation of his instructions, by his son, and the money so mingled with the funds of the bank that it could not be identified. The unauthorized act of the son was effectual to create between the defendant and Mohling the relation of debtor and creditor (Independent Dist. v. King, 80 Iowa, 500), because it was the right of Mohling, in the absence of actual knowledge of the limitation upon the power of the son, to rely upon the apparent authority with which the defendant had clothed him to receive the deposit. The relation stated having been established, it could not have been changed, and the money given the character of special deposit, without the consent of Mohling. It is not shown that the defendant attached to his assignment an inventory of his assets, and the record is entirely barren of evidence to show that he had any intent in making the assignment to appropriate to his own use any money or other property which belonged to Mohling, or to alter their relation in any manner. The assignee acquired only the right of the defendant in the property assigned. Meyer v. Evans, 68 Iowa, 183; Independent Dist. v. King, 80 Iowa, 501. If Mohling had any special interest in or lien upon the property assigned while it was in the hands of the defendant, that interest or lien could have been enforced against the assignee.

See Bruner v. First Nat. Bank (Tenn.) 84 L. R. A. 532, and notes, 97 Tenn. 540.

It is my opinion that the evidence is sufficient to show a civil liability only; that it wholly fails to show that the defendant accepted or received the deposit in question within the meaning of the statute; and that it does not show any act on his part done with a wrongful intent, or from which a wrongful intent should be presumed. Therefore I think the judgment of the district court should be reversed, and that the defendant should be awarded a new trial.

II. Constitutional and statutory provisions.

III. Effect of recitals and nominal payment.

IV. Stock as bonus to purchasers of bonds.

V. Mere acceptance of shares; surrender; cancellation.

VI. Rights of creditors.

VII. Bona fide purchasers.]

I. General principle involved.

Honesty and good faith require that shares of stock in a corporation must represent an actual investment of capital, else they tend to mislead the public. Since the creditors of a company can hold the shareholders liable only to a limited amount, if at all, after their stock is paid for, the capital paid in constitutes the real foundation of the company's credit. A nominally paid-up capital of $1,000,000 when only $10,000 are actually paid in is a misrepresentation which tends, and is generally intended, to deceive those who deal with the corporation.

The necessity of actual payment of the nominal stock of a corporation is the principle on which various classes of decisions rest. Many cases like that of Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. 45, 23 L. ed. 203, deny the right of a corporation to release or surrender the obligation of a subscriber to pay for his shares.

There are numerous cases also in which the adequacy of the compensation for shares when paid in property is the matter in issue. These proceed on the underlying principle that it is necessary that they should be paid for.

So far as concerns the relations between the corporation and the shareholders themselves when the rights of third parties who deal with the corporation are not involved, there seems to be no reason why any contract fairly entered into between the company and its members in respect to the payment of their subscriptions or distribution of the shares should not be given effect, unless, indeed, such contract improperly discriminates between shareholders themselves and is objected to by some of them. Generally speaking, it is when the creditors of a corporation have interests involved that the contract between the company and its members attempting to dispense with the full and fair payment for the shares will be denied effect. This principle will be seen to be quite given to secure is not paid over at its execution and it does not state that it is given for future advances, if it is given in good faith for a needed amount, and the money is paid over as fast as it can be raised by the mortgagees.

2. Existing creditors of a corporation cannot impeach a transaction by which the corporate stock is increased and issued as a bonus to third persons to induce them to advance money to the corporation on mortgage security so as to avoid the mortgage and treat the advance as a payment for stock.

clearly apparent in nearly all the decisions on the subject as they appear below.

The power of a corporation to issue stock for the purchase of property at anything less than its par value is denied in Gamble v. Queens County Water Co. 123 N. Y. 91, 9 L. R. A. 527, where the statutes expressly provide that the trustees may purchase property and issue stock to the amount of the value thereof in payment therefor. It distinguishes the case of Van Cott v. Van Brunt, 82 N. Y. 535, where a railroad company was allowed to issue stock at less than its par value to pay for the construction of the road on the ground that the statute made no provision there as to its issue of stock for property.

But this matter of the amount of consideration that must be obtained for stock when issued to pay for property and without any purpose of issuing it as a bonus will not be considered further in this note. The question of the fraud of stockholders in taking stock as the compensation for property which they know to be worth less than the stock is often a question of fact. The purpose of the present note is to consider the legality of stock intended as a bonus without going into the questions of actual fraud in issuing stock for property at an overvaluation. The cases involving the latter question are numerous. These cases may be said to start with the assumption that mere bonus stock issued without consideration is to be deemed a fraud upon creditors. Among cases of this class are Gogebic Invest. Co. v. Iron Chief Min. Co. 78 Wis. 427; Re Western of Canada Oil, Land & Works Co. L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 115, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 6, 33 L. T. N. S. 645, 24 Week. Rep. 165.

The distribution among shareholders of shares of stock which had once been fully paid and afterwards acquired by the corporation was sustained in Com. v. Boston & A. R. Co. 142 Mass. 146, and held to be authorized by the statutes.

The principle involved in the question as to the obligation to make actual payments for stock is well illustrated in Winston v. Dorsett Pipe & Paving Co. 129 Ill. 64, 4 L. R. A. 507, where it is held that one who subscribes to stock merely to enable the corporation to obtain a certificate of organization under an agreement with the other subscribers that he shall not be liable on the stock but shall hold it as trustee, and that they will help him dispose of it, is liable on his subscription as between

3. A mortgage by a corporation to secure money advanced to it in good faith cannot be reduced in favor of liens of subsequent creditors because at the time of, and as an inducement to, the advance, the mortgagees received stock of the corporation as a bonus.
4. A lien may be given to a second mortgagee and to a receiver of a corporation for money advanced to pay interest on the first mortgage and taxes, as against attachment creditors of the corporation.
5. Sale of machinery to a corporation with notice that it is in a bad condition financially, and under a guaranty of payment by a third person, does not entitle the seller to a lien for its price.
6. Attachments levied on the property of a mortgagor subsequently to the execution of the mortgage are properly given priority over money afterwards paid over on the security of the mortgage in accordance with the agreement under which it was executed.

CROSS-APPEALS from a decree of the Circuit Court for Kent County in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage on property of himself and the state or the creditors of the corporation, but not on an assessment in a suit by other stock subscribers, where they have not fully paid for their shares. This merely gives effect to the contract of the parties as between themselves without denying the right of creditors to rely on the entire good faith of the subscription list.

In respect to the liability of stockholders in a foreign corporation on account of so-called bonus stock for nonpayment of the whole or part of the par value of the stock, it is held, in Allen v. Fairbanks, 45 Fed. Rep. 445, that whether or not such liability, as determined by the laws of the state of incorporation, would be enforceable in other states, that at any rate such stockholders were liable to contribution for their share of the debts of the corporation to other stockholders who had been obliged to pay them by force of the statutes, which made all of them liable ratably in proportion to their stock and coequal to the extent of the liability.

Stock dividends have sometimes been spoken of as the issue of bonus stock, but the questions respecting these are usually in reference to the distinction between capital and income as affecting the rights of life tenants and remaindermen of the stock.

II. Constitutional and statutory provisions.

Since every corporation is a creature of the law, it is plain that its existence must be subject to all such conditions, of whatever nature they may be, as the lawmaking power shall prescribe. Injustice, frauds, and scandals in the management of corporations have caused the enactment of constitutional and statutory provisions which expressly require the full payment of the stock of every corporation. These provisions vary somewhat but all tend to the general result of securing for every corporation an actually invested capital equivalent to the amount of its nominal stock.

Similar constitutional provisions are now found in a considerable number of states. Under such provisions, however, there may still remain the question whether or not the issue of stock as an extra inducement to the purchase of bonds is prohibited. As to this, see infra, IV.

It is expressly provided by Ill. Const. 1870, art. II, § 13, that "no railroad corporation shall issue any Co. v. Allerton*, 84 U. S. 18 Wall. 233, 21 L. ed. 902.

In a considerable number of states there are somewhat similar constitutional provisions.

One of the mischiefs sought to be remedied by the constitutional provision against issuing fictitious stock or issuing stock except for money or property actually received or labor done is to protect stockholders against spoliation and to guard the public against worthless securities. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. Dow, 120 U. S. 287, 30 L. ed. 566; Peoria & S. R. Co. v. Thompson, 103 Ill. 187.

Such constitutional provision is not intended to interfere with the usual and customary methods of raising funds by railroad corporations for the purpose of building their roads or to accomplish other legitimate corporate purposes. Peoria & S. R. Co. v. Thompson, 103 Ill. 187.

The issue of stock as a part of the price of property legitimately purchased is not in violation of the constitutional prohibition against issuing stock except for money or property received or labor done. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. Dow, 120 U. S. 287, 30 L. ed. 566.

ment that he shall have to pay but 50 per cent of the par value is in part delicto, and cannot recover back his money, although the stock is void. Clarke v. Lincoln Lumber Co. 59 Wis. 655.

The issue of bonus stock by a corporation, the effect of which was involved in Washburn v. Green ("Richardson v. Green"), 133 U. S. 30, 33 L. ed. 516, was directly prohibited by 2 Mich. Comp. Laws, § 7757, declaring that a railroad company shall not "sell, dispose of, or pledge any shares," nor "issue certificates of shares" until fully paid. One who took such bonus shares is therefore held liable to pay for them notwithstanding a contract between him and the company that the stock shall not be assessable.

In Washburn v. Green ("Richardson v. Green"), 133 U. S. 30, 33 L. ed. 516, the lower court recognized his claim for actual advances of money to the entire amount, without deducting therefrom anything on account of his liability as the holder of bonus stock. But the court on appeal, without expressing any approval of this, merely holds that the decree gave him the fullest measure of allowance to which he could possibly be justly entitled.

III. Effect of recitals and nominal payment.

Since the law does not tolerate any transparent device to evade its provisions, it is evident that a mere recital in certificates of stock that they have been fully paid cannot be effective, if untrue, except, at least, when innocent persons have been deceived thereby. As to such persons, see infra, VII.

Stockholders who vote an increase of stock and distribute it among themselves cannot escape liability to assessment thereon by having the stock issued as fully paid, even if they act in good faith and in the belief that they are entitled to the stock. Handley v. Stutz, 139 U. S. 417, 35 L. ed. 227.

A fictitious arrangement by which stock is issued as full paid, when in fact it is not, may be set aside in equity as a fraud on subsequent creditors of the corporation who have trusted the company in reliance upon its apparent and professed capital having been fully paid in. First Nat. Bank v. Gustin Minerva Consol. Min. Co. 42 Minn. 327, 6 L. R. A. 676.

So, the issue of stock purporting to be full paid, but which was really a gift to the holder in order to get his recommendation and influence for the 88 L. R. A.

company, makes him liable to creditors. Penninsular Sav. Bank v. Black Flag Stove Polish Co. 106 Mich. 585.

An arrangement by which stock is nominally paid and the money taken back as a loan to the stockholder is held, in Sawyer v. Hoag, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 610, 21 L. ed. 781, to be a mere device to change the debt from a stock debt to a loan, and therefore not a valid payment as against creditors of the corporation, though it might be good as between the company and the stockholder.

Shares issued to a person to entitle him to be a director, for which he gives his check but at the same time receives a check of equal amount from the company, are held to be in effect unpaid shares for which he is liable as a contributor on the insolvency of the company. Hay's Case, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 600, 44 L. J. Ch. N. S. 721, 33 L. T. N. S. 466.

The above cases fully recognize and act upon the principle that as to creditors of a corporation who rely on its apparent capital stock the shareholders who have taken certificates which recite a full payment thereof cannot be protected against liability as stockholders on unpaid subscriptions. As to such creditors it is held, in Handley v. Stutz and First Nat. Bank v. Gustin Minerva Consol. Min. Co., that the shareholders were not relieved from liability by an untrue representation that the stock was paid for, and no distinction is raised in those cases between a subscriber to stock and one who obtains it without any subscription. In neither of them do the shareholders in question seem to have made subscriptions for the stock. But that distinction is raised in New York cases which expressly hold that one who obtains stock purporting to be fully paid, although knowing that it is not, cannot be held liable to any greater extent than that for which he is liable on the face of the certificates, if he has not subscribed for the stock or entered into any contract other than that which is implied by the mere acceptance of the shares.

In the first of these New York cases it was held that one who takes certificates of stock with a clause therein stating the further payments to which the stock may be subjected by the order of the directors is not liable to a greater extent to creditors of the corporation, although his title may be conditional on the payment of future calls, and that such payment is optional with him. *Seymour v. The taking of the personal obligation and guaranty of Gill precludes the Lidgerwood Company from asserting any lien on the property of the gypsum company.

There was in fact no fraud and no misrepresentation which induced the Lidgerwood

Company to sell upon the credit of the gypsum company, and it did not sell upon that credit.

The case is not one in which equity will create and enforce a lien in favor of the Lidgerwood Company for the unpaid purchase price of the machinery.

Bennett v. Nichols, 12 Mich. 22; Perkins v. Perkins, 16 Mich. 162; Kelly v. Kelly, 54 Mich. 30; Richards v. Arms Shingle & L. Co. 74 Mich. 57; Huston v. Waldron, 96 Mich. 49.

Messrs. Maher & Salisbury, for William L. Tyler:

Dummer, Gill, and Dickinson should be treated as debtors of the company owing the unpaid balance for the stock issued to them. The capital stock of a corporation constitutes a trust fund for the benefit of its creditors for the payment of its debts, and if not paid for in full by the parties to whom it is issued a court of equity will compel payment so far as necessary to satisfy the corporate debts.

Dwight v. Scrantom & W. Lumber Co. 82 Mich. 630; Turnbull v. Prentiss Lumber Co. 53 Mich. 887; Washburn v. Green ("Richardson v. Green") 133 U. S. 80, 33 L. ed. 516; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 856, 857, note 8.

Other cases hold that one who received so-called bonus stock on which 40 per cent has been credited, but did not subscribe for the stock or enter into any engagement to pay the 40 per cent, cannot be made to respond to the creditors of the company as upon an unpaid subscription, but that the transaction, if ultra vires, was simply a nullity. Christensen v. Eno, 106 N. Y. 97, 60 Am. Rep. 429; Christensen v. Quintard, 20 N. Y. S. R. 61.

These New York cases are clearly out of harmony with the other decisions on the subject in other jurisdictions. The first of them, the case of Seymour v. Sturgeess, might possibly have been harmonized with the general doctrine on the ground that the creditor seeking to enforce the stockholder's liability had not relied on the apparent payment of that stock because he became a creditor of the company before the defendant became a stockholder, but no such point was raised in the case or in the other New York cases above named.

The same rule seems applicable to cases like those just named in which partly paid shares are issued as full paid, that applies to the issue of mere bonus shares; but there is no attempt here to trace out all cases in which shares have been issued with a percentage thereof not paid, and which are not called or treated as bonus shares.

IV. Stock as bonus to purchasers of bonds.

While the purely gratuitous issue of stock is unquestionably condemned by nearly all the decisions, and held void as against subsequent creditors, a more difficult question is raised in respect to the issue of stock as a bonus to purchasers of bonds in order to induce them to purchase such securities of the company. The case of DUMMER V. SMEDLEY holds that such issue cannot be impeached, at least by existing creditors of the company, and the decision is limited to such creditors.

But several cases hold that such a bonus to bond purchasers may be valid even as against subsequent creditors.

Although a railroad company in the exercise of good faith may use bonds and stock to pay for the construction of its road, it cannot rightfully, at least as against creditors or stockholders, issue its stock to anyone as full paid without getting some fair or reasonable equivalent for it. Fogg v. Blair, 139 U. S. 118, 35 L. ed. 104.

Increased stock disposed of to purchasers of bonds 38 L. R. A.

in equal amount in order to induce them to buy the bonds was held to be lawful, where the actual value of both stock and bonds was not more than the par value of the bonds which was paid to the company on the purchase. Handley v. Stutz, 129 U. S. 417, 35 L. ed. 227.

The usual method of raising money to build railroads or for any legitimate corporate purpose was not intended to be forbidden by Minn. act 1887, chap. 12, making it unlawful for a railroad company to sell, dispose of, or pledge any of its shares or issue them until fully paid nor except for money, labor, or property actually received and applied for corporate purposes, and declaring that all fictitious stock shall be void. The delivery of stock as a part of the contract by which bonds of the company are sold is not forbidden by this statute if the amount is not unreasonable or beyond the value actually received. Brown v. Duluth, M. & N. R. Co. 53 Fed. Rep. 889. See also supra, II.

Other cases are to the contrary.

In case of bonus stock given as an inducement to the purchase of bonds of a corporation it was held, in Hebberd v. Southwestern Land & Cattle Co. (N. J.) 36 Atl. 122, that while such transaction was valid as between the corporation and the purchaser, the holders of such bonus stock might be required to pay for it in satisfaction of the demands of creditors after the exhaustion of all other assets upon the ground that its issuance was a fraud in law upon the creditors. This case seems to treat the issue of such bonds as a mere bonus, and not as part of the consideration of the sale.

So, where a large amount of stock was issued to accompany bonds of the corporation in order to induce the purchase of the latter, and one of the directors of the company took some of these shares on which 40 per cent was credited but not paid, it was said that, as between the stockholder and the corporation, the transaction was unquestionably valid and was unaffected by the peculiar considerations which arise when it is impeached in the interests of a creditor, but it is added that the rule is inflexible that in all matters pertaining to the assets creditors must be preferred to stockholders, and that personal profits of members which would diminish the common fund must be held for the benefit of the corporation until creditors are paid. Therefore, it is decided that this director's claim to the bonus of 40 per cent on these shares must

The mortgage was fraudulent as to creditors of the Gypsum Plaster & Stucco Company.

The Lidgerwood Company was not originally a party to this suit, but was allowed to intervene as a defendant after a portion of the proofs had been taken in the court below. At that time a receiver had been appointed and was acting for the Gypsum Plaster & Stucco Company, and there was no question but that the company had become and was insolvent and unable to pay its debts. Under such circumstances unsecured creditors are entitled to only a pro rata distribution of assets.

A mortgage which is fraudulent as to existing creditors will also be fraudulent as to subsequent creditors.

yield to the demand of a creditor of the corporation. Skratka v. Allen, 7 Mo. App. 434. This decision was affirmed on this point in 76 Mo. 384. A similar decision was made in this case as to the effect of bonds issued to stockholders as in fact, though not in name, a bonus in order to compensate them for the burden of calls which they had not understood would ever be required.

And an agreement by which a subscriber to the organization stock of a corporation is to have, on payment therefor, not only the stock, but an equal amount of the bonds of the company, was declared void, not only as to creditors, but as to the corporation itself, since it amounts to a stratagem or device by which the payment of the subscription is to be avoided. Morrow v. Nashville Iron, Steel, & C. Co. 87 Tenn. 262, 8 L. R. A. 37.

V. Mers acceptance of shares; surrender; cancellation.

In most cases the holder of unpaid shares of a corporation is held liable as a stockholder to creditors who have relied on the apparent capital of the company irrespective of the question whether or not he had merely accepted the shares under some arrangement other than by subscribing for them or expressly agreeing to pay for them. The fact that he has become a shareholder and holds shares for which the corporation has not received payment is treated as sufficient to establish his liability to such creditors, but an exception to this appears in New York where it is held that in the absence of either statutory or contract liability a person to whom shares have been issued as a gratuity, such as the case of issue to a shareholder with bonds of the company to compensate him for unexpected calls on other shares of stock, does not by accepting them commit any wrong upon creditors or make himself liable to pay the nominal value of the shares as he would be if he had made a subscription for them or a contract to pay for them. Christensen v. Eno, 106 N. Y. 97, 60 Am. Rep. 429; Christensen v. Quintard, 29 N. Y. S. R. 61; Seymour v. Sturges, 26 N. Y. 134. See further, as to these cases, supra, 111.

One who has received as "full paid" shares for which he pays nothing but subsequently surrenders them to the corporation, which issues them again for value to a bona fide purchaser, cannot be held still liable to creditors of the company. Erskine v. Peck, 18 Mo. App. 282, Affirmed 83 Mo. 465.

Shares of stock issued without any real consideration, with the evident purpose of depriving other stockholders of influence in the affairs of the company, may be canceled in equity, although they are of no real value. Gilman, C. & S. R. Co. v. Kelly, 77 Ill. 428.

It has already been said that the rights of creditors 38 L. R. A.

itors may be sufficient ground for impeaching the issue of bonus stock when that may be valid as between the corporation and its shareholders. And that this is because creditors who deal with a corporation having a specified capital stock are entitled to rely on that as representing the actual stock of the company. To this effect are nearly all the cases hitherto cited in preceding divisions. But it is manifest that a distinction is raised by this principle between creditors already existing when the bonus stock is issued and those who subsequently deal with the corporation. The cases are substantially agreed in holding that only subsequent creditors are entitled to enforce their claims against holders of increased stock, since it is only they who could by any legal presumption have trusted the company upon the faith of the increased stock. Handley v. Stutz, 139 U. S. 417, 36 L. ed. 227; First Nat. Bank v. Gustin Minerva Consol. Min. Co., 42 Minn. 327, 6 L. R. A. 678; Colt v. North Carolina Gold Amalgamating Co. 119 U. A. 507, supra, I.

The right of creditors to compel the holders of bonus stock to pay for it contrary to their actual agreement with the corporation rests neither on implied contract nor upon any trust-fund doctrine, but on the ground of fraud. The fraud in such case consists in the misrepresentation as to the actual amount of capital upon the faith of which persons have dealt with the corporation and given it credit. Hospes v. Northwestern Mfg. & Car Co. 48 Minn. 174, 15 L. R. A. 470.

To entitle the creditor to have the benefit of the liability of the holder of bonus stock all that is necessary for him to urge or prove in that regard is that he is a subsequent creditor, and if the fact is that he dealt with the corporation with knowledge of the arrangement by which the bonus stock was issued that is matter of defense. Hospes v. Northwestern Mfg. & Car Co. 48 Minn. 174, 15 L. R. A. 470.

The right of action of a creditor against the holders of bonus stock does not accrue until the corporation becomes insolvent. Hospes v. Northwestern Mfg. & Car Co. 48 Minn. 174, 15 L. R. A. 470.

VIII. Bona fide purchasers.

There may be conflicting equities between a bona fide purchaser of certificates of stock which purport or are represented by the books of the company to be fully paid, and creditors who have relied on the full payment of the nominal stock of the corporation. The cases (some of which were cases of partly paid stock) substantially agree in holding that a bona fide purchaser of shares which purport to be fully paid is not liable to creditors of the company because of their nonpayment. Re British

The bringing of suit by attachment for the purchase price of either real or personal property sold on the ground of fraudulent disposition of property by the debtor is no bar to an action to rescind the contract and to disaffirm the transaction where the first suit is begun without full knowledge of the facts proving the fraud.

A bona fide purchaser of certificates of stock in the usual commercial form, without any intimation that they are not fully paid, is entitled to regard them so, although they do not expressly state that they are paid. West Nashville Planing Mill Co. v. Nashville Sav. Bank, 86 Tenn. 252.

That is, in the absence of notice to the purchaser of stock that it is not paid for or of anything to put him upon inquiry as to that fact he is entitled to assume that it is fully paid. Johnson v. Lullman, 15 Mo. App. 55; Keystone Bridge Co. v. McCluney, 8 Mo. App. 496.

It is stated in the case of Keystone Bridge Co. v. McCluney, that the certificates involved in Foreman v. Bigelow, 4 Cliff. 508, were also in the usual form, without stating whether or not they were paid up.

But in Keystone Bridge Co. v. McCluney, 8 Mo. App. 496, it appeared that the company claimed that the stock was paid and that the books of the company would have shown the purchaser that this was the case.

The court cannot expand the contract of such a purchase or fix upon him any engagement larger or other than that into which he has entered. Waterhouse v. Jamieson, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 29; Ex parte Currie, 7 L. T. N. S. 486.

Contrary to the doctrine of the above cases, it is held in Myers v. Seeley, 10 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 411, that the holder of shares is not exempt from liability to creditors for the amount that remains unpaid upon them, although he may have bought and paid for them relying on representations that they were fully paid.

So, it is declared by Chief Justice Daly in Tasker v. Wallace, 6 Daly. 372, that it is wholly immaterial whether or not a person is a bona fide and innocent purchaser of stock which the vendor assured him had been paid, or which he had every reason to suppose had been paid, when his liability is asserted by a creditor of the corporation for unpaid stock, and that his remedy, if he has been inveigled into the purchase of unpaid stock, is against the holder.

But this is contrary to the general doctrine, and entirely inconsistent with the doctrine asserted in the other New York cases.

The objection of failure to return or offer to return the amount received by Mrs. Hinsdill at the time of the release of her levy is without merit.

A bona fide purchaser of stock who takes it as paid-up stock cannot be held liable for the amount unpaid thereon in New York under the doctrine of the case of Seymour v. Sturges, 26 N. Y. 184, to the effect that no contract to pay for the stock can be implied from the mere purchase. Wintringham v. Rosenthal, 25 Hun. 580.

One who buys shares without being induced to do so by any report made by the company, although he thinks them paid up when they are not, is not free from liability for what is unpaid on them. Blyth's Case, L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 140, 26 L. T. N. S. 124, 125, 25 Week. Rep. 200.

Statements by officers or directors of a corporation to the effect that stock is fully paid, unless shown to have been made in the performance of their duties, are held, in Browning v. Hinkle, 48 Minn. 544, insufficient to make a purchaser of such shares a bona fide purchaser such that he cannot be held liable if the shares are not paid.

The mere fact that shares of stock are marked "Non-assessable" does not prevent a transferee of them from being held liable to pay unpaid calls thereon to the full amount. Webster v. Upton, 91 U. S. 65, 23 L. ed. 884. The question of notice to bona fide purchasers of shares purporting to be fully paid is not discussed in this case.

One who took shares as an original allottee with constructive notice that they had not been paid for "in cash," as required by statute, but that they were issued in exchange for property received from another person, is held not to be a bona fide purchaser, but to be liable to pay for the shares. Rowland's Case, 42 L. T. N. S. 785.

So, the holder of unpaid shares knowing that they were allotted to a vendor of property was held liable to calls to the full nominal amount of the shares, in Crickmer's Case, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 614, 24 Week. Rep. 219, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 596, where they had not been issued in such a way as the law required to be regarded as paid up.

But in Carling's Case, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 115, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 5, 38 L. T. N. S. 645, 24 Week. Rep. 165, where shares were allotted to persons to enable them to become directors and the certificates purported to be fully paid, it was held that they could not be required to pay for them, but that their contract "must either be adopted or rejected in its entirety. If it is rejected, they are not shareholders at all. If it is adopted, the company is entitled to say 'They are not your shares, but ours,' but that does not make them hold unpaid-up shares."

Although an innocent purchaser of stock might be protected as such in case he had received the stock, yet he cannot be compelled to receive it under his contract if the stock is not fully paid as it purports to be. Sturges v. Stetson, 1 Biss. 246.

The greater the payment made by the Gypsum Plaster & Stucco Company upon its judgment the less will be the amount of the new debt. The return of a portion of its debts so paid would only increase the amount of its liability under the new judgment and proceedings.

Mr. Charles B. Blair, for intervener:

What was at first a mere foreclosure suit had been widened into a suit for the protection of a trust fund in the receiver's hands, and for the administration and distribution of this fund among, first, the lien claimants in accordance with such priorities as the court should decide they were entitled to, and thereafter to the receiver as the representative of the creditors and stockholders of the insolvent corporation.

First Nat. Bank v. Barnum Wire & I. Works, 58 Mich. 317, 60 Mich. 499; High, Receivers, §1.

If a sale were ordered it should be of the whole property as an entirety, a running concern, an integer, as one court says; and the liens of all, including that conceded to the Lidgerwood Company by the order of June 25, 1895, should fasten upon the proceeds in their proper order. Sales of such property are so made according to the usual practice of courts of equity.

National Foundry & P. Works v. Oconto Water Co. 52 Fed. Rep. 43; Hammond v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 105 U. S. 77, 26 L. ed. 1111; Brooks v. Burlington & S. W. R. Co. 101 U. S. 443, 25 L. ed. 1057; Sleger v. Arctic Refrigerating Co. 89 Tenn. 453, 10 L. R. A. 580; Badger Lumber Co. v. Marion Water Supply, E. L. & P. Co. 48 Kan. 187, 15 L. R. A. 652; McNeal P. & F. Co. v. Woltman, 114 N. C. 178; Williamson v. New Jersey Southern R. Co. 29 N. J. Eq. 811; Cooper v. Cleghorn, 50 Wis. 113.

The position which has been taken by the mortgagee and lien claimants has been consistently incompatible with separation of the apparatus and plant.

The parties recognized the existence of the equitable lien of the Lidgerwood Company and its right to enforce the same in this suit in lieu of seeking a remedy at law. The order of June 25 was accordingly made the basis of which was that the best interest of all parties demands that it be considered and treated as inseparable and an integral part of the plant as a whole. They could not if they wished take an inconsistent position now because the consent of the Lidgerwood Company to the order was accompanied by a waiver of present rights and of the opportunity of immediate seizure and possession; and because the order being final in its nature (Hake v. Coach, 105 Mich. 425) has not been appealed from, and because the appellants having consented to it in open court could not now go back of it if they wished.

Russell v. White, 63 Mich. 409; Wyatt v. Sweet, 48 Mich. 539; Brick v. Brick, 65 Mich. 230.

The lien rests upon the fraud the direct and proximate result of which was the sale, the passing of the title (voidable), and the annexation of the apparatus as a permanent improvement and an integral part of the plant. The consent of the Lidgerwood Company to this annexation being procured by the fraud was in law no consent.

Morrison v. Berry, 42 Mich. 398, 36 Am. Rep. 446; American Sugar Ref. Co. v. Fancher, 145

N. Y. 561, 27 L. R. A. 757; Williamson v. New Jersey Southern R. Co. 29 N. J. Eq. 819; Williamson v. New Jersey Southern R. Co. 28 N. J. Eq. 289.

By annexation it would not necessarily become a part of the freehold so as to fall under the prior mortgage and liens to the exclusion of any right of the vendor therein. He would still be entitled to a charge or equitable lien on the whole property and to priority over earlier mortgages and liens, not necessarily to the full extent of his claim, but to the enhanced value of the whole plant due to the annexation.

McNeal Pipe & F. Co. v. Woltman, 114 N. C. 178; Williamson v. New Jersey Southern R. Co. 29 N. J. Eq. 811; Foodick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 255, 25 L. ed. 848.

If the vendor retained title until payment, or reserved a vendor's lien, or took back a chattel mortgage, his claim upon the apparatus would be given priority over the mortgagee's.

Wheeler v. Bedell, 40 Mich. 698; Crippen v. Morrison, 18 Mich. 28; Coleman v. Stearns Mfg. Co. 88 Mich. 88; Wood v. Holly Mfg. Co. 100 Ala. 326.

The effect of the fraud was to entitle the Lidgerwood Company to treat the sale, the annexation, and its consent thereto as null and void (American Sugar Ref. Co. v. Fancher, 145 N. Y. 561, 27 L. R. A. 757; Williamson v. New Jersey Southern R. Co. 29 N. J. Eq. 819; Williamson v. New Jersey Southern R. Co. 28 N. J. Eq. 289) as against the wrongdoer and those who stand in its shoes. One who not having altered his condition on the faith or the possession and apparent ownership of the property, asserts a right to the property because of any assumed right thereto in the wrongdoer, necessarily attempts to deprive the plaintiff of his property inequitably.

Equity lends its aid to the enforcement of these constructive trusts when the remedy at law is inadequate (American Sugar Ref. Co. v. Fancher, 145 N. Y. 561, 27 L. R. A. 757; Newton v. Porter, 5 Lans. 432; Huxley v. Rice, 40 Mich. 82; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1053; Edwards v. Hulbert, Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 54) treating the fraudulent vendee or holder of the property as a trustee (American Sugar Ref. Co. v. Fancher, 145 N. Y. 558, 27 L. R. A. 757; Newton v. Porter, 5 Lans. 422, 69 N. Y. 140, 25 Am. Dec. 152). The doctrine is familiar and has often been applied in the state under circumstances sufficiently diverse to illustrate the willingness and flexibility of equity in molding its relief to suit any particular state of facts, its controlling purpose being to render full and complete justice.

Where property is wrongfully taken by fraud a court of equity will intervene, raise a constructive trust by implication, and enforce an equitable lien for the protection of the true owner within the following limits:

(a) Where the property can be clearly traced and the fact that it has been disposed of, converted into other property, or changed in its form, as corn into whisky, does not prevent the intervention of equity.

(b) Where the remedy by law is inadequate. Newton v. Porter, 5 Lans. 429; Williamson v. New Jersey Southern R. Co. 29 N. J. Eq. 820; Pollock, Contr. 547; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 899; *Topham v. The elementary doctrine that the equitable right which is prior in time must prevail as against a later right unless superior equity be shown in the latter, protects us in our claim to priority.

Wood v. Holly Mfg. Co. 100 Ala. 351; Nazareth Literary & Benev. Inst. v. Lowe, 1 B. Mon. 257; Thomas v. Hanson, 44 Iowa, 651; Crumb v. Davis, 54 Iowa, 25.

Under an after-acquired property clause the mortgagee would take whatever interest he acquired upon the theory that this clause was an agreement which equity would specifically enforce in his favor; and would therefore hold to cover after-acquired property without an actual conveyance, since equity regards that as done which equitably ought to be done. That it would not specifically enforce such an agreement without requiring the mortgagee to give full effect to the rights of the Lidgerwood Company.

Williamson v. New Jersey Southern R. Co. 29 N. J. Eq. 817; Myer v. Car Co. ("Meyer v. Car Co."), 102 U. S. 10, 26 L. ed. 60; Wood v. Holly Mfg. Co. 100 Ala. 351; 1 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. §§ 417-419; Hanold v. Bacon, 36 Mich. 1.

Neither Mrs. Hinsdill nor the other creditors nor the mortgagee have any right or equity to have appropriated to the payment of their debts the property to which the Lidgerwood Company is equitably entitled as between it and the Gypsum Plaster & Stucco Company, since they have advanced nothing and given no credit on the faith of the latter's possession of such property, and ought not to reap the fruits of the fraud any more than the Gypsum Company itself.

The receiver is like an assignee for creditors or in bankruptcy (Carley v. Graves, 85 Mich. 488; People v. City Bank, 96 N. Y. 82), is not a purchaser for value any more than are the general creditors whom he represents.

Mr. Gill concealed the existence of his mortgage under circumstances which required him to speak, and his representations were such as to amount to a direct denial of its existence. He now sets it up as against the very party whom he deceived; but equity says that he who is silent when he ought to speak is debarred from speaking when in conscience he ought to be silent.

All the mortgagees and Mrs. Hinesdill likewise are the beneficiaries of this fraud, and claim here on this appeal the fruits of that fraud, and assert their priority over our claim. The fraud under such circumstances is necessarily adopted and becomes constructively their own.

The Lidgerwood claim, while subsequent to the mortgage, entitles them to attack the latter as fraudulent. If it was designed as a fraud against existing creditors it was equally designed as such against subsequent ones as a retreat in the event of pecuniary trouble; the mortgagor was hopelessly insolvent, and the then existing debts are all of them still outstanding. The Lidgerwood Company dealt without notice of the mortgage, its existence being fraudulently concealed.

Application for rehearing.

The court has overlooked entirely the order of June 25, 1895. Under this we are entitled to a lien. This is res judicata and binding on all courts. It is final, establishing a status or relation.

Hake v. Coach, 105 Mich. 425.

And it has not been appealed from; besides it was made by consent in open court and for that reason is binding here.

Long, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to foreclose a mortgage made by the Gypsum Plaster & Stucco Company to the complainant on October 4, 1892, on 120 acres of land in the township of Wyoming, Kent county, with the gypsum mines and mills thereon, to secure payment of $25,000, with interest. The mortgage was recorded October 5, 1892. A chattel mortgage covering the personal property about the mills was given as additional security. It appears that prior to 1891 the Union Mills Plaster Company, a corporation, had been engaged in business near Grand Rapids in the quarrying of plaster rock, and in the manufacture and sale of land and calcined plaster. The lands and quarries, with the mills, were sold by the company to Andrew L. Hubbell, and by him, December 31, 1891, conveyed to the Gypsum Plaster & Stucco Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Illinois, for the stated consideration of $165,500, and the company's notes were given for this amount. The stockholders of the new company were James B. Hubbell, Mr. Russell, and Mr. Garland. The two latter held one share each, and the balance of the stock was held by Mr. James B. Hubbell. The capital stock was $100,000. A note for this amount was given to Andrew L. Hubbell by the company, as a part of the purchase price of the property, and was by him transferred to James B. Hubbell, and by the latter surrendered and canceled, and in this manner the capital stock was treated as fully paid. The Gypsum Plaster & Stucco Company also assumed certain of the debts of the Union Mills Plaster Company, among them being many debts still existing and involved in the present litigation. The company also gave a mortgage to the Union Mutual Life Insurance Company, which amounted at the date of the transfer, for principal and interest, to $28,600. Thereafter the company carried on the business, and became more and more involved in financial difficulties. A foreclosure decree was taken upon the insurance company mortgage, and the day of sale was fixed for October 6, 1892. From time to time during that summer, levies of attachments and executions had been made upon the property, subject to the mortgage, when, about the 1st of October, these levies amounted in all to $14,000. Mr. Frank L. Noble had been the active business manager of the corporation, and a portion of Mr. Hubbell's stock had been transferred to him. Mr. Hubbell, Mr. Noble, and Mr. Russell were then the directors and stockholders. It was found necessary to raise money, not only to satisfy the insurance company's decree, but to compromise or adjust the attachment and execution levies, and provide a working capital for the company. Negotiations had been for some time carried on between the corporation and Mr. E. F. Uhl, of Grand Rapids; and before October 1st this had resulted in an agreement that Uhl would take from the corporation a mortgage of $35,000, and would loan it the sum of $80,000, the remainder being for his services in procuring the loan. Mr. Herbert R. Gill, of Ohio, was extensively interested in the plaster business, as a purchaser of such material. He examined the property, and considered the lands and quarries worth $100,000, and the improvements $18,000. In expectation that he would ultimately be interested in the business, he had associated himself with Mr. Hubbell and Mr. Noble in active efforts to procure further capital. Together they had interested Mr. Dummer, the complainant here, who was the vice-president of the Northwestern National Bank of Chicago. Together they had determined that $35,000 in addition to that realized on the Uhl mortgage would be necessary to carry on the business successfully. The mortgage in controversy was given to Mr. Dummer, but the moneys were not all paid in at that time, being paid from time to time, as will be stated hereafter. The Uhl mortgage was given on October 5, the decree of the insurance company satisfied, and on the same day the mortgage in controversy was recorded. The moneys advanced by Mr. Dummer were paid over to Mr. Russell, who, with Mr. Noble and Mr. Gill, came to Grand Rapids, and entered upon the task of adjusting the liens upon the property.

It is claimed by the defendants that these gentlemen represented to the attachment and execution creditors that they had only a small amount of money available, and could not pay in full; and that these creditors, supposing that the moneys came from the Uhl mortgage over and above the amount necessary to pay the insurance company decree, compromised their claims at about 50 cents on the dollar, taking renewal notes for the residue, upon the representations of these parties that the company would be able to go on and do a successful business and pay its debts; and that they thereupon discharged their levies. It is also claimed that at this time the creditors knew nothing of the existence of the Dummer mortgage, and did not discover it had been given until thirty-three days thereafter. Afterwards they began suits as the renewal notes matured, and the same attachment and execution liens were placed upon the property, together with many additional ones. The dates of the attachment and execution levies will hereafter be shown. In the meantime, Mr. John W. Dickinson, of Chicago, had become interested with Dummer and Gill, and the $25,000 represented by the Dummer mortgage was paid by the three, as follows: October 4, 1892, by Dummer, $8,500; October 17, 1892, by Dummer, $1,500; September 21, 1892, by Gill, $600; October 24, 1892, by Gill, $400;

November 4, 1892, by Gill, $2,100; November 7, 1892, by Gill, $1,500; November 29, 1892, by Gill, 2,000; December 7, 1892, by Gill, $400; January 10, 1893, by Gill, $2,000; January 13, 1893, by Gill, $1,000; January 23, 1893, by Dickinson, $2,000; February 6, 1893, by Dickinson, $500; February 11, 1893, by Dickinson, $500; February 24, 1893, by Dickinson, $500; March 10, 1893, by Dickinson, $500; March 25, 1893, by Dickinson, $1,000. At the time of the execution of the mortgage in controversy, a series of notes was executed, due in from thirty days to eighteen months, and were all payable to Mr. Dummer. After the moneys were all paid in, the corporation took up these notes, and issued a new series of notes, dated back as of the date of the mortgage, and running from one to five years, vis.: Five notes of $2,000 each, to Mr. Dummer; five notes of $2,000 each, to Mr. Gill; five notes of $1,000 each, to Mr. Dickinson. The complainant claims that these notes were given in place of the old ones, and were secured by the $25,000 mortgage. It is claimed by the defendants that in June, 1893, Dummer, Gill, and Dickinson agreed to surrender $10,000 of their holdings under this mortgage, or two fifths of the holdings of each, in order that the company might raise money elsewhere, and agreed to accept for their security a third mortgage for $10,000, running to John W. Dickinson, and which mortgage was executed; that, to accomplish this, the second series of notes was surrendered by Dummer, Gill, and Dickinson, and new notes taken, thus leaving their interest in the mortgage only $15,000, the remaining $10,000 being released for the benefit of the company, and being represented by five notes of $2,000 each. The complainant claims that, while these notes and the mortgage to Dickinson were executed, the arrangement was never completed, and that the mortgage in controversy stood as security for the payment of the second series of notes. It appears that in November, 1892, the capital stock of the corporation had been increased from $100,000 to $500,000. Of this increase, $100,000 was made preferred stock, and was to be used for the purpose of paying creditors as fast as they could be induced to accept the same. Of the remaining $300,000 of stock, it had been agreed that Dummer and Gill should have $2.50 for each $1 of money paid in by them, thus giving Dummer and Gill each $25,000 of the stock; and when Dickinson entered into the arrangement, he was given a similar issue of stock, amounting to $12,500. In 1893, litigation was commenced by some of the execution creditors to set aside the Dummer mortgage, as fraudulent as against them. Mr. Dummer appeared and answered. This litigation is still pending, and by consent of the parties, has been transferred to the present suit. The business of the corporation was continued until January 1, 1894, when the company entered into a pool with other manufacturing companies. The mill was thereafter operated only at intervals, to produce its quota of material, and but little money was realized by the corporation.

On July 6, 1894, this bill was filed. Defendants Hinsdill and Tyler answered. The bill was taken as confessed against the Gypsum Plaster & Stucco Company. In December, 1894, Mr. Smedley was appointed receiver, and was thereupon granted leave to intervene and answer. He filed an answer, setting up that the mortgage was invalid, and averring that the general creditors of the Gypsum Plaster & Stucco Company had rights in the properties prior to the Dummer mortgage. After some proofs were taken, the Lidgerwood Manufacturing Company, a New York corporation, also obtained leave to intervene as a defendant, and, by way of affirmative relief, alleged that in March, 1893, it sold to the Gypsum Plaster & Stucco Company a cable apparatus for hoisting rock out of the quarry, for the price of $4,000, of which $3,500 remained unpaid; that this property had become an essential part of the plant, and was procured by the company by fraud; and that, though the intervenor was entitled to take the property, it had so become a part of the plant that equity and the interest of all the parties required it should remain there, and the intervenor should have a lien for the amount unpaid. The answer of the defendants Hinsdill, Smedley, and Tyler also set up facts as a basis of affirmative relief in the nature of a cross bill, and they ask that the complainant's mortgage be vacated.

It appeared upon the hearing that the complainant had advanced $1,050 for the payment of delinquent interest upon the Uhl mortgage, in order to prevent foreclosure; that the receiver had paid taxes upon the company property, and also delinquent interest upon the Uhl mortgage, to the amount of $1,365. The proofs were taken in open court and by deposition, and on September 20, 1895, a decree of foreclosure was entered, and awarded priority to the several parties as follows: (1) To the complainant, $1,050 and interest for moneys advanced to pay delinquent interest on the Uhl mortgage. (2) To receiver Smedley, $1,365 and interest, being the amount paid by him for taxes and delinquent interest on the Uhl mortgage. (3) To the Lidgerwood Manufacturing Company, $4,000, being the entire amount of its unpaid debt and interest. (4) The complainant Dummer, the sum of $10,000 and interest for advances made by him under the mortgage. (5) To H. R. Gill, $4,100 and interest, for moneys advanced by him under the mortgage prior to November 7, 1892, that being the date when defendant Hinsdill levied the first attachment after the giving of the Dummer mortgage. (6) To defendant Hinsdill, $4,408, with interest, being the amount of her debt under the levy of November 7, 1892. (7) To H. R. Gill, $4,561, for moneys advanced by him on the Dummer mortgage after the Hinsdill levy, and before the next levy. (8) To E. D. Preston and D. H. Armstrong, $4,000 and interest, they being the next levying creditors, and being the full amount of their claim. (9) To H. R. Gill, $1,161, being for moneys advanced on the Dummer mortgage after the foregoing named levies, and before the next levy. (10) To E. D. Preston, $177, he being the next levying creditor. (11) To H. R. Gill and John W. Dickinson, $4,800, being the remainder to Gill for his advances and to Dickinson for advances made by him before the next levy. (12) To C. O. Smedley, $365, he being the next levying creditor. (18) To John W. Dickinson, $2,800, being the remainder of his advances upon the mortgage. From this decree defendant Smedley, as receiver, and the defendants Hinsdill and Tyler, appeal. The other defendants do not appeal. The complainant also appeals from the decree.

The receiver contends that the mortgage is fraudulent and void as against the general creditors, and that the lien under it should be postponed to the payment of their claims. This claim is based upon two grounds: (1) That the mortgage was given for a greater amount than was paid at its execution, and, if any future advances were to be made, such fact was not set forth in the mortgage; (2) that the beneficiaries under the mortgage were stockholders in the corporation, they having received a large number of shares of the bonus stock.

It appears from the record that the corporation had ample power to borrow money and give security on the corporate property therefor. The statute of Illinois under which this corporation was organized gives it this power. From a careful reading of the record, it appears to us that no other conclusion can be reached than that, before the time the mortgage was given, and arrangement was made by the corporate authorities to make a loan of that amount. They regarded the condition of the company as serious, and that by the placing of the Uhl mortgage, and thus discharging the insurance company decree, the company would not be in a condition to go on with the business without further means. Mr. Gill had been working to make the loan. Dummer was seen, and was offered some of the bonus stock if he would take part of the mortgage. While the arrangement was not fully completed, Mr. Dummer says that Gill agreed to put in $10,000 if the company would arrange for the other $5,000, as he (Dummer) was to put in $10,000. Matters were in this condition when the mortgage was executed. Dickinson thereafter consented to put in the other $5,000. From all that took place during the few days prior to the execution of the mortgage and the conduct of the parties afterwards, it is apparent that it was the intent of all the parties that the full sum of $25,000 should be paid in. As soon as Gill could raise his money he was to pay it over. Dummer put in $8,500 at first, and within a few days thereafter paid over the balance of $1,500, completing his share. Gill and Dickinson subsequently paid the full amount they were to take. There was no showing upon the record that there was any bad faith in the giving of the mortgage, and the consideration was fully paid. The mortgage was therefore a valid lien upon the property, at least as between the corporation and the mortgagees.

The fact that the mortgage did not state that it was given to secure future advances would not render it void as to creditors. Brace v. Berdan, 104 Mich. 856. A mortgage is not fraudulent for including contemplated advances. Newkirk v. Newkirk, 56 Mich. 525. Counsel for receiver cites Showman v. Lee, 86 Mich. 560, in support of his contention; but all that was held in that case was that, if the mortgage was taken for a greater amount, than was actually paid, the parties must act in good faith; that parties who take security from insolvents or from parties who are indebted to others must act in good faith, and so as not to unnecessarily hinder, delay, or defraud creditors; that the taking of a mortgage for an amount in excess of the debt or the assumed liability is a badge of fraud in law, if the purpose is to protect the debtor's interests from other creditors. This is but the statement of a familiar principle of law. In the present case, however, no such showing is made. The parties were acting in good faith, and the whole of the consideration thereafter paid. The mere fact that the mortgage was given for a greater amount would not necessarily make the mortgage fraudulent. There must be some fact or circumstance showing an intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, and this is necessarily a question of fact. This record, as we have said, discloses no such fact.

The contention that the beneficiaries under the mortgage stood as stockholders, and not as mortgagee creditors, has no force. It is claimed by counsel for the receiver that the record discloses that these beneficiaries intended to become interested as stockholders, and that the mortgage was a plan adopted to save them against the risk of loss on their investment, while they obtained all possible chances of gain. Counsel treats the question as though the stock given to the mortgagees was part of the original capital stock. This is not the fact. The original capital stock was $100,000, and was treated as fully paid. The corporation received all the properties for that amount and the payment of some old debts, and in this suit the original stock must be treated as fully paid up. In November, 1892, the stock was increased from $100,000 to $500,000. The mortgagees took the mortgage with the understanding that this should be done, and they be assigned certain shares of this common stock, the first $100,000 being held as preferred stock. At that time the company was greatly embarrassed, and, as is claimed, found it difficult to raise money on a second mortgage. The mortgage had been given to Uhl for $85,000. There were certain attachment and execution levies against the property to be taken care of, and the proposition was made to Dummer and Gill that a portion of this "bonus stock," as it is called, should be given to them if they would advance this $25,000 on the mortgage.

In Handley v. Stutz, 139 U. S. 417, 85 L. ed. 227, this subject was fully discussed. The bill was filed by Stutz and other creditors against the Clifton Coal Company, to compel an assessment upon certain shares of stock for the satisfaction of the debts of the company. The company was organized in 1883, and the capital stock of $120,000 all subscribed and paid for. In May, 1886, the stock was increased to $200,000. The increased stock was issued to Handley and the other defendant under the following circumstances: After unsuccessful attempts to sell $50,000 of its bonds secured by mortgage, the company offered $1,000 stock as a bonus with each $1,000 bond. The defendants bought the bonds, and took the bonus stock. The debts of the complainants were created before the increase of the stock. Speaking of this bonus stock, the court said: 'The case then resolves itself into the question whether an active corporation, or as it is called in some cases, a "going concern," finding its original capital impaired by loss or misfortune, may not, for the purpose of recuperating itself and providing new conditions for the successful prosecution of its business, issue new stock, put it upon the market and sell it for the best price that can be obtained. . . . To say that a corporation may not, under the circumstances above indicated, put its stock upon the market and sell it to the highest bidder, is practically to declare that a corporation can never increase its capital by a sale of shares, if the original stock has fallen below par. . . .

. . . It frequently happens that corporations, as well as individuals, find it necessary to increase their capital in order to raise money to prosecute their business successfully, and one of the most frequent methods resorted to is that of issuing new shares of stock and putting them upon the market for the best price that can be obtained. . . . It would seem to follow from this that if the stock had been of some value, that value, however much less than par, would have been the limit of the stockholder's liability." Speaking further in the case as to the rights of creditors, and what particular creditors would be affected by the increase of the capital stock, it was said: "We have no doubt that the learned circuit judge held correctly that it was only subsequent creditors who were entitled to enforce their claims against these stockholders, since it is only they who could, by any legal presumption, have trusted the company upon the faith of the increased stock." In Washburn v. Green ("Richardson v. Green"), 138 U. S. 80, 38 L. ed. 516, it appeared that Richardson had advanced moneys on bonds, and taken stock as bonuses. On a suit to foreclose the mortgage, the moneys actually advanced by him were allowed, without any reduction on account of the bonus stock, though there were general creditors subsequent to the mortgage securing his bonds.

It is therefore apparent from these cases which we think embody the settled law on the subject, that the defendants Hinsdill and Tyler are not in position to question the right of the corporation to increase its capital stock, and to sell or pledge such bonus stock to raise money for the legitimate purposes of the corporation. Their debts antedated the giving of the mortgage.

As to creditors whose debts have since arisen, the receiver contends that, in equity, they have the right to an equitable set-off against the mortgage for the amounts due upon their demands. In the first place, it may be said that that question was not raised by the answer of the receiver, and for that reason cannot now be considered; and, second, we know of no rule of equity that would allow such set-off against the mortgage under the circumstances here stated. The mortgagees were acting in good faith; had paid in full for the mortgage, upon the understanding that this bonus stock should be assigned to them. The company had a right to issue the stock, and sell for the best obtainable price. It realized $25,000 cash for the mortgage and stock. There is no showing here that the mortgage and stock were worth a dollar more than the $25,000. We think the complainant was entitled to his decree of foreclosure for the full amount of the mortgage, and that he had such right under the second series of notes, as the third was never used, and the first was delivered up and canceled. We are also of the opinion that the court was not in error in giving the complainant the prior lien for interest paid on the Uhl mortgage. It was necessary to protect his own mortgage lien. Neither do we think the court was in error in providing, second, that the receiver should have a lien for the moneys paid by him for interest on the Uhl mortgage and the taxes on the property. It would be inequitable to hold that the receiver, having protected the property from sale for the taxes assessed and interest on the Uhl mortgage, and preserved the security for the mortgagees, should not now be protected.

We now come to the discussion of the priorities fixed by the court in other portions of the decree. The Lidgerwood claim is made a lien prior to the complainant's, except as to the moneys advanced as interest upon the Uhl mortgage. We think this claim cannot be sustained by the Lidgerwood Company. A court of equity will not create a lien upon real estate in favor of a party unless, from the nature of the transaction, rights have sprung up which ought to be held binding upon the specific property. Kelly v. Kelly, 54 Mich. 30.

In the present case there is nothing in the record showing that the company ever intended to claim a lien upon the corporate property of the Gypsum Plaster & Stucco Company. On the other hand, the Lidgerwood Company was informed by Gill, before the machinery was sold, that the Gypsum Company was in a bad condition financially. The order was made by the Gypsum Company for the machinery on January 17, 1893. The matter ran along until February 2d, when Mr. Gill gave his personal guaranty for the payment of the machinery. During the summer of that year, the Lidgerwood Company was pressing Gill for payment upon his guaranty. Gill thereupon took a bill of sale of the engine and cable to himself. We are satisfied from the evidence that no false representations were made by the officers of the corporation to the Lidgerwood Company, or by Gill, of the financial condition of the corporation. The Lidgerwood Company was advised by Gill, in advance of the sale, that "Bradstreet and Dun give very unfavorable reports of the concern and well they might." Acting upon this report, the company sold upon the written guaranty of Gill. The rule is well settled that a vendor's lien is waived by taking the obligation of a third party. Washb. Real Prop. § 16. This rule has been fully sustained by this court. Sears v. Smith, 2 Mich. 243; Wisconsin M. & F. Ins. Co. Bank v. Tyler, 83 Mich. 496. The Lidgerwood claim cannot therefore be sustained, but that company must be held to have waived it, and, having waived it, the lien is lost. Au Sable River Boom Co. v. Sanborn, 86 Mich. 358.

We think the court was not in error in fixing the priorities between the other claimants. By the decree, the court gave the execution and attaching creditors priorities over the moneys which were paid under the mortgage subsequent to the levies.

The decree of the court below will be modified in respect to the Lidgerwood claim, and affirmed as to the other portions. The complainant will recover his costs against the Lidgerwood Manufacturing Company. No other costs will be allowed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

UNION NATIONAL BANK, Appl.,

v.

J. M. BROWN et al.

(..... Ky.)

1. The rights of the owner of a patent under laws of the United States are not infringed by a state statute applicable to the sale of patent rights requiring the words "Peddler's note" to be written across the face of all notes executed for articles sold by a peddler or itinerant person.
2. An allegation that a note "is what is denominated under the laws of Kentucky a 'peddler's note'" is a mere legal conclusion, and does not sufficiently aver that the vendor of the article for which the note was given was an itinerant person.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Washington County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. P. W. Hardin for appellant.

Messrs. Clements & Thurman for appellees.

Burnam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint of appellant is based upon a promissory note executed by appellees Brown & Wells to Webb & Camp, which was made negotiable and payable at a bank in this state, and which was indorsed by the payees to one George Bohon, and was by Bohon discounted and assigned to appellant for value, before its maturity, it being a banking institution organized under the national banking laws of the United States. Judgment is resisted by appellee, upon the ground that the note sued on was executed in consideration of the right to sell, in twenty-five counties of the state, exclusively, what was represented to be the "Webb & Camp Patent Automatic Broom Holder," and upon the further consideration that the payees were to furnish promptly, upon order and at agreed prices, such number of the patented articles as might be desired by appellees in the business of selling; and they further allege that payees were never the owners of any such patent as the note was given for, and that the note was procured from them by false and fraudulent representations as to the ownership of the alleged patent, and by other fraudulent devices. They further alleged that under the statute, the note sued on having been executed for the sale of territory for a patent right, it should have had written across the face of it the words "Peddler's note," and not having such indorsement, the note was null and void under the statute, and that appellant was not a purchaser in good faith without notice and before maturity of the consideration of the obligation sued on. All of the affirmative allegations of the answer were denied by reply. The law and facts were submitted to the chancellor for trial, and he made a separate finding of his conclusions of fact, holding that the proof showed that the note sued on was executed for the right to sell a patent automatic broom holder; that the payees, before maturity and for value, assigned it to Bohon; that the proof further conduced to show that Bohon afterwards assigned the note to plaintiff, after receiving full information of the consideration of the note and of all appellees' alleged defenses; that the note was procured by false and fraudulent representations, without valuable consideration; and that it was a peddler's note, and did not have indorsed across the face of it the words "Peddler's note," as required by law. And the chancellor held that the note was absolutely void, and dismissed the petition of appellant. The appeal is from that judgment, and a reversal is asked on the grounds—First, that § 4223 of the Kentucky Statutes is unconstitutional, because it is in conflict with the patent laws of the United States, being an attempt on the part of the legislature to limit the right of a patentee or his assignee to dispose of a right secured to him by the laws of the national government; second, because the note sued on is, by the provisions of § 483 of the Kentucky Statutes, placed upon the footing of a foreign bill of exchange, and, having been discounted in good faith before maturity by plaintiff, appellees are estopped from denying liability.

First, is the statute, requiring persons who sell patent rights to have written across the face of the notes executed to them in consideration therefor the words "Peddler's note," in conflict with the Federal laws? In our opinion it is not, and the statute is valid, because it is only the exercise of a police power which properly belongs to the state. The right to prescribe regulations for the protection of its citizens against fraud and imposition is not taken from the state by the Federal Constitution or by any national statute. On the contrary, it may be considered as having been authoritatively settled that the national government cannot exercise police powers for the protection of the inhabitants of a state. These are local matters, and must be governed and regulated by the state. See United States v. Dewitt, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 41, 19 L. ed. 598; United States v. Reese, 92 U. S. 214, 23 L. ed. 568; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77; Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 3, 27 L. ed. 835; Brechtbill v. Randall, 102 Ind. 528, 52 Am. Rep. 695; Tod v. Wick Bros. 88 Ohio St. 370. In the case of Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S. 501, 24 L. ed. 1115, the court uses this language: "It is true that letters patent, pursuing the words of the statute, do, in terms, grant to the inventor, his heirs and assigns, the exclusive right to make, use, and vend to others his invention or discovery, throughout the United States and the territories thereof. But, obviously, this right is not granted or secured, without reference to the general powers which the several states of the Union unquestionably possess over their purely domestic affairs, whether of internal commerce or of police. . . . By the settled doctrines of this court the police power extends, at least, to the protection of the lives, the health, and the property of the community against the injurious exercise by any citizen of his own rights. State legislation, strictly and legitimately for police purposes, does not, in the sense of the Constitution, necessarily trench upon any authority which has been confided, expressly or by implication, to the national government. . . . This court has never hesitated, by the most rigid rules of construction, to guard the commercial power of Congress against encroachment in the form or under the guise of state regulation, established for the purpose and with the effect of destroying or impairing rights secured by the Constitution. It has, nevertheless, with marked distinctness and uniformity, recognized the necessity, growing out of the fundamental conditions of civil society, of upholding state police regulations which were enacted in good faith, and had appropriate and direct connection with that protection to life, health, and property which each state owes to her citizens." Mr. Cooley says: "In the American constitutional system, the power to establish ordinary regulations of police has been left with the individual states, and cannot be assumed by the national government." Cooley, Const. Lim. *574. There is nothing in this statute which discriminates against the sale of a patent right, nor does it usurp any power of the national government or violate any Federal law, but it simply prescribes a method to secure the citizens of the state from being imposed upon by men who have either no authority to sell patent rights or no patent rights to sell; and it would be monstrous to assert that the vendors of patent rights cannot be restrained by reasonable police regulations, and we are therefore of the opinion that the provisions of the statute, being in the nature of a police regulation, are constitutional and void. Nor does this construction in any wise conflict with the adjudications of this court in the case of Com. v. Petty, 96 Ky. 432, 35 L. R. A.

29 L. R. A. 786, which is referred to and relied on. There it was held that the act requiring persons selling or offering to sell patent rights, or territory for the use, manufacture, and sale of patent rights, to pay a license tax before making such sale, was unconstitutional and void, because, as stated by the learned judge, "if the legislature has authority to require the patentee or his assignees to procure and pay for this privilege, then there is no limit to the extent of such requirements. The legislature could fix the license fee so high that the patentee could not afford to pay it, as it might exceed the commercial value of the right. By this means the legislature of a state utterly destroys the power which is in Congress by the Federal Constitution to 'promote the progress of science and useful arts.'" In this case there is no discrimination against this particular species of property denounced by the statute, and no attempt to prevent its legitimate and proper sale, and it is a proper police regulation. The state legislature has the right to say what paper may be placed upon the footing of a foreign bill of exchange. It is a privilege that has always been exercised, and is purely a creature of the statute. The legislature would unquestionably have the power to repeal § 483, which defines what manner of paper may be placed upon the footing of a foreign bill of exchange, and deprive promissory notes of all the characteristics and privileges of such bills; and certainly it could not be contended in such a case that a promissory note executed in consideration of a patent right granted by the Federal government would be entitled to any higher or greater privileges than other promissory notes. The statute places no restriction on the sale of a patent right. It only attempts to prevent itinerant persons, who are "here to-day and there to-morrow," from practising frauds upon the ignorant and credulous.

Now, as to the second contention made by the defendants, What are the rights of appellant as the bona fide holder of the paper sued on? It may be stated, as a general rule of law, that one who executes a negotiable promissory note, knowing that it is the subject of barter and sale in the commercial world, and does not put into it any words which would give warning to others not to buy it, is estopped from making defense to same after it has passed into the hands of a bank of this state; but there are exceptions to this general rule, and all the decisions agreed that, when the statute in direct terms declares that a note given in violation of its provisions shall be void, it is so, no matter into whose hands it may pass. This doctrine was laid down in the case of Vallett v. Parker, 6 Wend. 615, the court holding that, "wherever the statutes declare notes void, they are, and must be so, in the hands of every holder; but where they are adjudged by the court to be so, for failure, or the illegality of the consideration, they are void only in the hands of the original parties, or those who are chargeable with, or have had the notice of, the consideration." Mr. Daniel, in his work on Negotiable Instruments, draws this distinction very clearly. He says (§ 197): "The bona fide holder for value, who has received the paper in the usual course of business, is unaffected by the fact that it originated in an illegal consideration, without any distinction between cases of illegality founded in moral crimes of turpitude which are termed mala in se, and those founded in positive statutory prohibition which are termed mala prohibita. The law extends this peculiar protection to negotiable instruments because it would seriously embarrass mercantile transactions to expose the trader to the consequences of having the bill or note passed to him impeached for some covert defect. There is, however, one exception to this rule . . . that when a statute expressly or by necessary implication declares the instrument absolutely void, its gathers no vitality by its circulation in respect to the parties executing it; though even upon such instruments an indorser may, as we shall hereafter see, be held liable to a bona fide holder without notice. There are a very few cases in which the statute renders such instruments absolutely void; and the most important, if not the only, instances now to be met with, are the statutes against usury and gaming." In the case of Cochran v. German Ins. Bank, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 196, the superior court held that "a bill or note based upon a gambling consideration is absolutely void, and the drawer or maker is not bound to even an innocent holder;" and in the case of Farmers' & D. Bank v. Unser, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 996, the court says: "The whole current of authority is that the obligor may insist upon the illegality of the contract or consideration, notwithstanding the note is in the hands of an innocent holder for value, in all those cases in which he can point to an express declaration of the legislature that such illegality makes the contract void,"—referring to the cases of Sondheim v. Gilbert, 117 Ind. 71, 5 L. R. A. 482; Chapin v. Dake, 57 Ill. 295, 11 Am. Rep. 15; Snoddy v. American Nat. Bank, 88 Tenn. 573, 7 L. R. A. 705; Cochran v. German Ins. Bank, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 196. "However," the court in that opinion says, "though the note was based on a gambling consideration, the indorsers are liable; for they engaged that the note is a valid and subsisting obligation, binding on all prior parties according to their ostensible relations, and they will be held liable, although the instrument be entirely null and void as between the prior parties themselves, and also as between such prior parties and bona fide holders without notice,"—referring to Daniel, Neg. Inst. We therefore conclude that § 4223 violates no constitutional rights of those selling patent rights granted by the national government, and that the legislature had the power to require the words "Peddler's note," to be written across the face of all notes executed for articles sold by a peddler or itinerant person as prescribed in § 4116 of the Kentucky Statutes, and to declare them null and void for failure to conform to this requirement. But the statute only requires the words "Peddler's note," to be written across notes given for articles sold by a peddler or an itinerant person. It does not apply to a vendor who has a fixed place of business. The fact that the vendor was an itinerant person is a necessary allegation to sustain this defense. There is no averment, either in the original or amended answer, that the payees of the note sued on were itinerant persons, or peddlers, at the time of the sale of the patent right or the execution of the note in contest. The allegation of the petition, that the note "is what is denominated, under the laws of Kentucky, a 'peddler's note,'" is a mere legal conclusion. And without this averment and proof of it, the note is not void under the provisions of § 4223. The demurrer of plaintiff to defendants' answer should have been sustained for this reason. Nor does this fact appear anywhere in the record.

Wherefore the cause is reversed and remanded, with instructions to sustain the demurrer of plaintiff, allow defendants to amend if they desire, and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

C. MILLER'S SONS et al.

(.....Ky.....)

1. It is not unlawful for the undertakers of a community to associate themselves together and agree to refuse to render service in their business to one who has refused or failed to pay a bill due to some member of the association for similar service previously rendered.
2. An action for damages cannot be maintained against members of an undertakers' association for refusal to furnish materials or render services at a funeral for one who has refused or failed to pay for such services previously rendered by some member of the association.
3. One has the right to decline to enter into a business undertaking with another person, and any number of persons can enter into an agreement by which they can decline to assume business relations with or enter into any contract with one or more persons.

Paynter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, Brewster, is a citizen of Louisville. From the allegations of the petition, there is an association in that city known as the "Funeral Directors' Association." The defendants in this action are undertakers, and members of the association, except the defendant the Louisville Coffin Company, which is engaged in the business of manufacturing caskets. On the 10th of December, 1893, the wife of the plaintiff died. He went to the defendant C. Miller's Sons to engage their services, and to buy articles necessary for her burial. They refused to accept employment or furnish the articles necessary for that purpose, because, as they claimed, the plaintiff was indebted to them in the sum of $52 for burying his father. The defendants other than the coffin company refused to perform the necessary services and furnish the necessary articles for the burial of plaintiff's wife. This refusal was made because of this claim of C. Miller's Sons, that Brewster was indebted to them for previous services, etc., as stated. This is not a suit for the violation of a contract made by either of the defendants, but because they would not enter into one with the plaintiff, and furnish the services and the materials which he desired. It is alleged that the Funeral Directors' Association is a trust and confederation, and, by reason of the terms and purposes of the trust, combination, and conspiracy, the defendants refused to furnish any of the materials or render services necessary for the burial of the plaintiff's wife, and that the defendants refused for the purpose of enforcing, by duress and oppression, the collection of the debt due C. Miller's Sons. The articles of the association and by-laws, which plaintiff claims make it an unlawful trust and a combination in restraint of trade, are as follows: Article 5 of the constitution reads: "Each and every member of this association who shall, either directly or indirectly, sell, exchange, give, or hire any part of his goods or equipments to or from, or in any way aid or assist, any funeral director or branch establishment, not a member of this association, shall on conviction thereof, after a fair and an impartial trial, be fined for each and every offense as provided in article 6 of this constitution." Section 1 of article 6 reads as follows: "If any member of this association be found wilfully guilty of violating any part of this constitution, by-laws, rules, or regulations, that may now or hereafter be adopted for the government of this association, where the penalty is not specified in the laws, shall, if convicted, after a fair and impartial trial and investigation of the same, be fined $10 for the first offense, $20 for the second offense, $50 for the third offense, and expulsion for the fourth offense." Sections 1 and 2 of article 8 read as follows: Section 1: "All manufacturers and dealers in caskets, coffins, and funeral directors' supplies, of every name and nature whatever, are hereby requested not to sell any articles in our line to any funeral director or other parties, for use within the jurisdiction of this association, unless he or they be members hereof in good standing." Section 2: "If any manufacturer, dealer, or traveling salesman of the same shall not fully and in every respect comply with the requirements of § 1 of this article, then we, the members of this association, hereby agree and pledge ourselves to withdraw our patronage from him and the house represented, and will not purchase goods from them." Sections 1 and 2 of article 9 read as follows: Section 1: "All manufacturers, liverymen, and dealers in our line of goods who signify their intention to abide by the constitution, by-laws, rules, and regulations of this association, who shall hold a judgment or an execution for over three months unpaid against a member of this association, for goods or livery work used in their business as funeral directors, are requested to give this association an immediate written notice thereof, stating all facts in the case." Section 2: "Any member of the association who shall have a judgment or an execution standing against him, as described in § 1 of this article, without good and sufficient cause, which shall be decided by the members present at any regular meeting, after a fair and impartial investigation, if it be found that the member has met with no unusual misfortune, he shall be expelled, or shall be given not to exceed ninety days to pay the same, and, if not paid at the expiration of the given time, he shall then be expelled." Section 2 of article 10 reads as follows: "Any member who shall be found guilty of expressing his opinion unfavorably on a reasonable and just bill of any other member to any party not a member hereof, shall, if convicted after a fair trial, be fined according to article 6 of constitution." Article 14 of constitution reads as follows: "That there shall be established by the association a delinquent list, upon which shall be recorded the names of all persons who do not pay their bills. The association shall keep this list and furnish members with all names that are handed to be recorded on the same. The members shall each enter in a book for the purpose (which book shall be furnished to each member by the association) all names, amount of indebtedness, date of bills, and F. D. to whom same is owing, as soon as received from the association." Section 2 of article 4 of the by-laws of said Funeral Directors' Association reads as follows: "The delinquent secretary shall receive from the members a complete list of all the parties who fail to pay their bills for the burial of their dead. He shall record all such names in a proper book procured by the association. He shall enter all lists furnished him in his book and immediately send copy of the same to each member of this association, and all members shall be allowed access to the delinquent secretary's book at any time, and to take a copy of the same should they wish to do so. He shall be allowed $6 for his services." Sections 1, 2, and 4 of article 11 of the by-laws are as follows: Section 1: "Members of this association shall furnish a list to delinquent secretary, from time to time, of all parties who do not pay their bills for the burial of their dead." Section 2: "No member of this association shall wait upon any person who is indebted to any other member of this association until such indebtedness is settled, except it be for the burial of the person so indebted, in which case the undertaker having charge shall use every endeavor to have the old account settled; and any member who shall furnish articles to a person named in the printed 'Delinquent List,' or who shall persist in furnishing goods after having been notified by another member that they are indebted to him, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $50, or a larger amount, at the discretion of the association." Section 4: "No member of this association shall accept any order for goods or work from anyone who has previously called in another member, and with whom said party could not make satisfactory financial arrangements, without said member of the second part paying all claims of said member of the first part, and taking all chances for collection on his own responsibility, as no protection will be afforded him through the medium of the delinquent list." Sections 1, 2, 6, 7, and 9 of article 12 are as follows: Section 1: "Any member of this association who shall purchase goods of any manufacturer, dealer, or jobber who is not a member of or recognized by the National Burial Case Association shall be fined in the sum of $50." Section 2: "Whenever there shall be a member of this association located in a suburban village or town, where there is a local cemetery, said members shall, if they desire, have the association establish a price for hearses and carriages to said cemetery but in no case shall said member or members be allowed to hire hearses and carriages for less than the published price list to any cemetery other than the ones mentioned in said exceptions, and any violation of the above section shall be punished according to article 6 of the constitution." Section 6: "Whenever a member of this association shall be called upon to superintend a funeral for which he does not furnish a case or a casket, a charge shall be made of not less than $5 for personal services, and a reasonable larger amount shall be charged should the engagement require extra attention; and any neglect to make such charge shall lay the member so doing liable to penalties, as per article 6 of constitution." Section 7: "All members of this association are allowed to make a discount of 5 per cent on all funeral bills when a case or casket is furnished, when said bills are paid within 80 days from the date of burial; and any excess of 5 per cent is positively prohibited, and no discount shall be allowed on bills where no case or casket is furnished." Section 9: It shall be the duty of each member of this association, should he know of any other member of this association who is violating the constitution, by laws, rules, or regulations, to report the same with proof to the executive committee."

It is contended that the association is a violation of § 8915 of chapter 101 of the Kentucky Statutes, which reads as follows: "That if any corporation under the laws of Kentucky, or under the laws of any other state or country, for transacting or conducting any kind of business in this state, or any partnership company, firm, or individual, or other association of persons, shall create, establish, organize, or enter into, or become a member of, or a party to, or in any way interested in any pool, trust, combine, agreement, confederation, or understanding with any other corporation, partnership, individual, or person or association of persons for the purpose of regulating or controlling or fixing the price of any merchandise, manufactured articles, or property of any kind, or shall enter into, become a member of, or party to, or in any way interested in any pool, agreement, contract, understanding, combination, or confederation having for its object the fixing or in any way limiting the amount or quantity of any article of property, commodity, or merchandise to be produced or manufactured, mined, bought, or sold, shall be deemed guilty of the crime of conspiracy, and punished therefor as provided in the subsequent sections of this act." Section 8917 of this chapter imposes a penalty, by way of fine or imprisonment, or both, for the violation of § 8915. Section 8918 declares that a contract, agreement, or understanding in violation of provisions of the sections of this act shall be null and void; and any purchasers of property or article, or of any commodity, from any individual, company, or corporation transacting business contrary to the sections of the act, shall not be liable for the price or payment of such article or commodity or property, and may plead and rely on the act as a complete defense to any suit for such price or payment.

It is hardly necessary to observe that this is not an indictment against the members of the Funeral Directors' Association for the violation of § 8915, nor is it an action to enforce any contract or agreement made in violation of that section or the chapter of which it is a part. This association may be guilty (which we do not decide, as the question does not arise here) of the violation of this chapter of the Kentucky statutes, and yet the plaintiff would not have a cause of action against the members thereof. Although the association might control and fix the price of property, merchandise, etc., and in so doing be guilty of a violation of the statute, yet, if they refused to sell such merchandise or property, it does not follow that one could maintain an action for damages, because of their refusal to sell to him. As we have said, this action asserts a claim for damages, because they would not enter into a business transaction with him. The only question which we have to consider in this case is as to whether the plaintiff is entitled to maintain this action for such refusal. Some of the purposes of the association, as expressed in its articles, could be in violation of this chapter of the Kentucky statute, yet other articles of the association might not be in violation of it, and the purposes, as expressed in them, be entirely proper and legal. The part of the articles which we feel is pertinent to the consideration of the question involved in this case is that which declares that no member of the association shall wait upon any person who is indebted to any other member of the association until such indebtedness is settled, except it may be for the burial of the person so indebted, and that, where a member violates such provision of the laws of the association, he is to be fined a given amount. We think Mr. Addison lays down the correct rule in his work on Torts, when he says, in vol. 2, § 850: "A criminal proceeding by way of indictment lies for the mere act of conspiring; but a civil action is not maintainable unless the plaintiff has been aggrieved, or has sustained 'actual legal damage' by some overt act done in pursuance of the conspiracy." So, even if some of the articles of this association constitute a trust or conspiracy, still, if there was no overt act done in pursuance of such illegal provisions which produced "actual legal damage" to the plaintiff, he could not maintain his action. It would be a question with which the state should deal. We do not think the article of association which we have said was pertinent to this inquiry is in violation of the statute, or an offense at common law. It simply provides that the members of the association are not to render services for or furnish burial material to any person who has become indebted to a member of the association, and fails or refuses to discharge it. One has the right to decline to enter into a business undertaking with anyone. The law does not impose such an obligation upon anyone. This being true, any number of persons can enter into an agreement by which they can decline to assume business relations with or to enter into any contract with one or more persons. If Brewster was indebted to Miller's Sons, then they had the right to decline to give him an opportunity to increase his indebtedness or to refuse to furnish material for the burial of his wife, unless he paid the claim which Miller's Sons asserted against him. As those who are members of the Funeral Directors' Association, for a good reason, or for no reason, had the right to decline to render services or furnish burial material, and, if they saw proper, to decline to render services because Miller's Sons asserted a claim against Brewster, their refusal creates no legal liability against them. It is immaterial, so far as Brewster is concerned, as to what reasons may have influenced them to decline employment, or to refuse to furnish the burial material which he desired. Miller's Sons might have asserted a claim against Brewster which had foundation in neither morals nor law; yet if the members of the association other than Miller's Sons chose to be influenced by it, and to decline the employment, etc., Brewster has no cause of action against them. This is not an action against Miller's Sons for libel or slander, neither is it one against members of the association for libel or slander, but, as we have said, was for an alleged conspiracy, etc., of the members of the Funeral Directors' Association. There is no claim asserted for damage to his personal character or business reputation. Cooley, Torts, p. 278: "It is a part of every man's civil rights that he be left at liberty to refuse business relations with any person whomsoever, whether the refusal rests upon reason, or is the result of whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice. With his reasons neither the public nor third persons have any legal concern." Again, on page 688, he says: "The exercise by one man of his legal right cannot be a legal wrong to another. . . . Whatever one has a right to do another can have no right to complain of." Heywood v. Tillson, 75 Me. 225, 46 Am. Rep. 373, and Payne v. Western & A. R. Co. 13 Lea. 507, 49 Am. Rep. 666, are to the same effect. Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 225, 21 L. R. A. 337, the court said: "No case can be found in which it was ever held that, at common law, a contract or agreement in general restraint of trade was actionable at the instance of third parties, or could constitute the foundation for such an action. The courts sometimes call such contracts 'unlawful,' or 'illegal,' but in every instance it will be found that these terms were used in the sense merely of 'void' or 'unenforceable,' as between the parties; the law considering the disadvantage so imposed upon the contract a sufficient protection to the public." It was also held in Schulten v. Bavarian Brewing Co. 96 Ky. 224, that it was not unlawful for a number of persons to associate themselves together to protect themselves by lawful acts from dishonest debtors; that an agreement similar to the one in question in this case, that they would not sell to one who was indebted to the association, was lawful, and for which no action could be maintained. It was contended in that case, as in this, that the association was trying to compel the payment of a debt, by duress, which was asserted against the plaintiff. In Schulten v. Bavarian Brewing Co. the court held that there was not a sufficient denial that the plaintiff was indebted, in the sum claimed, to the member of the association, but the court said: "If he was not indebted to the defendant, the Bavarian Brewing Company, then the defendants were guilty of an unlawful act in trying to make him pay something he did not owe, by refusing to sell him beer." The court did not in that case say what would be a legal consequence of an unlawful act in trying to make him pay something which he did not owe. If a conspiracy had existed in that case or in this case to have compelled the party, by duress, to pay a sum which he did not owe, and under such force he had paid it, unquestionably an action could have been maintained to recover the sum so paid. Had the conspiracy succeeded in either case, then the damage sustained would have been the amount which had been wrongfully taken from him. The action would be to recover money tortiously obtained. The case of Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287, cited by counsel for appellant, sustains this conclusion. That was an action to recover money which a party had been forced to pay by an unlawful conspiracy. In that case a mechanic was under the necessity to employ workmen to carry on his business, and by this conspiracy, in order to obtain a sum of money from him, which he was under no legal liability to pay, induced the workmen to leave his employment by deterring or threatening to deter others from entering it, so as to render him reasonably apprehensive that he could not carry on business without paying the money demanded. The court in that case permitted him to recover the money which he had thus paid. The court said in that case: "It is no crime for any number of persons, without an unlawful object in view, to associate themselves together and agree that they will not work for or deal with certain men or classes of men, or work under a certain price, or without certain conditions."

If it be true, as plaintiff alleges, that the article of the association to which we have called attention was to force him to pay a debt which he did not owe, still no cause of action existed, as he did not pay the money demanded. A party may engage in the grocery business, selling the necessities of life, and a hungry, starving man might call at his place of business, and seek to buy such articles of food as he needs; and, while we would say it was inhuman for the grocerman to refuse to sell him, yet it could not be said that his refusal was unlawful, and a cause of action could not be maintained against him for such refusal. When one desires to bury his dead, it may be an unfeeling act for an undertaker to refuse to furnish necessary material and necessary services to accomplish it; still his refusal to do so does not impose any legal liability upon him. Undertakers are approached by those in great bereavement, who desire their services to inter their dead. Under such circumstances, they do not feel disposed to demand, in advance, compensation. Regard for the feelings of those so bereaved forbids that they do so. However, if one has on a previous occasion received the services of the undertaker, and his material, and has refused or failed to pay the bill, it is certainly not unreasonable to refuse to permit him to increase his indebtedness or to render him services. To afford mutual protection against such persons, it is not unlawful for the undertakers of the community to associate themselves together, and agree to refuse to render a like service to one who has refused or failed to pay such expenses in the past to some member of the association. There is no allegation that Brewster ever applied to the Louisville Coffin Company for the necessary material to bury his wife, but sought to make them liable, because, as is alleged, it would not sell any of the articles dealt in by it to any funeral director to use in Jefferson county unless he should be a member of the "Funeral Directors' Association of the Fall Cities." There is no law which attempts to regulate as to whom an individual or corporation shall sell articles of merchandise, such as coffins, etc. In this opinion we do not express any views as to whether the members of the Funeral Directors' Association have been guilty of a violation of chapter 101, Ky. Stat., in the matter of regulating and fixing the price of merchandise, etc., but we simply pass upon the question before us, which is as to the right of the plaintiff to maintain this action.

The judgment is affirmed.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Alcaeus HOOPER, Mayor of Baltimore, et al., Appts.,
v.

BALTIMORE CITY PASSENGER RAILWAY COMPANY.

(35 Md. 509.)

A street railway company has the right to use the trolley system without the sanction of the mayor and city council where its charter authorizes it to use "any motive power and means of traction which the mayor and city council may sanction or which shall be authorized to be made use of in the city . . . by another corporation exercising street-railway franchises thereon" and the legislature has subsequently given express authority to other companies to use the trolley system in that city.

(April 1, 1897.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City enjoining them from interfering with plaintiff's attempt to change the motive power of its railway system. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas G. Hayes, Thomas J. Elliott, and Williams & Williams for appellants.

Messrs. Arthur W. Machen and Bernard Carter for appellee.

Fowler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Nearly four years ago the Baltimore City Passenger Railway Company filed a bill in the circuit court of Baltimore city, for an injunction to restrain the then mayor of the city of Baltimore and others from preventing or obstructing the erection on Baltimore street or any other street in the city of Baltimore, along the lines of any of that company's railway tracks, of suitable iron poles for the use of what is known as the "trolley system." To the bill just referred to the then defendants demurred. But after a full hearing, this demurrer was overruled, and it was held, in conformity with the opinion of the learned judge below, that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief prayed, that is to say, that the Baltimore City Passenger Railway Company had the right under its charter to use the trolley system of propelling its cars on Baltimore street or on any other street in that city on which it had its tracks.

From that decree no appeal was taken and the railway company at once proceeded to introduce the trolley system on its Baltimore street and some other lines. Recently, desiring to discontinue the cable system on its blue line, and in its place to use the trolley system, it was preparing to make the change, and for that purpose, in compliance with certain city ordinances, permission was sought from and given to it by the city commissioner to erect iron trolley poles, but the appellant, as mayor of Baltimore city, refused to allow poles to be erected as requested. Whereupon the railway company filed the bill in this case, which makes substantially the same allegations that are made in the former bill, and also alleges that the appellant intended to make use of the authority of his official position and of his influence with the police of the city to prevent said company from making the desired change in its method of traction and motive power, and that such intended forcible obstruction of the proposed work was unlawful, not only because it was an unjustifiable interference with the rights and privileges of said company granted to it by the legislature, but also because it was contrary to the decree passed in the former case.

The court below ordered the injunction prayed for to issue, and the mayor and the other defendants have appealed.

Although much was said at the hearing as to the binding effect in this case of the decree in the former case, and it was very earnestly contended by the appellee company that these appellants are concluded by it, we will not stop to consider any of the preliminary or technical questions arising out of the attempted application of the doctrine of res judicata, for we are all of opinion that conceding, as contended by the appellants, that the former decreed has no force or effect whatever in this case, the facts appearing in this bill, and the answer and exhibits, and the laws and ordinances by which the rights and duties of the respective parties are to be determined, fully warrant the decree appealed from. We will proceed to state the grounds of our conclusion.

The Baltimore City Passenger Railway Company, the appellee in this case, is the oldest company of the kind in the city of Baltimore, having been the first one incorporated by the legislature of Maryland (chap. 71 of the Acts of 1861-1862). Ever since its incorporation it has owned and used several railway tracks laid in the streets of that city. Under its original charter the appellee was authorized to use horses as a motive power, but by an amendment thereof, by the act of 1890, chap. 271, it was authorized to use improved methods of traction and motive power different from horses upon its railways, and to increase its capital for that purpose. By the 1st section of this act it was authorized to "use upon any or all of its railway tracks in the city of Baltimore any cable system or other system of propulsion by means of stationary engines, any pneumatic motors, stored electricity motors, and any motive power and means of traction which the mayor and the city council may sanction, or which shall be authorized to be made use of in the city of Baltimore by any other corporation exercising street railway franchises thereon."

Since the passage of the foregoing act almost all, if not all, the street railway companies have been authorized to use the trolley system. And in the case of the traction company the legislature has by the act of 1892, chap. 210, authorized it "to place and use upon any or all of its tracks" the trolley system. Also by an act of the same year, chapter 282, the Baltimore, Hampden, & Lake Roland Company was given authority to propel its cars in certain streets by the same system. It would seem to follow clearly from the act of 1890, chap. 271, and the subsequent action of the city, and the legislature in authorizing the other companies to use the trolley system that the appellee is by the very words of that act empowered to use that system on "any or all of its tracks in the city of Baltimore." But in answer to what appears to be the plain meaning of the act in question, the appellants contend, first, that the act of 1890, chap. 370, which was passed at the same session and approved on the same day as the act of 1890, chap. 271, repealed or modified chapter 271 so that the right to use the trolley system conferred by the legislature upon the appellee company cannot be exercised by it without the consent of the mayor; second, that even if the act of 1890, chap. 271, gave to the appellee the power to use the trolley system on its tracks in Baltimore city, the power so conferred "is limited to a grant of the kind of motive power which may be used, and not to the mode and appliances to be placed in the streets of the city in order to use such power;" and third that express power has been conferred upon the mayor and city council to require all telegraph, telephone, electric light, or other wires to be placed underground after such reasonable notice as they may prescribe.

1. It would seem to be too clear for controversay that the appellee has a right by virtue of legislative grant to use the trolley system, whatever that may be. Nor is it to be supposed that the legislature would grant this right, and that, too, in the language in which the grant is made to the appellee, and at the same time place it in the power of the mayor to destroy this right, not by any affirmative action, but merely by refusing to give his assent to the erection of iron poles. The right to use this system is given to the appellee in two ways, first, it may use any system of propulsion by means of stationary engines, and second, it may use any system of propulsion which shall be authorized to be used by any other street-railway company in Baltimore city. We cannot believe that the legislature intended to give to the mayor any such power as is claimed for him here. For, it must be remembered that this is not the case of a corporation upon which the legislature has merely conferred a franchise, the exercise of which in the city of Baltimore may depend upon the consent of the mayor, or of the municipality, but this appellee by virtue of its charter had been for many years before the act of 1890 in the full exercise of its franchises in the streets of Baltimore subject, of course, to the right of the city to regulate the use of its streets.

If, therefore, as we have said, and as seems to us must be conceded, the act of 1890, chap. 271, operated as a legislative grant to the appellee to use that something which is called the trolley system, it necessarily follows that the mayor and city council cannot qualify or abridge that grant, nor, of course, could the mayor alone, by refusing to issue a permit to place the poles, make that unlawful which the legislature had declared to be lawful. In the case of State, Baltimore, C. & P. B. R. Co., v. Latrobe, 81 Md. 222, McSherry, Ch. J., delivering the opinion of the court, it is said "if the act to be done be a lawful one and be sanctioned by legislative enactment . . . and if the person or body corporate proposing to do it be duly empowered to perform it, the mayor and city commissioner cannot, nor can either of them, make the act illegal or prevent its performance by refusing to issue a permit."

2. But in answer to this view, it is contended by the appellants that by a fair and reasonable construction of the act of 1890, chap. 271, the legislature conferred upon the appellee only the right to use a certain kind of motive power, and that the legislative grant did not include the mode of construction and appliances to be placed in the street, and therefore the mayor has the right, and it is his duty, under the circumstances of this case, to refuse to permit the appellee to do that which it has no right to do. We think, however, that this view and the distinction on which it is based are more ingenious than sound. It will be observed that the grant to the appellee includes both, "any motive power," as well as "any means of traction," authorized to be used by the other companies. The motive power which the appellee proposes to use and which it is conceded it has been authorized to use is electricity, and the means by which that motive power is to be made available are stationary engines, and overhead wires. This appellee has been for some years using on its blue line what is known and what is called in the act of 1890

"the cable system," which is generally understood to imply a stationary engine and an underground cable, and the "trolley system," which the traction company was authorized to use, and which, therefore, this company has the right to use, is just as generally understood to imply the use of a stationary engine and overhead wires strung on poles. We cannot suppose that when the legislature granted to the appellee the right to use the "trolley system," as it undoubtedly did, it did not intend to include in its grant the right to use overhead wires and suitable poles, which are the distinctive characteristics of that system. If we are correct in the meaning and force we have attributed to the expression "trolley system," it follows that when the legislature gave the traction company permission to use this system on all its tracks in the city of Baltimore it at the same time authorized the use of overhead wires and poles. We cannot suppose that a different meaning is to be attached to these words when construing the grant made to the appellee. Without discussing this question further we think it very clear that the legislature intended to permit the appellee to use the trolley system, and that this system as generally understood, and, therefore, as authorized to be used by the act of 1890, chap. 271, includes electricity as a motive power and overhead wires and poles as a means of traction. Legislative grants either to individuals or corporations are not to be weakened or destroyed by strained or unreasonable constructions of statutes, based upon ingenious suggestions and theories. The right to use the trolley system, granted to the appellee in express terms, is not to be taken from it because, in the opinion of the appellants, some other system may be more desirable and safer, nor because the mayor refuses to do what it is his duty to do, namely, to grant the permit which it was also the duty of the appellee to request. If the trolley system is so dangerous to the public safety and so objectionable as was contended, the legislature, or the municipality, if power has been given to it, and not the mayor alone, should correct the alleged evil.

3. It was also urged that if the mayor or the city had not the power claimed for him, the act of 1890, chap. 270, which gave the city power to require all wires to be placed under ground would be nugatory. But the effect of that act is not in any manner involved in this case. The power conferred by it has not yet been exercised, and the only ordinance which thus far has been proposed to be passed in pursuance thereof "to construct a general system of conduits under the streets for the reception of wires" expressly excepts trolley lines." Doubtless, when the city of Baltimore determines to exercise, through its mayor and city council, the power given it by the legislature, to order all wires to be placed under ground, it will be able to do so without difficulty, but whether this be so or not, we cannot now determine. It is sufficient for the present purpose to say that neither the appellee, nor any of the railway companies using the overhead wires in Baltimore city, have been yet required to place them under ground.

It follows that the decree appealed from must be affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Margaret C. SPADE

v.

LYNN & BOSTON RAILROAD COMPANY.

(108 Mass. 283.)

No recovery for fright, terror, alarm, anxiety, or distress of mind, even if these result in physical injury, can be had in an action for negligence, where there are no physical injuries except those caused solely by the mental disturbance.

(May 19, 1897.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action to recover damages for injury from fright alleged to have been caused by its negligence, which resulted in a verdict for plaintiff. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. K. Cobb, for defendant:

Serious fright of an apparently healthy spectator is not the natural consequence of taking a man by the collar and pulling him a few feet through the door of a car, much less a serious bodily injury resulting from such fright.

Victorian R. Comrs. v. Coultas, L. R. 18 App. Cas. 223; Ewing v. Pittsburgh, C. O. & St. L. R. Co. 147 Pa. 40, 14 L. R. A. 686; Haile v. Texas & P. R. Co. 28 U. S. App. 80, 60 Fed. Rep. 557, 23 L. R. A. 774; Scheffer v. Washington City, V. M. & G. S. R. Co. 105 U. S. 249, 252, 26 L. ed. 1070, 1071; Renner v. Canfield, 86 Minn. 90; Phillips v. Dickerson, 85 Ill. 11, 28 Am. Rep. 607.

Although the defendant might have anticipated fright as the result of its act, it had no reason to anticipate that fright could operate to produce bodily injury or disease.

Haile v. Texas & P. R. Co. 28 U. S. App. 80, 60 Fed. Rep. 560, 23 L. R. A. 774.

The law does not recognize the kind of damage suffered by the plaintiff in this case as the foundation of liability, on grounds of public policy.

There can be no recovery for mental fright and suffering unaccompanied by any injury to the person.

Negligence is not actionable, unless it results in damage.

Hale, Damages, p. 11; Brunsdon v. Humphrey, L. R. 14 Q. B. Div. 141.

Messrs. Sherman L. Whipple and William R. Sears, for plaintiff:

As the relation between fright and injury to the nervous and brain structures of the body is a matter which depends entirely upon scientific and medical testimony, it is impossible for any court to lay down as a matter of law that if negligence caused fright, and such fright in its turn so affects such structures as to cause injury to health, such injury cannot be a consequence which in the ordinary course of things would flow from the negligence, unless such injury accompanied such negligence in point of time.

Unless there is a distinction between a mental and nervous shock, then "nervous shock in animals, apart from physical contact like nervous or mental shock in human beings, will not give ground for action." But it has been held that a negligent act, without actual physical contact, which frightens a horse and causes him to bolt so that he is injured, is a ground of action.

Beven, Neg. p. 78, and cases cited in note 3; Pugh v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. [1896] 2 Q. B. 248.

The leading text-writers are nearly unanimous in condemning the decision in the case of Victorian R. Comrs. v. Coultas, L. R. 18 App. Cas. 223.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents a question which has not heretofore been determined in this commonwealth, and in respect to which the decisions elsewhere have not been uniform. It is this: Whether, in an action to recover damages for an injury sustained through the negligence of another, there can be a recovery for a bodily injury caused by mere fright and mental disturbance. The jury were instructed that a person cannot recover for mere fright, fear, or mental distress, occasioned by the negligence of another, which does not result in bodily injury, but that, when the fright or fear or nervous shock produces a bodily injury, there may be a recovery for that bodily injury, and for all the pain, mental or otherwise, which may arise out of that bodily injury. In Canning v. Williamstown, 1 Cush. 451, it was held, in an action against a town to recover damages for an injury sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of a defective bridge, that he could not recover if he sustained no injury to his person, but merely incurred risk and peril which caused fright and mental suffering. In Warren v. Boston & M. R. Co. 163 Mass. 484, the evidence tended to show that the defendant's train struck the carriage of the plaintiff, thereby throwing him out upon the ground; and it was held to be a physical injury to the person to be thrown out of a wagon, or to be compelled to jump out, even although the harm consists mainly of nervous shock. It was not, therefore, a case of mere fright, and resulting nervous shock. The case calls for a consideration of the real ground upon which the liability or nonliability of a defendant guilty of negligence in a case like the present depends. The exemption from liability for mere fright, terror, alarm, or anxiety does not rest on the assumption that these do not constitute an actual injury. They do in fact deprive one of enjoyment and of comfort, cause real suffering, and, to a greater or less extent, disqualify one for the time being from doing the duties of life. If these results flow from a wrongful or negligent act, a recovery therefor cannot be denied on the ground that the injury is fanciful and not real. Nor can it be maintained that these results may not be the direct and immediate consequence of the negligence. Danger excites alarm. Few people are wholly insensible to the emotion caused by imminent danger, though some are less affected than others. It must also be admitted that a timid or sensitive person may suffer, not only in mind, but also in body, from such a cause. Great emotion may, and sometimes does, produce physical effects. The action of the heart, the circulation of the blood, the temperature of the body, as well as the nerves and the appetite, may all be affected. A physical injury may be directly traceable to fright, and so may be caused by it. We cannot say, therefore, that such consequences may not flow proximately from unintentional negligence; and, if compensation in damages may be recovered for a physical injury so caused, it is hard, on principle, to say why there should not also be a recovery for the mere mental suffering when not accompanied by any perceptible physical effects. It would seem, therefore, that the real reason for refusing damages sustained from mere fright must be something different, and it probably rests on the ground that in practice it is impossible satisfactorily to administer any other rule. The law must be administered in the courts according to general rules. Courts will aim to make these rules as just as possible, bearing in mind that they are to be of general application. But as the law is a practical science, having to do with the affairs of life, any rule is unwise if, in its general application, it will not, as a usual result, serve the purposes of justice. A new rule cannot be made for each case, and there must therefore be a certain generality in rules of law, which in particular cases may fail to meet what would be desirable if the single case were alone to be considered. Rules of law respecting the recovery of damages are framed with reference to the just rights of both parties,—not merely what it might be right for an injured person to receive, to afford just compensation for his injury, but also what it is just to compel the other party to pay. One cannot always look to others to make compensation for injuries received. Many accidents occur, the consequences of which the sufferer must bear alone. And, in determining the rules of law by which the right to recover compensation for unintended injury from others is to be governed, regard must chiefly be paid to such conditions as are usually found to exist. Not only the transportation of passengers and the running of trains, but the general conduct of business and of the ordinary affairs of life, must be done on the assumption that persons who are liable to be affected thereby are not peculiarly sensitive, and are of ordinary physical and mental strength. If, for example, a traveler is sick or infirm, delicate in health, specially nervous or emotional, liable to be upset by slight causes, and therefore requiring precautions which are not usual or practicable for travelers in general, notice should be given, so that, if reasonably practicable, arrangements may be made accordingly, and extra care be observed. But as a general rule a carrier of passengers is not bound to anticipate or to guard against an injurious result which would only happen to a person of peculiar sensitiveness. This limitation of liability for injury of another description is intimated in Alsop v. Alsop, 5 Hurlst. & N. 584, 539. One may be held bound to anticipate and guard against the probable consequences to ordinary people, but to carry the rule of damages further imposes an undue measure of responsibility upon those who are guilty only of unintentional negligence. The general rule limiting damages in such a case to the natural and probable consequences of the acts done is of wide application, and has often been expressed and applied. Lombard v. Lennox, 155 Mass. 70; White v. Dresser, 185 Mass. 150, 46 Am. Rep. 454; Hillebroun v. Hoar, 124 Mass. 580; Derry v. Flitner, 118 Mass. 181; Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 475, 24 L. ed. 256, 259; Wyman v. Leavitt, 71 Me. 227, 36 Am. Rep. 803; Ellis v. Cleveland, 55 Vt. 358; Phillips v. Dickerson, 85 Ill. 11, 28 Am. Rep. 607; Jones v. Fields, 57 Iowa, 817; Renner v. Canfield, 86 Minn. 90; Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 577, 591, 595, 598; The Notting Hill, L. R. 9 Prob. Div. 105; Hobbs v. London, & S. W. R. Co. L. R. 10 Q. B. 11, 122.

The law of negligence, in its special application to cases of accidents, has received great development in recent years. The number of actions brought is very great. This should lead courts well to consider the grounds on which claims for compensation properly rest, and the necessary limitations of the right to recover. We remain satisfied with the rule that there can be no recovery for fright, terror, alarm, anxiety, or distress of mind, if these are unaccompanied by some physical injury; and, if this rule is to stand, we think it should also be held that there can be no recovery for such physical injuries as may be caused solely by such mental disturbance, where there is no injury to the person from without. The logical vindication of this rule is that it is unreasonable to hold persons who are merely negligent bound to anticipate and guard against fright and the consequences of fright, and that this would open a wide door for unjust claims, which could not successfully be met.

These views are supported by the following decisions: Victorian R. Comrs. v. Coultas, L. R. 13 App. Cas. 222; Mitchell v. Rochester R. Co. 151 N. Y. 107, 84 L. R. A. 781; Ewing v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 147 Pa. 40, 14 L. R. A. 666; Haile v. Texas & P. R. Co. 9 C. C. A. 184, 23 U. S. App. 80, 60 Fed. Rep. 557, 28 L. R. A. 774. In the following cases a different view was taken: Bell v. Great Northern R. Co. L. R. Ir. 26 C. L. 428; Purcell v. St. Paul City R. Co. 48 Minn. 134, 16 L. R. A. 203; Fitzpatrick v. Great Western R. Co. 12 U. C. Q. B. 645. See also Beven, Neg. 77 et seq. It is hardly necessary to add that this decision does not reach those classes of action where an intention to cause mental distress or to hurt the feelings is shown, or is reasonably to be inferred, as, for example, in cases of seduction, slander, malicious prosecution, or arrest, and some others. Nor do we include cases of acts done with gross carelessness or recklessness, showing utter indifference to such consequences, when they must have been in the actor's mind. Lombard v. Lennox, and Fillebrown v. Hoar, already cited; Meagher v. Driscoll, 99 Mass. 281, 96 Am. Dec. 759. In the present case no such considerations entered into the rulings, or were presented by the facts.

The entry therefore must be: Exceptions sustained.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT

Nathan P. HUNT, Receiver of People's Fire Insurance Company,

NEW HAMPSHIRE FIRE UNDERWRITERS' ASSOCIATION.

GRANITE STATE INSURANCE COMPANY, Intervener.

(.....N. H.)

1. The liability of a reinsurer is not lessened by the insolvency of an intermediate insurer which has become unable to pay the loss, but the reinsurer's liability is for the entire amount of the loss against which they agreed to indemnify the prior insurer.
2. A reinsurer may be required to pay the amount of the loss which it is liable for directly to the insured or the party ultimately entitled to the money, when the prior insurer which it has indemnified has become insolvent.

ACTION by the receiver of the People's Fire Insurance Company to recover an amount of reinsurance upon a loss which that company had in turn reinsured for the Granite State Insurance Company. Judgment for the intervener.

The Boston & Maine Railroad Company took a policy with the Granite State Insurance Company for $25,000, that company reinsured one third of the risk with the People's Fire Insurance Company, and the New Hampshire Fire Underwriters' Association reinsured one half of the risk of the People's Company. The defendant's contract provided that loss, if any, was to be settled and paid pro rata with the reinsured and at same time and place and upon the same terms and conditions. A loss to the amount of $2,800 having occurred, the Granite State paid the amount. The People's Fire Insurance Company having become insolvent, its receiver instituted this suit to compel payment of the reinsurance of its risk, and the Granite State Company intervened claiming that the amount of the defendant's liability should be paid to it.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. David Cross, for plaintiff:

It makes no difference whether the plaintiff shall hereafter have the ability to pay and shall pay the whole, or a per cent, and the defendant is liable to pay the amount owed by it without regard to the ability of the People's Company.

Actual payment of the loss by the reinsured is not a condition precedent to payment by the reinsurer, and a right of action begins as soon as the legal liability as to the amount is determined.

Wood, Ins. § 87; Blackstone v. Alemannia F. Ins. Co. 56 N. Y. 106; Biddle, Ins. § 384; Eagle Ins. Co. v. Lafayette Ins. Co. 9 Ind. 443; Gantt v. American Cent. Ins. Co. 68 Mo. 503; Fame Ins. Co.'s Appeal, 83 Pa. 396; Norwood v. Resolute F. Ins. Co. 4 Jones & S. 552.

In Illinois Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Andes Ins. Co. 67 Ill. 362, 16 Am. Rep. 620, the question was the extent of the liability of the reinsurer to the insured. The insurer was insolvent, and had paid 10 cents on the dollar, and the court held that to be the extent of the reinsurer's liability.

Hone v. Mutual Safety Ins. Co. 1 Sandf. 137.

But in Consolidated Real Estate & F. Ins. Co. v. Cashow, 41 Md. 74, it is decided that the reinsurer is liable to pay the whole amount of reinsurance without regard to the amount paid by the original insurer.

Messrs. Leach & Stevens for defendant.

Carpenter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is no suggestion that the action is brought for the benefit of the Granite State.

NOTE.—As to reinsurance, see also Fancuil Hall Ins. Co. v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. (Mass.) 10 L. R. A. 423, and note thereto; also German-American Ins. Co. v. Commercial F. Ins. Co. (Ala.) 16 L. 88 L. R. A.

R. A. 291; Union Ins. Co. v. American F. Ins. Co. (Cal.) 28 L. R. A. 692; Chalarton v. Insurance Co. of N. A. (La. Ann.) 36 L. R. A. 742.

The question presented is whether the defendants are bound to pay to the People's Company the entire amount of the loss against which they agreed to indemnify the People's, or only such a part thereof as the insolvent People's may ultimately pay. The defendants received a full consideration for the risk against which they insured, and there is no reason why they should not be required to pay the full amount of the loss. Blackstone v. Alemania F. Ins. Co. 56 N. Y. 106. The premiums received by them, and the sum to be paid by them in case of loss, were intended to be, and in theory of law are, precisely equivalent. King v. State Mut. F. Ins. Co. 7 Cush. 1, 9, 54 Am. Dec. 688. Their position is, in legal effect, the same as it would be if the People's, for the purpose of paying the loss, had deposited with them the full amount of it in money. But the further question whether the money due on the contract equitably belongs and should be paid to the People's or to the Granite State arises on the face of the case. For convenience of consideration, a simpler parallel case may be taken. The People's insure A's house for $10,000, and immediately reinsure for the same amount with the defendants. The house is burned, and shortly after the People's become insolvent, and, as may be supposed, unable to pay any part of their indebtedness. The defendants, willing to perform their just obligations, file a bill of interpleader against A and the People's, and pay the $10,000 into court. To which party—A, who has lost that amount, or the People's, who have lost nothing—does the money, in equity, belong? The particular terms of the policy issued by the defendants are not material. It must be assumed that by it the defendants merely stipulate to indemnify the People's to the extent of the sum named, against loss by reason of the destruction of A's house by fire, because they have no power to make any contract of insurance except contracts of indemnity. In Keene Five Cents Sav. Bank v. Herrick, 62 N. H. 174, Jarib Herrick, as principal, and John W. Herrick, as surety, were indebted to the plaintiffs upon a promissory note. January 27, 1877, Jarib gave John W. a mortgage of real estate conditioned to indemnify him against loss by reason of his having signed the note. In 1878, Jarib obtained his discharge in bankruptcy. His assignee sold the land, subject to the mortgage, to the defendant S. In 1879, John W. died, insolvent. No part of the note being paid, the plaintiffs brought their bill in equity against Jarib, the administrator of John W., and S., praying that the mortgage be assigned to them, and prevailed. The condition of the mortgage was not that Jarib should pay the note, but that he should save his surety harmless. The surety paid, and could pay, nothing. The condition, according to its literal terms, was not, and apparently never could be, broken. The court said that equity disregards mere form, and held that the transaction was, in substance, an appropriation of the mortgaged property for the payment of the debt in case it was not otherwise satisfied by the mortgagor. The purchaser at the assignee's sale took the property with notice. In equity it belonged to the plaintiffs for the purpose of satisfying their debt, and to the extent necessary for that purpose. Their right did not depend upon privity of contract. In fact, there was none. It did not appear that the plaintiffs had any knowledge of the mortgage until they filed their bill. It was immaterial that the relation of principal and surety existed between the mortgagor and mortgagee. The result would have been the same had they been joint principals, or if the mortgage had been given by the surety to the principal. It was equally immaterial that the mortgagee was bound to pay the debt, except that his liability was essential to the form of the security given. The result would have been the same if Jarib had given a deed of the same property to a stranger on condition that the grantee indemnify and save him harmless from his liability on the note. In short, the decision rested wholly upon the broad ground that in equity and good conscience the mortgaged property should be applied to the satisfaction of the plaintiff's debt. The facts, in all material respects, and the judgment of the court, in Holt v. Penacook Sav. Bank, 62 N. H. 551, and Barton v. Oroydon, 63 N. H. 417, were the same as in Keene Five Cents Sav. Bank v. Herrick. These cases establish the propositions that a creditor, for the satisfaction of his debt, may, in equity, avail himself of any subsisting provision made by his insolvent debtor for its payment, and that an appropriation or pledge of property by the debtor for the purpose of indemnifying against the debt any person liable upon it is equitably equivalent to a provision for its payment. The principle of the first proposition is often applied in actions at law. Burr v. Beers, 24 N. Y. 178, 80 Am. Dec. 827; Reed v. Paul, 181 Mass. 129; Butterfield v. Hartshorn, 7 N. H. 345, 26 Am. Dec. 741; Berry v. Gillis, 17 N. H. 9, 48 Am. Dec. 584; Hodgdon v. Merrill, 26 N. H. 18. If A, for a good consideration, agrees with B to indemnify him against his indebtedness to C, A, as between him and B, becomes the principal debtor. The debt is, in equity, his debt, and not B's. Having received a full consideration for his undertaking, he is morally and equitably as much bound to pay the debt to C as he would be if B had delivered to him and he had accepted the amount of the debt in gold coin, in trust for its payment. If, for technical reasons, the law is powerless to enforce the duty, equity is subject to no such weakness. Philbrick v. Shaw, 61 N. H. 856. It will not permit him to retain the money, the consideration of his agreement, and escape its performance on the flimsy pretext that, until B is compelled to pay the debt, or a part of it, he has fulfilled the letter of his obligation. He may be compelled at law to pay the debt if B is solvent, and in equity, at least, he is not relieved from the duty by the accident of B's insolvency. Whether the agreement may be revoked at any time before C is informed of and assents to it need not be considered. It is enough for present purposes that it cannot be annulled after C intervenes and asserts against B his claim for its performance. An insurance contract is a contract of indemnity. "It does not differ from a bond of indemnity, or a guaranty of a debt, since the obligor or guarantor takes upon himself certain risks, to which the obligee or creditor would otherwise be exposed. The only difference is in names and the form of the instrument, the consideration for an insurance being always called a premium, and the instrument containing the terms of the contract, a policy." 1 Phillips, Ins. 2d ed. 2. By a contract of reinsurance, in whatever language expressed, the obligation of the reinsurer is to indemnify the insurer against his liability for the loss by fire of the property insured. They stand in a relation to each other much like that of principal and surety. The only material difference is that the reinsurer is not, in law, directly liable to the insured. As between the two, he is the principal obligor. In the case supposed (as in the actual case), as long as the People's are solvent there is no difficulty or question. A recovery of them the full amount of his loss, and they recover the same sum of the defendants. The contracts of both companies are performed. There is no occasion for this circuitry. The sole duty of the defendants under their contract is to hold the People's harmless. They have the right to pay directly to A the amount of his loss. By so doing they fully perform their contract. The People's obligation to A is discharged. But, whichever method is adopted, A is indemnified, and the People's, assuming that the same premium is paid for the insurance and for the reinsurance, neither gain nor lose by the transaction. The plaintiff claims that, by the mere accident of the People's insolvency and inability to pay more than say 10 per cent of their liabilities, the defendants' contract is materially modified. They are no longer at liberty to perform it by paying directly to A the amount of his loss. It is not now enough that, in compliance with the literal terms of the contract, they protect the People's from loss. They must, it is said, pay the full amount of the loss to the People's, and A, in common with their other creditors, is entitled to 10 per cent only of the sum justly due to him. In other words, the People's, for the sole reason that they can pay 10 per cent only of their indebtedness, are, it is claimed, justly entitled to realize out of A's loss of $10,000, which, by their contract, they are bound to pay, a net profit of $9,000. They are to profit by their losses. It is for their interest—for the interest of every one of their creditors—that all the property insured by them, and by them reinsured in a solvent company, be destroyed by fire. Such a result equity will not tolerate. It is not good law or good morals that one should profit by the destruction of his neighbor's property (1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 498), especially if he has himself agreed to make the loss good. "A contract to tempt a man to transgress the law . . . is void by the common law." Collins v. Blanton, 2 Wils. 847, 850.

The People's, under their contract with defendants, are entitled to protection against loss by reason of the destruction of the insured property, and to nothing more. They cannot object to a judgment or decree which has that effect. The defendants cannot object to a judgment that they pay the money to the insured, because it is to them immaterial whether they pay it to him or to the insurer. Upon the filing of a proper bill in equity by the Granite State, there will be a decree in their favor, or they may, upon reimbursing the plaintiff for all expenses hitherto incurred by him in the prosecution of this action, take judgment therein for their use. Herckenrath v. American Mut. Ins. Co. 8 Barb. Ch. 63, and the later cases which have followed it, have been considered, and their doctrine is not approved.

Case discharged.

NEW JERSEY SUPREME COURT.

NEW YORK & GREENWOOD LAKE RAILWAY COMPANY

v.
NEW JERSEY ELECTRIC RAILWAY

(.....N. J.....)

*1. The same character or degree of care to avoid collision must be exercised by those operating an electric car along a public highway, in approaching and going over a steam railroad crossing of such highway, as is required to be exercised by one driving or operating any ordinary vehicles along and over such railroad crossing; and they must look and listen for the approaching train, and, if such care be not exercised, the electric railway company will be liable to the steam railroad company for injuries arising thereto by reason of collision, unless the negligence of the servants of the railroad company contributed to the accident.

2. The steam railroad has the right of way over such crossing, to run at such high rate of speed as it chooses, and ordinarily it exercises all the care required when the whistle of the locomotive is sounded or its bell is rung at the distance required by the statute from the crossing, and the sound of the bell or whistle continued until the crossing is passed; but this it is bound to do, and, if the neglect to so sound such whistle or ring such bell contributes to the collision and injury, the railroad company will be prevented from a recovery for injuries arising thereto by reason of the collision.

3. The fact that the electric company and the railroad company have an agreement with each other providing for a derailing switch on the tracks of the electric railway, as a precaution against collision at such crossing, and providing also, in addition thereto, that before an electric car shall be permitted to pass over such crossing the conductor of the electric car who shall be operating such derailing switch shall look in both directions, and listen for the approach of the railroad train, will not excuse the railroad company from giving the statutory signals as a warning of such approach; and where the neglect to give such signal, in an action on the part of the railroad company against the electric company, appears as contributing to the collision, the railroad company cannot recover, notwithstanding the negligence of the conductor of the electric car in operating the derailing switch, and his neglect to look in both directions, and to listen for the approach of the train.

4. Questions of dispute of matters of fact relating to the negligence of the one party and the contributory negligence of the other are properly submitted to the jury.

(June 7, 1897.)

ON RULE by plaintiff to show cause why a new trial should not be granted after verdict in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for losses which were alleged to have been caused to plaintiff by defendant's negligence. Discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cortlandt Parker and Cortlandt Parker, Jr., for plaintiff:

As between this electric railway company and the railroad company, the sounding of the bell or blowing of the whistle was of no importance.

These signals are to be given to comply with the statute and for the benefit of ordinary travelers on the highway.

When the prescribed audible signals are given in conformity with the statute, the company is absolved from negligence so far as concerns this kind of audible warning.

New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Leaman, 54 N. J. L. 202, 15 L. R. A. 428.

If one or both the conductor and motorman had been killed or injured, their negligence was so plain that no action for damage on account of their injury could have been maintained. The court would have said that they were each of them clearly guilty of negligence; that although they might say they looked, yet that they either lied or did not look attentively.

Mr. William B. Gourley for defendant.

Lippincott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is the operator of an electric street railway running from Paterson to Passaic and Rutherford, and along the Little Falls road in the county of Passaic, in this state. The railroad of the plaintiff crosses the Little Falls road, which is a public highway, at a place called "Singac," in the county of Passaic, and also crosses the electric street railway of the defendant, which runs along said road at this point. On the 2d day of September, 1895, a locomotive, hired from another railroad company, and a train of cars, both operated by the plaintiff, and an electric car of the defendant company, came into collision at this crossing. The track of the plaintiff at or about this point was torn up and injured, and the plaintiff was compelled to redeem the tickets of its passengers on such train. It now sues the defendant for the costs of the repairs to the track, such of its cars as were injured, and the money lost in the redemption of the tickets of its passengers, on the ground that the collision was caused by the negligence of the motorman and conductor of the electric car in driving upon the crossing. The evidence shows that there was at the time of this accident, on the track of the electric railway, about 50 feet from the rails of the steam railway, what is called a "derailing switch." If the electric car passes that switch while it is in its usual condition, the car is derailed. In order that the car can proceed beyond this point and pass over the tracks of the steam railroad, the switch must be closed, and in order to close it the conductor of the electric car is required to go forward, cross over the tracks of the steam railroad to a lever placed in the ground there, and by raising the lever close the switch, so that the motorman can run his car along and over the tracks of the steam railroad. The proof shows that the conductor in charge of the electric car on the day in question, at a point beyond the derailing switch, left the car, and walked across the tracks of the railroad, stooped down, and raised the lever which closed the switch, and when that was done the motorman moved his car past the derailing switch, and up to the tracks of the steam railroad, and in attempting to get across the car was struck by the locomotive. This derailing switch and its operation are provided for by agreement in writing between the plaintiff and defendant, but it is not perceived in what manner the case can at all be controlled by such agreement, and these particular facts are stated as a part of the evidence and circumstances in the case as bearing upon the question of whether the conductor or motorman, or either of them, were negligent in their duty in approaching and going over the railroad tracks with the car, and, if so, whether the accident arose from such negligence. The plaintiff contended that such negligence existed, and that recovery should be had. The contentions of the defendant were: First, that all the care required by law was exercised by the conductor and motorman in approaching the crossing; and, second, that the plaintiff company itself was in default of its duty in approaching this crossing by reason of the negligence of the engineer in failing to sound the whistle or ring the bell on the locomotive, 900 feet from the crossing, and to continue such whistling or ringing until the crossing is passed. These contentions of the plaintiff and the defendant gave rise to much disputed evidence on both sides. There was evidence tending to show that the only precaution on the part of the motorman and conductor to avoid collision was the operation of the machinery of the derailing switch, and, outside of the exercise of that precaution, those in charge did not look or listen, or use other proper precautions to avoid danger from the approach of the locomotive. Some of the evidence shows that an approaching train can be seen from the derailing switch, and from the lever thereof, over 2,000 feet away. At least the facts were such on this point that it was proper to leave them to the jury for their determination. There was also evidence of such a character as required the trial justice to submit to the jury the question whether contributory negligence had been established on the part of the plaintiff; that is, whether the whistle of the locomotive was sounded, or the bell rung, as required by the statute, as the train approached the crossing. 2 Gen. Stat. p. 2669, §§ 6, 17; New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Leaman, 54 N. J. L. 202, 15 L. R. A. 426. From the record it appears that the jury found that the accident resulted from the negligence of the conductor and motorman in charge of the electric car, and also that the negligence of the engineer in charge of the locomotive contributed to the accident, and a verdict, therefore, was returned in favor of the defendant.

It is needless to go into a discussion of the evidence in this cause, as it is such as to lead the court to the conclusion that the verdict of the jury is not contrary to the evidence, nor against the weight of it, and the court will not determine the comparative negligence of which the parties were respectively guilty. Wilds v. Hudson River R. Co. 24 N. Y. 430; New Jersey Exp. Co. v. Nichols, 88 N. J. L. 489; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Righter, 42 N. J. L. 180. A question of fact fairly arises upon the plaintiff's negligence, and it was necessary to submit it to the jury. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Shelton, 55 N. J. L. 342. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Hefferan, 57 N. J. L. 149.

No error of the trial justice in the admission or rejection of evidence has been pointed out, and an examination of the case reveals none. Neither was the verdict against the charge of the court to the jury. The plaintiff selects an excerpt from the charge in respect to contributory negligence, and insists that it was erroneous. The trial justice in speaking to the jury of the responsibility placed upon the railroad company to ring the bell or sound the whistle of the locomotive continuously for 800 yards from the crossing of the highway, said: "If the jury believe that the conductor or motorman of the electric car did not see the approaching train, and they would have seen it, or heard such a signal, if it were given, and avoided the accident in case the bell was rung or the whistle blown for that distance, the Greenwood Lake Road (the plaintiff) cannot recover." This was, in effect, charging that the plaintiff, in approaching this crossing, was bound to give the statutory signals, and a failure to do so, if it caused or contributed to the accident, was contributory negligence, and would prevent a recovery. It is not perceived that this excerpt of the charge was erroneous. The court had already fully charged the duties devolving upon the conductor and motorman of the electric car, that they were bound to look, and bound to listen for the approaching train, and take other precautions in order to avoid collision, in addition to the duty of exercising the protection of the derailing switch; and that if they saw it, or heard it, or under the circumstances ought to have seen it or ought to have heard it, and did not avoid its danger, they were negligent and responsible, and by the part of the charge to which this exception is taken the responsibility of giving the signals required by the statute is 38 L. R. A.

imposed upon the plaintiff, and if the failure to give such contributed to the injury, the plaintiff could not recover. The duty to give this signal was imposed upon the plaintiff company in approaching and crossing this highway as a warning to all persons—pedestrians or those operating vehicles—about to cross, to avoid the dangers. The crossing was in fact a highway, and the duty of the railroad was an imperative one in view of that fact. It could not disregard this duty because an electric car was one of the vehicles of carriage using the highway, any more than it could avoid its duty towards a coach or carriage in the use of the highway. If the prescribed signal had been given, then the fact that it was not heard would be of no materiality, for the whole duty of the plaintiff would have been performed, and it would not be responsible for any of the results, whatever they might be. The statute imposes the duty, and the omission is negligence. Wherever the statute is obeyed, the duty is absolutely performed, and it would be abnormal to permit the railroad company to select any class of persons or vehicles in the use of the highway towards whom it could neglect its statutory duty. There can be no contention here that the defendant was not in the lawful use of the highway in running its electric cars thereon, under the same principles of law which govern the use of the highway by natural persons for kindred purposes. Ottens' Coach Co. v. Camden Horse R. Co. 83 N. J. Eq. 267, 86 Am. Rep. 542; Newark Pass. R. Co. v. Block, 55 N. J. L. 605, 22 L. R. A. 374. The trial court committed no error in treating the case, in matters of legal principle, as if it was the ordinary case of a traveler or a driver of a vehicle in the lawful use of the highway.

But the plaintiff further contends against the legality of this instruction of the trial court to the jury on the ground that its responsibility is limited by an express agreement in writing between the parties as to the operation of electric cars over the crossing. The facts appear to be, as shown in the case, that provision was made in the contract dated May 24, 1894, for the operation of the derailing switch in the manner described, and that, if any train approached within such distance as would render it unsafe for the electric car to proceed, then no such car should pass or attempt to pass such crossing until such approaching train, car, or engine, had passed over such crossing, or come to a full stop before reaching it. This agreement is itself a full answer to the plaintiff's contention, as between the electric car and the approaching train, that the statutory signals should not be given. The statute provided they should be given, and this agreement in no wise provides for any default in this duty, which at all times and under all circumstances was an obligatory one. The agreement does provide that the conductor of the electric car should look in both directions for an approaching train. This imposes no greater duty upon the conductor than the general principles of law had already imposed upon him. Neither did the agreement provide that the plaintiff should be free from liability to the defendant for neglect to exercise the care required by the statutes of this state; and even by the terms of the agreement, reasonably interpreted, they were bound to exercise all the precautions required by law for the safe passage of the defendant's car over the crossing. Although this agreement did provide that the train of the plaintiff should have the right of way, still this agreement goes for little in this respect, for all steam railroads have this same right upon their own private way and roadbed over highways in respect to all travelers thereon, and to run at such high rate of speed as may be consistent with the safety of the passenger. This right of way does not excuse a violation of the statute prescribing signals, nor furnish any reason against such default being used as evidence of negligence. The conclusion is, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff company was bound to give the statutory signals at this crossing as a warning, as well to those operating the electric cars, as to ordinary travelers, irrespective of this agreement between the parties, and that there was no error in the trial court in submitting the dispute of fact whether they had been given to the jury as bearing upon the question of whether the contributory negligence of the plaintiff contributed to the accident. It will be noticed that the declaration in this cause does not aver any neglect on the part of the defendant company to comply with the express agreement as a basis of recovery, and therefore the question whether the agreement is one forbidden by the statute or public policy is not here at all discussed or determined, and it is not perceived in what manner that question can have any bearing upon the determination of this cause. The rule to show cause is discharged.

STATE of Ohio, ex rel. Frank S. MONNETT, Attorney General, (.....Ohio.....)

- *1. The remedy by due course of law guaranteed by § 16 of the Bill of Rights extends to all the adversary rights of persons in property, and requires that, before there is a judicial determination affecting such right, process to obtain jurisdiction of the person claiming it shall be issued and served, except that the legislature may provide for a substituted or constructive service to be made when actual service is impracticable. The act of April 27, 1890, entitled "An Act to Provide for the Registration of Land Titles in Ohio," etc. (92 Ohio Laws, p. 220), is repugnant to this section of the Constitution.
- *2. Said act is repugnant to § 19 of the Bill of Rights, because it attempts to authorize the taking of private property for uses that are not public, and without compensation.
- *3. Said act is repugnant to § 1 of article 4 of the Constitution, because it attempts to confer judicial power upon the county recorder.

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to perform certain duties required by a statute for the registration of land titles. Denied.

Statement by Shauck, J.:

The petition alleges that the defendants, who are state officers, are, by the act of April 27, 1890, entitled "An Act to Provide for the Registration of Land Titles in the State of Ohio, and to Simplify and Facilitate the Transfer of Real Estate" (92 Ohio Laws, pp. 220-262, inclusive), charged with the duties of preparing a uniform system of blank books appropriate to carrying out the purposes of the act, and of furnishing such books to the probate judges and other officers in the several counties of the state, and that they refuse to perform the same. It prays for a peremptory writ of mandamus commanding the performance of said duties. The case is submitted on demurrer to the petition.

Messrs. Edward H. Fitch and Guy Mallon for petitioner.

Messrs. R. A. Harrison and J. K. Richards, for defendants:

The holder of a tax title, under existing law, is denied by this act the equal protection of the law.

Hocking Valley Coal Co. v. Rosser, 53 Ohio St. 12, 29 L. R. A. 886; State, Schwartz, v. Ferris, 53 Ohio St. 314, 30 L. R. A. 218.

The provision for an appeal is a conclusive admission that the recorder is given judicial power, and that the proceeding before him is adversary in character.

Musser v. Adair, 55 Ohio St. 466, and cases cited, especially Ex parte Logan Branch at Logan of State Bank, 1 Ohio St. 433.

The state has no more power to enter into the business of insuring land titles than it has to go into the business of insuring anything else.

Reeves v. Wood County, 8 Ohio St. 333; Gilpin v. Williams, 25 Ohio St. 283; Hocking Valley Coal Co. v. Rosser, 53 Ohio St. 12, 29 L. R. A. 886.

The act in question contravenes several provisions of the Constitution of this state:

1. Because, although it is "a law of a general nature," it has not "a uniform operation throughout the state."

2. Because it authorizes proceedings instituted and judgments rendered therein, to establish alleged titles of petitioners under it, and to extinguish the titles and claims to such lands of all other persons, without due course or process of law.

3. Because it confers judicial power upon county recorders of deeds.

4. Because the "assurance fund" feature authorizes the taking of private property for private purposes, without the owner's consent.

5. Because it impairs the obligation of contracts, contrary to a provision of the Constitution of this state as well as a provision of the Constitution of the United States.

The states are inhibited from depriving any person of property without "due process of law," and from making or enforcing any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States as to property.

Const. Amend. 14, § 1.

The term "due process of law" has long been in use in judicial decisions and among law writers as implying correct and orderly proceedings, which are "due" because they observe all the securities for private right which are applicable in the particular case.

Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 8, 27 L. ed. 836.

It was not left to the legislative power to enact any process which might be devised. The article is a restraint on the legislative as well as on the executive and judicial powers of the government, and cannot be so construed as to leave the Congress free to make any process "due process of law."

Den, Murray, v. Hoboken Land & I. Co. 59 U. S. 18 How. 276, 15 L. ed. 374. To the same effect, Allen v. Armstrong, 16 Iowa, 508; Ervine's Appeal, 16 Pa. 256, 55 Am. Dec. 499.

The law of the land, in bills of right, does not mean merely an act of the legislature, for that construction would abrogate all restrictions on legislative authority. The clause means, that statutes which would deprive a citizen of the rights of person or property without a regular trial, according to the course and usage of the common law, would not be the law of the land in the sense of the Constitution.

Hoke v. Henderson, 4 Dev. L. 15, 25 Am. Dec. 677; Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 146, 40 Am. Dec. 374; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565; Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. ed. 232; Salt Creek Valley Turnp. Co. v. Parks, 50 Ohio St. 568, 28 L. R. A. 769; Adler v. Whitbeck, 44 Ohio St. 539.

The object of the guaranty was, in part at least, to interpose the judicial department of the government as a barrier against aggressions by any other department.

Wynchamer v. People, 18 N. Y. 378; Westervelt v. Gregg, 12 N. Y. 202, 62 Am. Dec. 160; Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 140, 40 Am. Dec. 274.

The American Constitutions are conservatory instruments rather than reformatory; they assume that the existing principles of the common law are ample for the protection of individual rights, when once incorporated in the fundamental law, and thus secured against violation.

Weimer v. Bunbury, 80 Mich. 213; Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 103, 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. ed. 569.

A proceeding in rem is a proceeding to determine the status of the particular thing itself, 38 L. R. A.

which is confined to the subject-matter, in specie, in the rem.

Jurisdiction of the res is obtained by seizure under process, whereby it is held to abide such orders as may be made by the court concerning the property seized.

Cross v. Armstrong, 44 Ohio St. 623.

There are certain conditions and means under and by which the res is brought under the control of the court:

1. The court must have jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and actual dominion over the thing.

2. A petition or information must be filed in a court of competent jurisdiction asking the seizure of the thing, setting forth a right of action against the thing or the owner of the thing attached, and praying for judgment of condemnation or sale for the debt.

3. Notice must be given to the owner of the thing of its seizure, and the nature of the proceedings against it, or notice to the world, where the action is purely against the thing.

4. Opportunity for intervention and defense by the owner of the thing must be given.

McVeigh v. United States, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 267, 20 L. ed. 81.

5. A judicial finding of the facts alleged in the information or petition and a judgment of condemnation or sequestration are necessary.

6. The conclusiveness of the decree rests upon the sufficiency of the notice and regularity of the proceedings.

7. Seizure of the property may be by process issued from the court or by its being placed in the custody of some officer of the court or by law under the control of the court.

8. Under the divisions named, where a title to, a right in, or the determination of some right pertaining to, real property within the jurisdiction, the proceedings become in rem on the filing of the petition sometimes, and always on the filing of the petition and service of notice. It is said that this rule may sometimes operate with harshness, especially where the notice is constructive, as in many cases, but general convenience requires it.

Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 576.

The distinction between actions in personam and proceedings in rem is this: The first is an adversary proceeding against some person or persons who are made defendants. The second is against some particular thing, and so against whom it may concern—"all the world."

Cooper v. Reynolds, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 316, 19 L. ed. 932.

In judging what is "due process of law," respect must be had to the cause and object of the taking, whether under the taxing power, the power of eminent domain, or the power of assessment for local improvements, or none of these; and if found to be suitable or admissible in the special case, it will be adjudged to be "due process of law;" but if found to be arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust, it may be declared to be not "due process of law."

Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 616.

A suit to establish or determine title to a specific parcel of land, or the legal effect of the judgment in which is to establish or determine such title, but in which the property is not actually seized by legal process therein, is in its nature in personam, and cannot, therefore, be transformed, by a mere legislative declaration, into a proceeding in rem, so as to dispense with personal notice of the pendency and purpose of the suit to defendants who are residents of the state in which the action is brought.

Brown v. Levee Comrs. 50 Miss. 437.

The legislature may provide for determining and quieting the title to real estate within the limits of the state and within the jurisdiction of the court after actual notice by service of summons to all known claimants and notice by publication to all other persons.

Hamilton v. Brown, 161 U. S. 256, 40 L. ed. 691.

To a bill of peace or any other judicial proceeding which will have the legal effect of determining the interest or claim to property which is the subject-matter of the suit, unless the proceeding is one strictly and purely in rem, the individual adversely interested must be made a party defendant; and if he is a resident of the state in which the property is located, he must be actually served with process; but if he be a nonresident, a substituted service is, from necessity, admissible.

S. 2 Wall. 828, 17 L. ed. 871; Day v. Micou, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 160, 21 L. ed. 862.

The act in question is a law of a general nature, but does not operate uniformly and equally upon all the inhabitants of the state, and is therefore void.

Kelley v. State, 6 Ohio St. 269; United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 23 L. ed. 588; Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 22, 25 L. ed. 989; Lewis v. Webb, 3 Me. 336; Vanant v. Waddel, 2 Yerg. 260; Bank of the State v. Cooper, 2 Yerg. 599, 24 Am. Dec. 517.

Among the inhibitions of the Constitution of the United States, ordained for the purpose of securing such immunities, is that which prohibits the states from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

Const. art. 1, § 10.

This prohibition is aimed at the legislative power of the state, and not at the decisions of its courts or the acts of administrative or executive boards of officers.

New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Louisiana Sugar Ref. Co. 125 U. S. 18, 31 L. ed. 607.

The impairing of the obligation must be made by a provision of the Constitution of the state, or by some act passed by the legislature of the state, in order to warrant the intervention in behalf of the individual against the same.

New Orleans Gaslight Co. v. Louisiana Light & H. P. & Mfg. Co. 115 U. S. 650, 29 L. ed. 516.

The term "contract" is held to mean a legal and binding agreement in respect to property, either expressed or implied, executory or executed, between private parties, or between the state and a private party; or a grant from one party to another; or a grant, charter, or franchise from a state to a private party or parties.

The term "obligation" is held to mean the existing body of law, defining, regulating, securing, and giving sanction to the contract.

Bronson v. Kinzie, 42 U. S. 1 How. 811, 11 L. ed. 148; M'Cracken v. Hayward, 43 U. S. 2 How. 668, 11 L. ed. 897.

The chief element in the obligation is the existing remedy provided by law for its enforcement.

Any alteration of the substance of the contract, or of the law governing the contract at the time it was entered into, would be, in popular definition, an impairment.

Green v. Biddle, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 1, 5 L. ed. 547; Sturges v. Crowninshield, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 122, 4 L. ed. 529; Hawkins v. Barney, 80 U. S. 5 Pet. 457, 8 L. ed. 190; Sohn v. Waterson, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 596, 21 L. ed. 737; Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628, 24 L. ed. 365.

The act is invalid, because it vests judicial power in the county recorder, in violation of article 4, § 1, and the sections conferring this power cannot be rejected without impairing the integrity of the law.

Musser v. Adair, 55 Ohio St. 466; Ex parte Logan Branch of Logan of State Bank, 1 Ohio St. 433; State, Insurance Co., v. Moore, 42 Ohio St. 103; State, Atty. Gen., v. Hawkins, 44 Ohio St. 98; De Camp v. Archibald, 50 Ohio St. 618.

The assurance feature of this law is in contravention of article 1, § 19, which declares "private property shall ever be held inviolate, but subservient to the public welfare."

McCoy v. Grandy, 3 Ohio St. 463; Reeves v. Wood County, 8 Ohio St. 346; Hocking Valley Coal Co. v. Rosser, 53 Ohio St. 23, 29 L. R. A. 886.

Shauck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is admitted that the alleged duty is charged upon the defendants by the terms of the act cited. Whether the act is constitutional is the only question raised by the demur-

rer. A complete analysis of the 168 sections of the act would not be practicable. Present purposes will be best subserved by the briefest statement of its provisions, which will bring into view those whose validity is denied upon constitutional grounds. It provides for what is usually called the Torrens system of land titles, with some modification. It requires assignees and trustees for the benefit of creditors to take such steps as will bring the lands in their hands within its operation. It authorizes other trustees and executors and all other persons claiming to be the owners of land to take such steps. It provides that all lands once brought within its operation shall so remain. In its general scope, it provides that, as to all lands within its operation, the registration of title shall be substituted for the system of registering deeds heretofore in operation in the state, and that every registered title shall at once become indefeasible in the hands of the purchaser for value from the registered owner. The proceedings by which such registration is to be accomplished and all claims of interest in the lands adverse to the registered owner cut off are the subjects of the earlier sections of the act.

The application must be made in writing filed with the probate judge or the clerk of the court of common pleas in the county where the land is situate. The substance of the application is prescribed as follows:

"Sec. 7. Every application must contain an accurate description of the land, the amount, nature, and kind of every encumbrance; the full name and postoffice address of the persons owning the land adjoining the land sought to be registered; if occupied, the full name and postoffice address of the occupant; the kind of estate he holds and when it will terminate, and all easements and inferior estates to the fee simple, either in law or equity, of every kind, must be clearly stated, with the full names and postoffice addresses of the persons holding such estates. The application shall contain such further statements as is (are) required by this act, or may be required by the court in which the application is filed, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act."

Forms of application are prescribed by the act.

The provisions as to notice are as follows:

Sec. 12. Immediately on the filing of such application, the court shall cause the applicant to give notice by publication in some newspaper of general circulation in said county, for the period of four consecutive weeks, inserted once a week, to all whom it may concern.

Sec. 18. The notice required by § 12 shall be in substantially the following form:

Form 3.

To whom it may concern:

You are hereby notified that _____ of _____, in the county of _____ and state of Ohio, did, on the _____ day of _____, A. D. 189-, file with the _____ court of said county, his application to register his title in and to the following described lands (here briefly describe the same, giving township, lot, etc., in substance as in application), and that _____ be certified as the registered owner thereof. And that on the _____ day of _____, A. D. 189-, at _____ o'clock, — m., at the said court, in the _____ of _____, in said county, said application will be heard, and order taken in respect thereto, as asked in said application.

You are hereby further notified that if you have or claim any estate or interest in, or any lien upon said lands, or know of any reasons why such lands should not be registered, or wish to file objections thereto, you are required to then and there appear and assert your claim, and file your objections to the registry of said land, or the said lands will be ordered registered and brought under the provisions of the act of the general assembly of Ohio, passed the _____ day of _____, A. D. 189-, and thereafter dealt with under said act as registered land, and you will thereafter be forever debarred and stopped from setting up any claim thereto or therein except under the provisions of said act. _____, Applicant.

Sec. 14. Immediately on the first publication of said notice the publisher shall file with the court as many copies of the notice as the court may require for service, and said court shall cause the applicant, or some other competent person, to serve each person named in said application, resident of the county, with a copy of said notice. And persons named in said application, residents without the county, must be served by sending a copy of said notice to their address by mail. Proof of service shall be made by the sworn affidavit of the person making the same, and filed with the court; such proof must show that such service was made personally or by mail, at least twenty-one (21) days before the day so fixed for the hearing of the application.

Referees may be appointed to determine questions arising on applications. Surveys and abstracts may be required, and the "court may establish rules for procuring correct abstracts from responsible parties."

The duties of the courts and the requirements of persons notified are prescribed in sections 28 and 38, as follows:

"Sec. 28. Upon the hearing of an application to register land, the court or referee shall carefully examine the same, together with all records, papers, and surveys pertaining to the title of said applicant, as required by this act, and if the statements therein are found by the court to be true, and that the applicant is the owner thereof, and has the fee-simple title to the land therein described, and that all of the provisions of this act have been complied with and that the applicant is entitled, under this act, to have the title of said land registered, the court shall order that said lands be registered and brought under the provisions of this act, and thereafter dealt with as registered land."

"Sec. 38. Every person notified, either personally, or by the publication of the notice required by § 12 of this act, of a filing of an application to register lands, who has or claims to have any estate, right, title, or interest in, or lien upon the land in the application described, or any part thereof, adverse to the applicant, and that is not fully admitted in the application, shall, on or before the day set for the Hearing of the application, set forth in writing their respective claims, giving the nature and particulars thereof. Such written statement shall be signed, sworn to, and filed in the court on or before the day last aforesaid."

Sections 84 and 85 prescribe the procedure if an adverse claimant appears; and the right to take an appeal or prosecute error is prescribed as follows:

"Sec. 86. The party or parties aggrieved by the finding, judgment, order, or decree of the court, provided in §§ 84 and 85, and 88 and 89, may appeal, or prosecute error, direct either from the court of common pleas, or probate court, in such manner as is provided by law, to the circuit court, which court shall have final jurisdiction in such cases, and no petition in error therefrom shall be allowed to be filed or prosecuted."

The orders of the court made upon the application are to be entered upon the land registration docket, and it "shall be conclusive evidence in all courts of the state of the facts therein stated, except as otherwise provided in this act." The order, with all papers, etc., is then to be transmitted to the recorder by whom the land is registered, upon "the register of land titles."

The general results of registration are defined in the following sections:

"Sec. 73. The registered owner of any estate, or interest, in land brought under this act, shall, except in case of fraud to which he is a party, or of the person through whom he claims, without valuable consideration paid in good faith, hold the same subject only to such estates, mortgages, liens, charges, and interests as may be noted on the last register of title in the recorder's office, and free from all others, except: First. Any subsisting lease, or agreement for a lease, for a period not exceeding three years, where there is an actual occupation of the land under the lease. The term 'lease' shall include a verbal letting. Second. All public highways shall be deemed to be excluded from the certificate. Third. Any tax or special assessments for which the sale of the land has not been had at the date of the certificate of title. Fourth. Such rights of action as are followed by this act. Fifth. Liens, claims, or rights arising or existing under the laws of the United States, which the statutes of Ohio cannot require to appear of record upon the register.

"Sec. 73. Except as herein otherwise provided, no person taking a transfer of registered land, or any estate or interest therein, or of any charge upon the same, from the registered owner, shall be held to inquire into the circumstances under which, or the consideration for which, such owner, or any previous registered owner, was registered, or be affected with notice, actual or constructive, of any unregistered trust, lien, claim, demand, or interest in the land.

"Sec. 74. In the case of fraud, any person defrauded shall have all rights and remedies that he would have had if the land were not under the provisions of this act, provided that nothing contained in this section shall affect the title of a registered owner who has taken bona fide for valuable consideration, or of any person bona fide claiming through or under him.

"Sec. 75. If a deed or instrument is registered which is forged, or executed by a person under legal disability, such registration shall be void, provided that the title of a registered owner who has taken bona fide for a valuable consideration shall not be affected by reason that he claims title through some one, the registration of whose right or interest was void, as provided in this section.

"Sec. 76. No unregistered estate, interest, power, right, claim, contract, or trust shall prevail against the title of a registered owner taking bona fide for valuable consideration, or of any person bona fide claiming through or under him.

"Sec. 77. Knowledge of the existence of any unregistered estate, interest, power, right, claim, contract, or trust shall not be evidence of want of bona fides so as to affect the title of any registered owner.

"Sec. 78. After the land has been registered, no title thereto adverse, or in derogation of the title of the registered owner, shall be acquired by any length of possession. Nor shall any interest in registered land be acquired except in accordance with the provisions of this act. No land once brought under and made subject to the provisions of this act shall ever be withdrawn therefrom.

"Sec. 79. The register of title of any land, and the certificate of title, and duly certified copies thereof, shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be received in all courts as evidence of the facts therein stated, and, except where attacked for fraud, as in this act provided, as conclusive evidence that the person named therein as owner is entitled to the land for the estate or interest therein specified.

"Sec. 80. All dealings with land or any estate or interest therein, after the same has been brought under this act, and all liens, encumbrances, and charges upon the same, subsequent to the first registration thereof, shall be deemed to be subject to the terms of this act, and to such amendments and alterations as may hereafter be made; and whenever a memorial has been entered as permitted by this act, the recorder shall carry the same forward upon the register, and all certificates of title, until the same is canceled upon the register, as authorized by this act. The bringing of land under this act shall imply an agreement, which shall run with the land, that the same shall be subject to the terms of that act, and all amendments and alterations thereof.

"Sec. 81. The decree of the court ordering registration shall be in the nature of a decree in rem, and shall be final and conclusive as against the right of every and all persons, known and unknown, to assert any estate, interest, claim, lien, or demand, of any nature or kind whatever, against the land so ordered registered, except as provided in this act.

"Sec. 82. Any person not having actual notice of the proceedings to register land as provided in this act, may at any time within five years from the date of the entering of the decree of registration, but not thereafter, bring an action in the court where such decree was entered, to establish his right, claim, or demand against such land: provided, however, before such action shall proceed, it must be made to appear to the court that the person bringing such action, or those under whom he claims, had no actual notice thereof in time to appeal and file his objections, or assert his claim.

"Sec. 88. The action provided for in the last preceding section shall in no way affect or disturb the rights of any person in said land, acquired subsequent to the registration thereof, bona fide and without knowledge, and for a valuable consideration."

The lands of a deceased owner, whether testate or intestate, shall pass to his personal representatives, "and the same shall be administered in like manner as personal property." Sections 91 to 104, inclusive, contain other provisions with reference to transmission and administration. Sections 105 to 111, inclusive, provide for mortgages, leases, and encumbrances on registered lands. And §§ 112 to 128, inclusive, regulate judgment and other statutory liens, partition, and judicial sales, and pre-cribe the duties of receivers and master commissioners.

Section 124 is as follows: "Assignees, or trustees for the benefit of creditors, and commissioners of insolvent debtors, holding title to unregistered land from the assignor, shall make application as provided under this act to bring such land under the register of title."

The act in terms confers upon the recorder authority with respect to the discharge of mortgage and other liens and the correction of errors, and provides for appeals from his decision regarding such errors as follows:

"Sec. 125. When any registered mortgage, encumbrance, or charge is satisfied in whole or in part, it shall be the duty of the mortgagee, encumbrancee, assignee, or other person authorized by law to discharge the same, to forthwith file with the recorder a certificate of satisfaction, in whole or in part, as the case may be, executed according to law, and the recorder shall enter such satisfaction upon the register. In case of the failure of the mortgagee, or other person, to certify such satisfaction, then the mortgagor, or other person entitled to such discharge, may ask proof of the same before the recorder; notice thereof, either actual or constructive, having been given to the person holding the security, and upon the recorder being satisfied that such mortgage or other charge has been satisfied, as claimed, he shall enter such satisfaction on the register, and indorse the same upon the certificate of title."

"Sec. 128. When any lien shall cease to be operative in law, by reason of limitation of time, proof of the same may be made, on proper application being filed with the recorder, and the persons shown to be interested notified of such application in the manner provided by this act. If the recorder shall be satisfied that the lien is without force in law, by reason of lapse of time, he shall enter such discharge upon the register, and the same shall be prima facie evidence thereof."

"Sec. 181. Whenever it appears that there is an error or omission in any certificate or memorandum or memorial, or that any memorandum or memorial has been made, entered, and indorsed, or certificate entered or issued by mistake, the recorder may, on his own motion, or upon the application of any person interested, summon all persons registered as interested in the lands to which such certificate, memorandum, or memorial has been made relates, to appear at an appointed time, and produce their certificate of (or) registered instruments, and if at the appointed time the recorder shall find such error or omission or mistake to exist, and that no rights of bona fide purchasers or lien holders for value, have intervened whereby his or their estate or interest shall be impaired by the correction of such error, omission, or mistake, he shall, if no appeal is taken as provided in the next section, correct such error or mistake, or supply the omission, and may direct the cancellation of any certificate or registered instrument or any memorandum or memorial entered upon the registration book, or indorsed upon the registered instrument or certificate, by mistake.

"Sec. 182. Any person aggrieved by the finding of the recorder for or against the existence of such error, omission, or mistake may appeal from the decision of the recorder to the court of common pleas or probate court, on giving bond to the acceptance of the recorder as provided by law in other cases for appeal, within ten days of the date of such finding, and the recorder shall make out and deliver to the clerk of the court of common pleas or probate court immediately a transcript of his proceedings in such matter, and shall make a notation of such appeal upon the register of title. When such appeal is determined, the court shall forthwith cause a certified copy of such judgment or decree to be filed with the recorder, and the judgment of the court shall be final and conclusive."

The material provisions of the act concerning the "Assurance Fund" are:

"Sec. 144. Upon the first bringing of land under the operation of this act, as hereinbefore provided, and upon the issuance of a certificate of title pursuant to section (143) one hundred and forty-two, there shall be paid to the recorder one tenth of one per cent of the value of such land as appraised for taxation for the purpose of an assurance fund under this act. All sums of money so received as provided in this section shall be paid on the first Monday of each and every month to the county treasurer of his county."

Section 145 prescribes how the fund shall be invested.

"Sec. 146. Any person deprived of land or of any estates or interest therein in consequence of fraud, or misrepresentation in bringing such land under the operation of this act, having had no notice of the proceedings, or by the registration of any other person as owner of such lands, estate, or interest, or in consequence of any error, omission, mistake, or misdescription in any certificate of title, or in any entry or memorandum in the register of titles, or by being omitted in proof of heirship or certificate thereof as provided in section (98) ninety-eight of this act, may, at any time within four years from the date of the discovery of such fraud, error, omission, mistake, or misdescription, bring an action in any court of competent jurisdiction for the recovery of the damages so by him sustained, against the person or persons committing such fraud, or responsible for such error, omission, mistake, or misdescription in any certificate of title, or in any entry or memorandum on the register of title. In any such action the county treasurer must be made a defendant, and all persons against whom the plaintiff claims the right to pursue for damages must be made defendant to the action. And if this be not done, such persons shall thereby be discharged for liability for damages in the premises.

"Sec. 147. If such action be for the recovery of loss or damage only through an omission, mistake, or misfeasance of the recorder or any deputy or clerk of the recorder in the performance of their respective duties under the provisions of this act, the recorder alone need be made a defendant with the county treasurer; but if such action be brought for loss or damage arising from the fraud or wrongful act of some person or persons other than the recorder, his deputies or clerks, then such action shall be brought against only the county treasurer, and such person or persons aforesaid. In any such action the defendant or defendants, other than the county treasurer, shall be primarily liable when recovery is had, and final judgment shall not be entered against the county treasurer, until execution against the other defendants shall be returned unsatisfied, in whole or in part, and the officer returning the execution shall certify that the amount still due on the execution cannot be collected except by a resort to the assurance fund. The court being satisfied of the truth of such return, made upon proper showing, shall order the amount of the execution and costs, or such part as shall remain unpaid, to be paid by the county treasurer out of the assurance fund. It shall be the duty of the prosecuting attorney of the county, or the county solicitor, if there be one, to appear and defend all suits that may affect such assurance funds.

"Sec. 148. Nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to leave subject to action for recovery of damages, as aforesaid, any bona fide purchaser, mortgagee, or other holder of a lien, charge, or interest, for a valuable consideration, on land brought under this act, on the plea that his vendor, mortgagor, or person creating such lien, charge, or interest, may have been registered as proprietor through fraud, error, or omission; or may have derived from or through a person registered as owner through fraud, error, or omission.

"Sec. 149. In case the person primarily liable as provided in § 150, and against whom such action for damages is directed to be brought, as aforesaid, shall be dead or cannot be found within this state, then, in such case, it shall be lawful to bring such action for damages against the county treasurer of the county in which the land may be situate, as defendant, for the purpose of recovering the amount of the said damages and costs against the assurance fund. In such case, if final judgment be recovered, the county treasurer, upon the receipt of a certificate of the court, before which said action was tried, shall pay the amount of such damages and costs as may be awarded, and charge the same to the account of the assurance fund. All actions involving the assurance fund shall be brought in the county where the land is situated.

"Sec. 150. Whenever any money has been paid by any county treasurer out of the county assurance fund, as in this act provided, the county treasurer of such county may bring an action and institute proceedings in any court of competent jurisdiction against the person or persons primarily liable for such damages and costs, to reimburse such assurance fund; or should such person or persons be dead, such treasurer may proceed against his or their estates. It shall be his duty to bring such action or institute proceedings in every case where there may be a reasonable probability of reimbursing such assurance fund in whole or in part."

Section 151 limits the action authorized by §§ 146 and 147 to ten years.

Whatever may be thought of the burdens of fees and costs which the act lays upon the estate of deceased persons and insolvents, or of its probable effect to disturb titles that are now well settled, it must be deemed a valid enactment, unless, in some of its substantial provisions, it transcends the limitations which the Constitution has placed upon the exercise of legislative power, or invades some guaranty which it has erected to the ownership and enjoyment of property.

Counsel for the defendants deny the validity of the act upon the following grounds: Because it provides for cutting off vested interests in property without due course of law, in violation of § 16 of the Bill of Rights; because it provides for the taking of private property for private purposes without the owner's consent, in violation of § 19 of the Bill of Rights; because it provides for the exercise of judicial power by the recorder, in violation of § 1 of article 4 of the Constitution, which vests all such power in the courts of the state; because, being a law of a general nature, and not having a uniform operation throughout the state, it violates § 26 of article 2 of the Constitution; and because it impairs the obligation of contracts in violation of § 28 of article 2 of the Constitution of the state, and § 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States.

The constitutional guaranty involved by the first objection is of a remedy per legem terras, as it was expressed in Magna Charta, or according to the law of the land, or by due process of law, or by due course of law, as it is expressed in equivalent phrases in the several Constitutions of the American states. It is no longer questioned that the guaranty operates as a limitation upon both judicial and legislative authority. In Norman v. Heist, 5 Watts & S. 171, 40 Am. Dec. 493, Chief Justice Gibson concisely declared its purpose to be "to exclude arbitrary power from every branch of the government." Cooley, Const. Lim. 492. The precise objection urged against the act in this regard is that it provides for the divesting of rights in property by the proceeding to register without the issuance and service of summons according to the law of the land. The act does not require a petition or bill such as is appropriate in suits between adversary parties, nor does it require or contemplate that a summons or equivalent preliminary process shall issue from the court advising those who claim an interest in the land to be registered that their alleged interests are to be the subject of adjudication in the proceeding. Both by the terms of the act and by the form which it prescribes, the only notice required is to be given by the applicant. In the notice so required to be given, no one claiming an interest adverse to that of the applicant is to be named, although the names, places, of residence, and alleged interests of all who may claim adversely are known. The terms of the act require that the court shall cause the applicant, or some other competent person, to serve each person named in the application, resident of the county, with a copy of the printed notice. All persons named in the application, resident without the county though within the state, shall be served by sending copies of such notice to their addresses by mail. Only those who are named in the application are required to be served even in this manner. Reference to § 7, providing what the application shall contain, and to its form as prescribed in § 8, shows that the persons to be thus named and served are the owners of the land adjoining that sought to be registered, the occupant of the land to be registered if it is occupied, and the holders of easements and estates inferior to the fee simple. One known to claim the title in fee simple adversely to the applicant need not be named in the application, nor receive a copy of the notice, though his place of residence may be within the county, and known. As to him, the only requirement is that he may have a chance to see a notice signed by the applicant, addressed "To whom it may concern," containing a brief description of the land to be registered, and published in any newspaper of general circulation within the county. That this is sufficient notice to those who are interested in the adjoining property is not denied.

Is it such notice as the law of the land requires to be given to persons claiming interests in property of the pendency of a judicial proceeding, in which such interests are to be the subject of adjudication, and in which, unless they appear, a decree will be entered precluding their further assertion? It is said that it is, because the proceeding to register land under the act is in rem. Whether it is in rem or in personam is determined by its nature and purpose. To say that the legislature may prescribe such notice as is appropriate to proceedings in rem, and thus invest the proceedings with that character, is to affirm its power to annul the constitutional requirement. In this aspect of the case, and considering the effect of registration upon interests adverse to those of the applicant, the proceeding to register does not, in any substantial respect, differ from a suit quia timet to settle title. It bears the least possible analogy to a proceeding in rem. The res is not taken into the possession of an officer of the court. No charge or lien is asserted against it. It is not to be sold with a view to the distribution of its proceeds, and partakes, therefore, less of the nature of a proceeding in rem than does the foreclosure of a mortgage. The land is not a thing of shifting situs, like a ship, against which obligations may accrue to day in one jurisdiction, and tomorrow in another. The status of the land is not changed by registration. The substantial thing determined by registration is that the person who makes the application has a right of property in the land, to the exclusion of all other persons. The judicial force of the proceeding is wholly expended in a conclusive determination of the rights of persons in the land. Except when the land is occupied by one who claims adversely to the applicant, the questions determined in registration are such as both before and since the adoption of the Constitution have been determined by courts of equity; and their decrees, much more distinctly than the judgments of courts of law, operate upon persons.

To authorize a court to determine the adverse claims of parties touching their rights in things, judicial process is indispensable. Judicial process, in its largest sense, comprehends all the acts of the court, from the beginning of the proceeding to its end. In a narrower sense, it is "the means of compelling a defendant to appear in court, after suing out the original writ, in civil, and, after indictment, in criminal cases." Bouvier. In every sense, it is the act of the court. This act does not contemplate process. The notice which it prescribes is the notice of the law of admiralty. The process required by the law of the land is the process of the common law. In Webster v. Reid, 52 U. S. 11 How. 437, 18 L. ed. 761, the court considered the validity of judgments rendered in proceedings under an act which attempted to authorize the quieting of titles in suits against defendants to be designated as "owners of the half-breed lands lying in Lee county," and notices to be given by publication. Justice McLean, in the opinion, said: "These suits were not a proceeding in rem against the land, but in personam against the owners of it. Whether they all resided within the territory or not does not appear, nor is it a matter of any importance. No person is required to answer in a suit on whom process has not been served, or whose property has not been attached. In this case there was no personal notice, nor an attachment or other proceeding against the land, until after the judgments. The judgments therefore are nullities." Brown v. Levee Comrs, 50 Miss. 471.

That the legislature may provide for a substituted service of judicial process when it is required by necessity is not doubted. If, in a suit to adjudicate the rights of persons in property within the state, a defendant resides without the state, such necessity is apparent, for the process of the state has no efficacy beyond its borders. Other cases of necessity are recognized. The principle is that the state may provide for the adjudication of all adversary rights of persons in property within its borders, and, to the end that such jurisdiction may be complete, the legislature may provide a substituted service of process for cases in which actual service cannot be made. In such case nothing more is required by the law of the land than that the substituted service shall be such as, in the exercise of legislative discretion, shall be found most apt to accomplish the purposes of actual service. Shepherd v. Ware, 46 Minn. 174. Surely, these views will surprise no one who is familiar with the legislative history of the state.

Section 55 of the Civil Code enacted in 1853 is now in force as § 5035 of the Revised Statutes. It provides: "A civil action must be commenced by filing in the office of the clerk of the proper court a petition, and causing a summons to be issued thereon." The subsequent sections of the chapter relate to the service of the summons so required to be issued. Their provisions for a substituted or constructive service relate wholly to cases in which actual service is impracticable. In these respects the provisions of the Code continue the former practice pursued since the organization of the state. We know of no instance prior to the passage of this act in which there was a departure from the views clearly stated by Judge Cooley, Const. Lim. [6th ed.] 452: "In judicial investigations the law of the land requires an opportunity for a trial; and there can be no trial if only one party is suffered to produce his proofs. The most formal conveyance may be a fraud or a forgery; public officers may connive with rogues to rob the citizen of his property; witnesses may testify or officers certify falsely, and records may be collusively manufactured for dishonest purposes; and that legislation which would preclude the fraud or wrong being shown, and deprive the party wronged of all remedy, has no justification in the principles of natural justice or of constitutional law." If it is borne in mind that the questions here considered concern the adversary rights of persons in property, it will sufficiently distinguish the cases which involve the police power, or the right of eminent domain, or the right of taxation.

Perhaps a more extended consideration than was necessary has been given to this particular question, since the provisions of the act and the briefs suggest the consciousness of those who framed it and those who defend it that it does not meet the constitutional requirement as to due process of law. In one of the briefs submitted for the plaintiff, it is said: "The act contemplates no adjudication as to title. The applicant cannot be adjudged to have a good title as against B or C, or unknown parties, in which a right of ownership appears. If there is any cloud upon his title, if there are any adverse interests, or the possibility of conflicting rights, he is relegated to other courts and other proceedings to try such issues. The court considers only the status of the res. If the applicant is not found to be the undisputed owner of the property in fee simple, his title is not registered." This view of the act is opposed to its provisions and obvious import. In the prescribed notice "To whom it may concern" is the authorized declaration that those thus notified "will be thereafter forever debarred from setting up any claim," etc. Not recurring to other provisions of the act which provide for the indefeasibility of the registered title, § 74 makes it indefeasible in one who has purchased for a valuable consideration from one who has procured registration by fraud. Section 75 imparts the same character to the title of such a purchaser from one who has secured registration by forgery of a deed of the real owner; and § 76 provides that "no unregistered estate shall avail against the title of a registered owner taking bona fide," etc. How is it to be known that the applicant is the "undisputed owner" until adversary parties are served with process, and afforded an opportunity to say for themselves whether they dispute the claim of the plaintiff or applicant? However effective the separation of disputants may be in the prevention of street broils, in the judicial determination of their disputes the law of the land requires that they be brought together.

The provisions of the act with respect to an "assurance fund" attract attention in this connection. Those for whose indemnity this fund is raised are described in § 146: "Any person deprived of land or of any estates or interest therein in consequence of fraud or misrepresentation in bringing such land under the operation of this act, having had no notice of the proceedings, or by the registration of any other person as owner of such lands, estate, or interest, or in consequence of any error, omission, mistake, or misdescription in any certificate of title, or in any entry or memorandum in the register of titles, or by being omitted in proof of heirship or certificate thereof as provided in section (98) ninety-eight of this act may" resort to the fund within the time and in the manner specified. It is not likely that the legislature has thought itself authorized to provide for making whole those who have been defeated in judicial proceedings of an adversary character, involving only private rights, and conducted according to the law of the land. The terms of these sections of the act show that the fund is to be raised to indemnify those whose lands have been wrongfully wrested from them, under the earlier provisions of the act, and without due process of law. When the provisions of the Constitution are applied to this penitential scheme, it at once becomes apparent that it is both inadequate and forbidden. Section 19 of the Bill of Rights ordains: "Private property shall ever be held inviolate, but subservient to the public welfare. When taken in time of war or other public exigency, imperatively requiring its immediate seizure or for the purpose of making or repairing roads which shall be open to the public without charge, a compensation shall be made to the owner in money, and in all other cases, where private property shall be taken for a public use, a compensation therefor shall first be made in money or first secured by a deposit of money."

This act is said to be a rebuke to those who have inherited from feudal times the conceit that property in lands is especially sacred. That property in lands has been more secure than property in chattels has resulted necessarily from the fact that they are not the subject of conflagrations or larceny. Some contribution to the equality of insecurity of property of the two classes may be found in those provisions of the act which look to the administration and distribution of the lands of deceased persons as though they were chattels. But property in all of its subjects is equally sacred under the protection of this section of the Bill of Rights. To permit its abrogation would equally expose all descriptions of property to spoliation. The section is an inviolable assurance to all owners of lands and chattels that, unless they are required for a public use, they may retain them in specie, placing upon them any estimate that may be suggested by judgment, sentiment, or caprice; and it is not within the combined authority of the departments of the government of the state to say that the estimate is too high. This section of the Bill of Rights was so construed by this court in McCoy v. Grandy, 8 Ohio St. 463, upon reasoning that has ever since been deemed entirely satisfactory.

In another aspect this scheme is violative of the same section of the Bill of Rights. If the use were public, the section would require an assured compensation to the owner of the property taken in every event, and, unless in a public exigency or for the construction or repair of free roads, it would require such compensation to be first made. In this act there is no provision for compensation to be first made. The owner's recourse is to a subsequent action to be instituted by himself, and subject to a limitation. Nor is there any provision for an assured compensation at any time. The owner's resort is to an assurance fund which we are told has been estimated to be sufficient to indemnify those who would be wrongfully deprived of their lands under the provisions of the act. It can scarcely need comment to show that this is not a compliance with the constitutional requirement.

In yet another aspect the scheme is violative of the same section of the Bill of Rights. Whether the assurance fund would be adequate or inadequate, it is, in part at least, to be derived from forbidden sources. The real estate in the hands of an assignee for the benefit of creditors belongs to the assignor and his creditors. These lands, by the terms of the act, are subjected to a charge or contribution payable through the recorder to the treasurer of the county. That is, to the extent of such assessments, this property is to be taken by public authority, and without the consent of the owners. For what public purpose? Primarily, the purpose is to indemnify private persons whose lands have been wrongfully taken from them under the provisions of the act. If the act were otherwise constitutional, the ultimate benefit would accrue to those who, as the result of registration (which gives conclusive effect to mistake, fraud, or forgery), have acquired lands which belong to others. That this is in no sense a public purpose seems clear. Considering the purposes for which government is instituted, and the high conception of individual right which prevailed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, it would be strange if authority had been conferred upon the state to carry on the business of an insurer of private titles. No such authority is implied in any of the terms of the Constitution. It is not implied in any of the enumerated purposes for which government is formed. It is entirely foreign to those purposes. The legislature may, by law, authorize the organization of corporations for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance, but this grant of power is rather an implied negation of its authority to conduct such business itself. The functions of the state are governmental only. Its powers are embraced within the three familiar divisions of legislative, judicial, and executive. He who affirms the existence of the power in question must be able to find it embraced in one of these divisions; and since the insuring of titles does not essentially differ from any other insurance, nor, indeed, from any other business or occupation, he must find authority in whose exercise the state may become the competitor of the citizens in every vocation.

It is further urged that the act is void because it attempts to confer judicial power on the recorder. Counsel agree that power of that character cannot be conferred upon a ministerial officer, but in support of the act it is urged that the powers indicated are ministerial, and not judicial. The principal powers conferred are to take proof after notice to the holder that a mortgage has been discharged, and, after a hearing, to enter a discharge upon the register; to make an entry that a lien has become inoperative in law by reason of limitation of time when application has been made therefor, the person interested notified, and he is satisfied that such is the fact; to correct memorials made or issued by mistake, if the rights of bona fide purchasers or lienholders for value have not intervened. It is true that the power to ascertain and decide is not necessarily a judicial power, and it is frequently exercised by ministerial officers and legislative bodies. Whether the power to hear and determine is judicial depends upon the nature of the subject of the inquiry, the parties to be affected, and the effect of the determination. While it is not supposed that any definition of judicial power, sufficient for all conceivable cases, has ever been attempted, it is clear that "to adjudicate upon, and protect the rights and interests of individual citizens, and to that end to construe and apply the laws, is the peculiar province of the judicial department." Cooley, Const. Lim. 109. Recurring to the duties of the recorder under the act, he is not merely to enter the evidence furnished by the agreement of the parties that a lien has been discharged, or that it has become void by the lapse of time, or that a mistake has intervened touching their rights, but he is to apply the rules of evidence to the ascertainment of disputed facts, to apply the rules of law concerning payment, to interpret and apply the statute of limitations as it may affect the enforcement of liens including such questions of disability as may arise, to decide the questions of law and fact that may arise in determining whether mistakes have intervened; and who are bona fide purchasers; and then to, make an entry which is to have the same effect in concluding the rights of the adversary parties as would a decree in equity. That these are judicial powers is entirely clear. They seem to have been so regarded by the general assembly, for there is a provision for appeal from decisions of the recorder. This is not supposed to include all the judicial powers which the act assumes to confer on the recorder, but it is sufficient for present purposes.

Nor is this objection to the act avoided by the provisions which contemplate a review of or appeal from the action of the recorder. It would, perhaps, be found upon a careful consideration of his powers that they are not all embraced within the provisions for review or appeal. But the assumption that they are so embraced would not validate the act in this respect. The recorder, as a ministerial officer, is incompetent to receive a grant of judicial power from the legislature. His acts in the attempted exercise of such powers are necessarily nullities. They cannot be effective to impose any obligation or burden upon a citizen, or to deprive him of any right. The act plainly contemplates that the person against whom the recorder decides in the exercise of any of the powers sought to be conferred must either submit to the adverse decision, or take upon himself the burden of an appeal. In view of the constitutional provision on the subject, he cannot be forced to this alternative. If these are judicial powers, it is admitted that they cannot be vested in the recorder. If they are not judicial, the provisions for an appeal are void, since as was said by this court in Ex parte Logan Branch at Logan of State Bank, 1 Ohio St. 432, "we have no idea of an appeal except from one court to another." An examination of People, Kern, v. Chase, 165 Ill. 527, 36 L. R. A. 105, will show that in some of its aspects the act under consideration, though differing from the act passed by the legislature of Illinois to accomplish the same purpose, is within the principles upon which that act is held void.

The views expressed touching the guarantees of the Bill of Rights are in accord with those of eminent lawyers who have considered methods for simplifying the records of titles, and diminishing the labors of searching them. The general system in the contemplation of this act has been thought impracticable, because questions of vested rights must remain open for want of due process. There have accordingly been recommended legislative enactments to shorten and simplify conveyances, to remove disabilities, to shorten the limitation of actions, to provide for general indexes for townships and wards or other small districts so as to restrict the area of search, and other like remedies operating prospectively, and having due regard to vested rights. However the general system proposed by this act may have operated where no system of registration previously existed, and the conserving influences of Constitutions are not enjoyed, it seems, in its prominent features, to be inapplicable where constitutional provisions, paramount to legislative enactments, protect vested rights, and restrict the state to the exercise of functions that are governmental in their nature. No discussion of the wisdom of the act would be appropriate here, nor do we deem it necessary to consider other questions affecting its validity. Such questions are presented, but those decided seem sufficient to dispose of the subject.

Demurrer sustained.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

FIDELITY & CASUALTY COMPANY of New York, Plff in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

1. A letter from an insurer to a claimant asking that the matter be allowed to rest until the adjuster of the company can see the claimant or his attorney constitutes a waiver of a provision in the policy limiting the time for furnishing proofs of claim and beginning an action on the policy.

2. Delaying action for insurance for more than one year and a half after a letter from the insurer asking that the matter may rest until an adjuster calls is not fatal, although nothing more is heard about the adjuster

NOTE.—What constitutes total disability of insured.

- I. Ability to do some small act.
- II. Inability to do anything.
- III. Ability to attend to part of the business.
- IV. Ability to work in other occupation.
- V. Disability of particular members.
 - a. Eyes.
 - b. Hands.
 - c. Feet.
- VI. Lunacy.
- VII. Sickness.
- VIII. Old age.
- IX. Death.
- X. "Immediately" construed.
- XI. "Per week" construed.
- XII. Other matters.
- XIII. Summary.

I. Ability to do some small act.

The cases of LOBDILL v. LABORING MEN'S MUT. AID ASSO. and TURNER v. FIDELITY & CASUALTY Co. hold that total disability exists although the insured is able to perform a few occasional acts, but is unable to do any kind of work connected with his occupation. This is in accord with the 88 L. R. A.

other authorities on this question, although the distinction is very finely drawn in some cases and largely turns on the clause in the policy defining the application of the indemnity to the injury and to the occupation, and defining the disability.

In LOBDILL v. LABORING MEN'S MUT. AID ASSO., where the plaintiff was insured from injury wholly and continuously disabling him from transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation as a merchant, and he dislocated his thumb and injured his head, producing nervous prostration, a recovery was allowed, although on one or two occasions he handed some small article to a customer and took the change. It was held that total disability did not mean absolute physical inability to transact any business pertaining to the occupation of merchant, and it was sufficient if the injuries were such that common care and prudence required him to desist from transacting any such business in order to effectuate a cure; that the ability to perform an occasional act pertaining to such occupation would not render the disability partial provided that he was unable substantially or to some material extent to transact any kind of business pertaining to such occupation.

and the delay continued for nearly a year after the limitation of the time for action, which was waived by the letter, had expired.

3. The fact that a man goes to his office every day for a short time without doing any work or business there does not show that he is not wholly disabled from prosecuting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation, where his business consists of making loans on personal security.

4. The question whether or not a person is wholly disabled so as to prevent him from doing any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation is for the jury, where the evidence shows that he went to his office every day but was unable to do any kind of work.

(April 27, 1897.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Saginaw County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

In TURNER v. FIDELITY & CASUALTY CO., where the plaintiff was insured as a banker and real-estate dealer under a policy providing against injuries "which shall, independently of all other causes, immediately and wholly disable and prevent him from prosecuting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation above stated," and his business consisted generally in personal security loans, and his injury was such that his arm was entirely disabled although he went to his office for a short time but was unable to do any kind of work, and did no business at all, but employed others to do it for him, it was held that the question of total disability was one for the jury, and they were instructed that the clause meant, not that he might not do some one thing in regard to it, but that he must be prevented from doing any and every kind of business pertaining to that occupation. A recovery was allowed.

So, a recovery was allowed under a policy providing for injuries which "shall immediately, continuously, and wholly disable and prevent the insured from performing any and every kind of duty pertaining to his occupation" where the insured, who is a barber, occasionally attempted to do certain portions of his work, but whenever he attempted to do so suffered additional great bodily pain,—bodily discomfort; that it rendered him so weak that in a short time he had to sit down. Hohn v. Interstate Casualty Co. (Mich.) 4 Det. L. N. 777.

This case approved the cases of LOBDILL v. LABORING MEN'S MUT. AID ASSO. and TURNER v. FIDELITY & CASUALTY CO.

And where the occupation under which the plaintiff was insured was that of a billiard saloon keeper, the words "immediately and wholly disable and prevent him from the prosecution of any and every kind of business pertaining to the occupation under which he is insured" did not require proof that the accident wholly disabled him from the doing of every and any kind of act necessary to be done in the prosecution of his business, but it was sufficient to prove that the injury wholly disabled him from the doing of all the substantial and material acts necessary to be done in the prosecution of his business. Young v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 80 Me. 244.

In this case it was said that it was sufficient if the injury was of such a character and to such an extent that common care and prudence required him to desist from his labors and rest so long as it was reasonably necessary to effectuate a speedy cure.

Messrs. Hanchett & Hanchett, for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff is presumed to have known the terms and conditions of his policy, and he is bound by the limitation clause.

Lantz v. Teutonia F. Ins. Co. 96 Mich. 445; Law v. New England Mut. Acci. Asso. 94 Mich. 286; Voorheis v. People's Mut. Ben. Soc. 91 Mich. 469; Peck v. German F. Ins. Co. 102 Mich. 52; Holladay v. Phenix Ins. Co. 7 U. S. App. 325, 51 Fed. Rep. 715, 2 C. C. A. 463; Allibone v. Fidelity & C. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 569; Railway Pass. & F. C. Mut. Aid & Ben. Asso. v. Loomis, 142 Ill. 560; Love v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 115 N. C. 18; Garrelson v. Hawkeye Ins. Co. 65 Iowa, 463; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. California Ins. Co. 1 N. D. 151, 8 L. R. A. 769.

The language of the letter in no way estops the company from insisting upon the limitation clause.

Security Ins. Co. v. Fay, 22 Mich. 467, 7 Am. Rep. 670; Steel v. Phenix Ins. Co. 47 Fed. Rep. 863; Jewett v. Home Ins. Co. 29 Iowa, 562;

And under a policy with the clause "shall cause any bodily injury to the insured of so serious a nature as wholly to disable him from following his usual business, occupation, or pursuits," a solicitor and registrar of a county court was entitled to recover where he sprained his ankle severely and was confined to his bedroom for some weeks, being unable to go down stairs, and was prevented from passing his accounts as registrar and from attending at various places at which he was required to complete purchases for his clients. It was held that the sense intended to be conveyed was "that if the person insured should be wholly disabled from carrying on his business as he usually carried it on, the company would be liable." It was said that the ability to receive his clients in his room would not prevent a recovery. Hooper v. Accidental Death Ins. Co. 5 Hurst. & N. 546, 29 L. J. Exch. N. S. 340, 8 Week. Rep. 616.

And where a policy providing for total disability described the assured by "occupation and employment an iceman (prop.)," and the application says: "My occupation is fully described as follows: iceman, proprietor,"—it was held that there was a total disability within the meaning of the policy, although the assured notwithstanding his injuries was able to give general directions to persons who took his place as an iceman for the delivery of ice during the period of his disability. It was also held that the occupation or employment of the plaintiff as an iceman, adding the words "as proprietor," did not describe him as only engaged in the management of a business, but was broad enough to include a practical and laboring man engaged in the actual delivery of ice in his own behalf. Neafie v. Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. 35 Hun, 111.

"Total disability" was held to include the confinement of a physician to his bed as the result of an injury, although during that time he administered to some patients certain medicines within his reach but never left his bed. Wolcott v. United L. & Acci. Ins. Asso. 55 Hun, 98.

II. Inability to do anything.

Where the evidence is clear that the insured is unable to do anything, a recovery of course follows.

And under a clause providing "immediately, totally, and continuously disable from doing anything in and about his usual occupation," it was held that it was clear that the insured was for a short time absolutely disabled to do anything whi-

Plaintiff's own testimony shows that he was on hand, attending to business every day. He could have directed the business, and undoubtedly did direct the business.

The mere fact that he says he did nothing is not sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that he was able to do nothing. His physician says that he was only partially disabled. The testimony being undisputed, the court should not have permitted the jury to find that he was totally disabled.

Messrs. Beach & Gavit, for defendant in error:

The clause that action must be commenced within twelve months is only valid as a contract, and may be waived.

Peoria M. & F. Ins. Co. v. Hall, 12 Mich. 202.

The positive act of the company intending to induce postponement is not necessary, and where the evidence upon this point is conflicting, waiver is a question for the jury. Mere silence, however, is no waiver, though it may be evidence to go to the jury.

The law does not favor clauses of limitation in policies of insurance, and they are strictly construed and allowed to be readily waived.

ever pertaining to his occupation in the strictest sense in which the appellant claims the phrase was used. For the time thus lost he was entitled to be paid. Globe Acci. Ins. Co. v. Helwig, 13 Ind. App. 539.

And under a policy providing "against loss of life or personal injury: against loss of life in the sum of . . . after sufficient proof that the assured . . . shall have sustained personal injury . . . and such injuries shall occasion death within ninety days from the happening thereof . . . ; against personal injury . . . which shall not be fatal: but which shall absolutely and totally disable him from the prosecution of his usual employment,"—the company was liable where the testator had his arm crushed on December 11, and was totally disabled from the prosecution of his usual employment till the succeeding March 12, on which day he died from the result of the accident. The fatality of the accident was not a defense, and it was held that there were two classes of injuries provided for, one where the life was lost within ninety days, and one for those injuries not fatal, in the sum of $10 a week for a period not exceeding altogether twenty-six weeks, and that the two provisions were to be construed together and the intent was that if an injury happened within the meaning of the policy, it was insured against as coming within one class or the other. Perry v. Provident L. Ins. & Invest. Co. 103 Mass. 242. In this case the plaintiff had previously failed in an action for the death amount.

III. Ability to attend to part of the business.

It is generally held that where the insured is able to do some line of work connected with his business he cannot recover, although there are two cases which hold that if a person is unable to perform substantially all his duties a recovery can be had.

No recovery could be had under a policy providing for indemnity for injuries, "which shall, independently of all other causes, immediately, wholly, and continuously disable him from transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation above stated," where the superintendent of a burial-case company was injured so that his knee had to be put in plaster, but at no time was he prevented from attending to some part of his business. The clause was held to be a bar to a recovery unless the disability was so complete as to prevent the insured from doing any part or kind of business pertaining to his occupation. Spicer v. Commercial Mut. Acci. Co. 4 Pa. Dist. R. 271.

ness pertaining to his occupation. Spicer v. Commercial Mut. Acci. Co. 4 Pa. Dist. R. 271.

This case declined to follow the case of Young v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 80 Me. 244, on the ground that in that case the court held such clause to mean "wholly disable him from the prosecution of any part of his business," and that this was equivalent to partial disability only.

And under a policy with the clause "under classification preferred (being a capitalist by occupation) . . . which shall, independently of all other causes, immediately and wholly disable him from transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation above stated," instructions "that if plaintiff's occupation was such a business as a person classed as a capitalist might reasonably follow," and there was a total disability "from transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to his said occupation, the verdict should be for him, and 'that the fact that he is described as a capitalist was to be regarded as the class in which he was insured, but not as necessarily determining his occupation for the purpose of deciding whether or not he was totally disabled. Capitalists may follow various occupations, and if plaintiff was injured while pursuing any occupation not more hazardous than is usual among men classed as capitalists, and so injured as to deprive him of the ability to transact any business which a capitalist might reasonably be expected to follow, they should find for plaintiff,'"—were clearly erroneous as the policy did not class the plaintiff as a capitalist, but insured him in a preferred class because he is a capitalist by occupation, which was a very different matter. It was held that the statement that the plaintiff might recover if totally disabled from transacting any business which a person classed as capitalist might reasonably be expected to follow was erroneous, as there is no business which a capitalist might not as reasonably be expected to follow as anyone else; but the error was immaterial as the evidence showed the plaintiff was totally disabled from transacting any business. Bean v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 94 Cal. 581.

And where an injury appeared at first to be slight but in about a week became very painful and so continued for a long time, during which the arm was carried in a sling, and sleep could only be had in a chair, but the assured was at no time prevented from going to his factory and superintending his business, no recovery could be had under a

A mere temporary ailment or indisposition which does not tend to weaken or undermine the constitution at the time of taking membership does not render the policy or certificate void.

Purditzky v. Supreme Lodge, K. of H. 76 Mich. 428; May, Ins. § 296.

The contract of insurance was indemnity to plaintiff for loss of time for being wholly disabled from prosecuting his business as specified in the policy, and he was not able to prosecute his business unless he was able to do all the substantial acts necessary to be done in this prosecution.

Young v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 80 Me. 244; May, Ins. § 522; Hooper v. Accidental Death Ins. Co. 5 Hurlst. & N. 546; Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 65 Mich. 545; Anderson v. Fitzgerald, 4 H. L. policy providing that for bodily injuries "which . . . shall immediately and wholly disable and prevent him from the prosecution of any and every kind of business pertaining to the occupation under which he is rated" he "shall receive . . . for such period of continuous total disability." This clause limits relief to a case of total disability which wholly prevents him from prosecuting his business. The court said that if there was any doubt it would be made clear by another condition in the policy limiting the relief "to the money value of his time or weekly wages." It was further held that a clause stamped on the back of the policy giving a schedule and providing "the payment of weekly relief whether totally or partially disabling . . . shall be in full satisfaction," meant that for injuries set out in the schedule there attached they will assume a total disablement for the time specified whether partial or total, but this was not one of the enumerated injuries. Gracey v. People's Mut. Acci. Ins. Asso. 21 Pitts. L. J. N. S. 25.

And under a policy describing the assured as "by occupation, profession, or employment a leather cutter and merchant," providing an indemnity if injured so as to "wholly disable and prevent him from the prosecution of any and every kind of business pertaining to the occupation under which he is insured," it was held that the plaintiff was insured as a leather cutter and merchant and to be "entitled to recover a weekly indemnity, he must be wholly disabled from the prosecution of any and every kind of business pertaining to . . . the twofold occupation of leather cutter and merchant." Ford v. United States Mut. Acci. Relief Co. 143 Mass. 153, 1 L. R. A. 700.

There was no liability on a policy providing "that indemnity is to be paid for loss of time resulting from bodily injuries which shall . . . immediately, wholly, and continuously disable from the transaction of any and every kind of business pertaining to his profession as an attorney at law," where the injury did not wholly and continuously disable the assured from the transaction of any kind of business pertaining to his profession, although the attorney was so injured as to prevent the use of his hand for twenty-six weeks, and he suffered pain and could not write, but attended his office, advised clients, accepted employment and commenced suits. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Millard, 43 Ill. App. 148.

Long, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover a weekly indemnity under an accident policy issued by the defendant to the plaintiff on the 8th day of January, 1889, and subsequently renewed from year to year, the last renewal certificate covering a period from January 8, 1894, to January 8, 1895. On February 10, 1894, while the plaintiff was carrying wood on a wheelbarrow, he slipped and fell, dislocating his right shoulder. He claims an indemnity under the policy for a total disability for a period of ten weeks. At the time the policy was issued and at the time of the accident, the plaintiff was engaged in the business of loaning money on personal security and real estate. He was insured as a banker and real-estate dealer. He made two claims under this policy, the first one being made on March 12, 1894. Nothing was done in respect to this claim. Afterwards, and on June 21, 1894, the plaintiff made a second statement of claim, which was forwarded to the company by Camp & Brooks, his attorneys. In regard to this letter, the defendant where the policy provided compensation for an accident "which absolutely and totally disabled him from prosecuting his usual employment," and the surgeon selected by the insured testified that "such a hernia as this does not necessarily prevent a man from attending to his business by wearing a truss properly adjusted, who could go to and attend to his business," and the evidence was conflicting as to the effect of the injury. Potter v. Accident Ins. Co. 29 Ind. 210.

Under a policy providing for relief "while totally disabled and prevented from the transaction of all kinds of business," an instruction though he may have been able to do some parts of the accustomed work thereof, he may yet recover so long as he cannot to some extent do all parts and engage in all such employments, was erroneous, as almost total soundness and ability instead of total disability were made the condition of plaintiff's right to recover and of defendant's liability. So, an instruction that "the words 'all kinds of business' should receive a practical construction and with reference to the party insured, and if he was qualified to engage in any business which he could do under the injury, then it would be his duty under the contract so to do, but the fact that there may be some business or occupation in which he could engage, would not prevent a recovery unless it was an occupation or business which he was qualified to engage in as an occupation, and transact in the usual way," was erroneous. The court said that this construction meant that defendant would indemnify on account of loss sustained by being partially disabled from some kinds of business, and was erroneous. Lyon v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 46 Iowa, 631.

In Hollobaugh v. People's Ins. Asso. 138 Pa. 595, where the plaintiff sustained a severe injury in the muscles of his left arm which totally incapacitated him from following his regular occupation until February 8, and from that date until April 13 incapacitated him from such occupation in part although he was at no time confined to his house and was able to visit an oil well as superintendent, and did so on several occasions, giving directions as to what should be done to the wells, made purchases of supplies, paid the workmen, made reports to his employer, but was compelled to hire other persons to perform the principal part of his duties, it was held his injury was neither a "partial permanent," nor "total permanent disability" within the terms of the policy.

wrote the following letter, dated July 2, 1894:

"Your favor of June 23d, inclosing claim blank regarding the above for an alleged injury stated to have been received February 10, duly to hand. I beg to say that we have already received a claim blank from Mr. Turner for an alleged injury stated to have been received February 10. We have already notified you that we fail to recognize any liability in that matter, and return the claim blank herewith. One of our adjusters will be in Saginaw shortly, and we will have him call upon you, and discuss this matter with you. We think he will be able to show you that there is a breach of warranty in Mr. Turner's application, and therefore no liability on the part of the company under the policy Mr. Turner holds. Kindly allow the matter to rest until our adjuster can see you, and oblige."

Nothing more was done by either party until this suit was commenced, February 4, 1896.

The first assignment of error relates to the refusal of the court to direct a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that the suit was not commenced within one year from the date of the injury. The policy provides that "unless affirmative proof of death or duration of disability is so furnished within seven months, and any legal proceeding for recovery hereunder is begun within one year from the time of such accident, all claims based thereon shall be forfeited to the company." The claim of plaintiff is that the letter above quoted, written to Camp & Brooks, constitutes a waiver of this clause of the policy. On the other hand, it is contended that inasmuch as, during the time from the receipt of the letter to the commencement of suit, no adjuster of the company called upon plaintiff or his attorneys, and there was no communication of any kind between them on the subject of the adjustment of the claim, the plaintiff was not justified in waiting a year and a half before bringing suit; and, again, that the statement in the letter, requesting him to let the matter rest, would not warrant or justify the plaintiff in permitting the year to go by without bringing his suit if he desired to protect his rights; that the plaintiff might have been justified in waiting a

Where the policy provided that "if the insured shall sustain bodily injuries, . . . which shall, independently of all other causes, immediately and wholly disable and prevent him from the prosecution of any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation," the right to recover was restricted to the time of total disability "from the prosecution of any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation," and the submission to the jury on the theory that a recovery could be had where the insured was "rendered wholly unable to do his accustomed labor; that is, to do substantially all kinds of his accustomed labor to some extent," was error. Saveland v. Fidelity & C. Co. 67 Wis. 174, 58 Am. Rep. 863. In this case the plaintiff was confined to his home for a week, and afterwards by means of great exertion was enabled to get to his buggy and superintend a small part of his business as grocer.

This case distinguished the case of Sawyer v. United States Casualty Co. (Mass.) 8 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 233, for the reason that there the clause was "totally disable him from the prosecution of his usual employment." The court said that case "never reached the supreme court of that state, nor do we find it referred to in any subsequent case in any court," and it followed Hooper v. Accidental Death Ins. Co. 5 Hurst. & N. 546, 29 L. J. Exch. N. S. 340, 8 Week. Rep. 616, where the clause was "wholly to disable him from following his usual business occupation or pursuits," and in neither of those cases was the language of the policy so broad as in the case at bar.

And where the policy had the clause, "be so bodily and physically injured as to be immediately totally and continuously disabled from doing anything in and about his usual occupation," and the assured for seven weeks went to his office in a buggy and sat for an hour or so per day with his feet propped on a pillow, opening letters and discussing business but was disabled from performing many of his duties, and employed an extra man, but during most of the time was able to perform some of them, it was held that the court was not called upon to determine whether or not to bring the insured within the terms of the policy; it should have been such as to disable him from doing any and every thing pertaining to his occupation. Globe Acci. Ins. Co. v. Helwig, 13 Ind. App. 539.

But under a policy insuring against loss of time resulting from bodily injury through external, violent, or accidental means, which should immediately and wholly disable him "from transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation," defined by a printed manual of the company providing that "when a member is deprived by accidental injury covered by the policy of the power to perform substantially all the duties of the occupation under which he is insured, he is wholly disabled within the meaning of the policy and entitled to indemnity," a recovery was allowed where the assured could not walk without crutches for eight or ten months after the accident, and was not able to engage in any manual labor for more than a year thereafter, while his regular duties were to buy goods of agents and sell them to the people, and repair furniture such as chairs and tables, also to trim caskets and make picture frames, although it appeared that after his injury he was daily in attendance at his furniture and undertaking store, with the exception of two or three days immediately after the injury, and that he kept the books of the company which were brought to him for that purpose during the whole time he was confined at the house. Baldwin v. Fraternal Acci. Asso. 31 Misc. 124.

And this case further held that where the manual of the company stated that "the restriction as to occupation applies only to those who follow such occupation as a trade or means of livelihood," a clause in the policy providing that "members of a higher classification accidentally injured while engaged in polo, base-ball games, or bicycling, will receive only the indemnity as herein provided for such games," applied only to professionals and not to a man riding a bicycle from his place of business to his dwelling house.

And the words "absolutely and totally disable him from the prosecution of his usual employment," were held to mean "wholly unable to do his accustomed labor; that is, to do substantially all kinds of his accustomed labor to some extent." "Substantially" was explained as follows: "If you find that at a certain time the plaintiff was able to do all such work to such extent as he ordinarily was accustomed to do, then his right to recover ceases, although you may find he was still unable to perform some kinds of extraordinary labor which before the accident he sometimes did."

Sawyer v. United States Casualty Co. (Mass.) 8 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 233. It was said in this case that if a farmer was able to milk cows, but unable to do reasonable time after receiving the letter before taking action, but not in waiting the time he did, as the letter held out no hope or promise of an adjustment, but merely asked that an opportunity might be given the company to explain why liability was denied. This clause in the policy, however, was one which could be waived by the company. It cannot be construed as a limitation fixed by law. While the plaintiff was not bound to wait before bringing suit, yet it is apparent that he did wait at the request of the company. He testified that the reason he did not begin his action within the twelve months was because of the receipt of the letter of July 2. Such clauses in policies of insurance, while held valid as contracts, may be waived by the company. The law does not favor clauses of limitation in policies of insurance, and they are strictly construed, and it does not require the positive act of the company inducing postponement; but where the evidence is conflicting, the question of waiver is one for the jury. We think, however, in this case, that there is no conflict in the evidence, and that the letter was positive in its terms, asking that the matter be allowed to rest until the adjuster of the company could see the plaintiff or his attorneys. As was said in Bonessant v. American F. Ins. Co., 76 Mich. 658: "Forfeiture is not favored either in law or equity, and a provision for it in a contract will be strictly construed, and courts will find a waiver of it upon slight evidence, when the equity of the claim is, under the contract, in favor of the assured." See also Lyon v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 55 Mich. 146, 54 Am. Rep. 354; and cases there cited; Peoria M. & F. Ins. Co. v. Hall, 12 Mich. 202; 2 May, Ins. § 488; German F. Ins. Co. v. Carrow, 21 Ill. App. 631; Thompson v. Phenix Ins. Co., 136 U. S. 287, 34 L. ed. 408.

It is next contended that the plaintiff's own evidence and the evidence of his attending physician does not support the finding that he was totally disabled in the sense intended by the policy, and that the court should so other work, he could recover, and that if a merchant could post his books at home, but was unable to attend his place of business, he could recover.

IV. Ability to work in other occupation.

The effect of a disability when the insured is still able to work in some other occupation depends on the terms of the contract defining the disability.

Under a benefit association article with the clause "totally and permanently disabled from following his or her usual occupation," defined by another section of the article, to be "such a permanent and disabling sickness as shall render the member helpless to the extent of permanently preventing the member from following any occupation whereby he or she can obtain a livelihood," an answer which set up that the insured was able to follow occupations which were not of a like character as that of a barber, which was the plaintiff's occupation, was held to be a good answer. Albert v. Order of Chosen Friends, 34 Fed. Rep. 721.

"Total inability to labor," contained in the constitution and by-laws of a railroad relief association the object of which was to relieve its members during the time when they were unable to work by reason of injury or sickness, was held to mean that if a member was injured in such a way that he could no longer earn a livelihood at the particular labor at which he was employed at the time of the accident, yet was capable of earning as much or more money in some other employment, it was not the object of the association that he should remain idle and draw benefits all his life. It was held that a recovery could not be had where a railroad employee had his arm cut off and was taken back in the employ of the railroad about two months after the accident and remained until a second discharge, the first of which was for drunkenness, and the second for inattention to his duties. Baltimore & O. Employees Relief Assn. v. Post, 122 Pa. 597, 2 L. R. A. 44.

Under a policy classing the assured as "a retired" which might be assumed to mean "gentleman," and providing for injury which shall "wholly disable and prevent him from the prosecution of any and every kind of business pertaining to the occupation under which he receives membership," a recovery was denied where the injury was received while operating a buzz saw and the assured was required to carry the hand in a sling depriving him of the use of the same to a greater or less extent during a period of some months. The court said: "Can it be said that a man with his hand in a sling, and suffering a degree of discomfort from a painful wound in that member, is wholly disabled and prevented from the prosecution of every kind of business pertaining to the condition of a retired gentleman," adding that he might still keep an eye upon his investments, collect and disburse his income, attend the meeting of the board of directors, superintend repairs of his property. Operating a buzz saw was not deemed incident to the occupation or condition of a retired gentleman. Knapp v. Preferred Mut. Acci. Assn., 53 Hun. 84.

But under a policy providing "for the immediate continuous, and total loss of such business time as may result from his injuries," where the plaintiff was insured as a railroad employee and the premium was paid by an order on the railroad company and the policy recited that the insured "is by occupation local fireman under classification engineers," it was held that the company was liable where the injury only disabled the assured and prevented him from following his occupation and performing his duties, and resulted in a total loss of his business time. The reference in the policy to "the loss of such business time" was to the occupation of the assured and the loss of time in such business, meant the loss of time in the business of a fireman, and did not refer to other pursuits. Pennington v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co., 85 Iowa, 463.

This distinguishes the case of Lyon v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co., 46 Iowa, 631, as in that case the obligation provided against disability "from the transaction of all kinds of business."

And under a policy providing for indemnity "should a member become disabled from following his usual or some other occupation," a brakeman, whose foot was crushed by the cars and was afterwards amputated, and which rendered him unable to follow the work of a brakeman, but who afterwards obtained employment by the company in watching a tower and in watching a milk car, could recover. It was held that the expression "some other occupation" was not the equivalent of "all other occupations." It was further held that this clause meant that a recovery could be had if the assured was disabled from following his "usual occupation" caused by an injury received while engaged in his usual occupation. Neill v. Order of United Friends, 73 Hun. 255.

Under a certificate by which the applicant made the constitution of the society the basis of the contract, and which provided that "a total or permanent disability to perform or direct any kind of labor or business . . . shall entitle a member holding a certificate of endowment so disabled . . . to the have instructed the jury. The policy provides an indemnity of the sum of $50 per week "against loss of time not exceeding twenty-six consecutive weeks, resulting from bodily injuries effected during the term of this insurance, through external, violent, and accidental means, which shall, independently of all other causes, immediately and wholly disable and prevent him from prosecuting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation above stated." Upon this point the plaintiff testified substantially that the fall entirely disabled his arm to the shoulder, and that it remained in that condition ten weeks; that his business consisted generally in personal security loans, and that during that time he did no business at all; that he could not dress himself without help, and that he had help during the whole time; that he did not do any work or business during that time, but had a man to do it for him; that he went to his office every day for a short time, but was unable to do any kind of work. We find nothing in the record which shows, or tends to show, from the testimony of the plaintiff or his attending physician, that the plaintiff was not totally disabled from attending to and prosecuting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation. At least, it was a question for the jury to determine, and the court submitted it in these words: "I think that a fair interpretation of that clause is, not that he must be so disabled as to prevent him from doing anything pertaining to the business, but that he must be wholly disabled, so as to prevent him from doing any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation; not that he might do some one thing in regard to it, but that he must be wholly disabled, so as to prevent him from doing any and every kind of business pertaining to that occupation. I submit to you as a question of fact to find whether he was so disabled, and for what length of time, under this policy." In the case of Young v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 80 Me. 244, a policy in the payment of one half of the endowment to which he would be entitled at death" an amendment providing that "a member who by reason of a disability incurred after admission to endowment membership, becomes unable to direct or perform the kind of business or labor which he has always followed, and by which alone he can thereafter earn a livelihood, shall be deemed entitled to disability benefits," was held to apply, and a recovery was had, where a switchman was totally disabled from performing the duties of a switchman upon the railroads in which for many years he had been engaged. It was held that "whether he can now earn a livelihood by some other business was a question of fact which, had it not been waived, should have been submitted to the jury." In this case the hand was injured in coupling cars, which necessitated the amputation of the fingers of the right hand. Hutchinson v. Supreme Tent K. of M. of the World, 68 Hun. 355.

In this case it was said that total disability "must be determined from the facts and circumstances disclosed in each case. That which would be total disability in one case might not be in another. The loss of a hand by a lawyer might interfere but slightly in the transaction of his business, or in the performance of his work, whilst to a man who had learned a particular trade, by which he had always earned his living, and was entirely ignorant of all other trades or business, it might prove to be a much more serious disability. Ordinarily, the loss of the fingers of the hand does not constitute total disability from the performance of any kind of labor or business."

Under a contract with the words "totally and permanently disabled from following his or her usual occupation," where an illiterate laborer was ruptured requiring so large a truss that it could not be worn without great danger of serious injury, it was held that in determining whether the plaintiff was disabled to such an extent as to prevent him from pursuing some other avocation in which he could earn a livelihood, his former occupation, his education and business experience, his natural abilities, and his age should be considered. McMahon v. Supreme Council O. of C. F. 54 Mo. App. 468.

A contract of a benevolent society providing that "a member who shall find himself incapable of working by reason of sickness or accident shall receive," applied to total blindness resulting from an accident to one eye, which injury gradually extended to the other eye. Mogé v. Société de Bienfaisance St. Jean Baptiste, 167 Mass. 298, 35 L. R. A. 734.

And under a policy defining "permanent total disability" to be "a complete and irrevocable loss of sight in both eyes," and "permanent partial disability" to be "a complete and irrevocable loss of sight in one eye," where the assured had only one eye at the time of obtaining the policy, which fact was known to the agent, and he afterwards lost the sight of the other eye, this was held to be "a complete and irrevocable loss of sight in both eyes," and a total disability. Bawden v. London, E. & G. Assur. Co. [1892] 2 Q. B. 534.

So, where the certificate provided that in case of permanent disability by the loss of both eyes the company will pay for the "total and permanent loss of the sight of both eyes the whole of the principal sum named," the company was liable, although the insured had but one eye at the time of the application, which fact was not stated in his application but was known to the soliciting and general agent. It was held that there was no doubt that the policy was taken under the belief that the words "total and permanent loss of the sight of both eyes" were equivalent to the loss of eyesight. Humphreys v. National Ben. Assn. 139 Pa. 264, 11 L. R. A. 564.

But a recovery was denied for a total and permanent loss of one eye where the by-law providing for such disability was not adopted until some time after the insurance was effected, and it was not pleaded or proved that a similar by-law was in existence when the policy was issued. It was further held that the finding of facts that there was such a by-law at the time of incorporation, which was not sustained by pleading or proof, did not avail. Maynard v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. L. & Acci. Ins. Assn. 14 Utah, 458.

b. Hands.

Where the policy provided for loss of time "from any one injury for other than injuries resulting in the loss of one or both hands, feet, or eyes, causing immediate, continuous, and total disability; or if such injuries shall cause the loss of one foot or one hand, within ninety days will pay such member $585," the question whether the tearing off of three fingers wholly and a part of the other, and cutting the hand and destroying the joint of the thumb, was the loss of one hand, "causing immediate, continuous, and total disability of the same within the eract language of this policy was considered by the supreme court of Maine. That court used this illustration: "Suppose a barber, who can use his razor and shears in his right hand only, and can use his left to wipe his customer's face, comb and dress his hair and receive pay and make change, by an accident is wholly deprived of the use of his right hand so that he can neither shave his customer nor cut his hair; can it be said that he is not wholly disabled from prosecuting of his business as a barber?" It was held by that court that there is a difference between being able to perform any part of his business and any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation. If this language in the policy is ambiguous and susceptible of two constructions, then the question must be solved in favor of the insured: for it is well settled in this state that where a stipulation or exception to a policy, emanating from the insurer is capable of two meanings, the one is to be adopted which is the most favorable to the insured; and it should be framed with such deliberate care that no form or expression by which, on the one hand, the party assured can be caught, or by which, on the other, the company can be cheated, should be found on the face of it. Utt v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 65 Mich. 545; Grand Rapids Electric Light & P. Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. (Mich.) 8 Det. L. N. 669.

It is further contended that the attending physician having testified that, in treating this dislocation, he discovered that the plaintiff had sustained an injury at some time to that shoulder, which produced, as he called it, "traumatic rheumatism," and a part of the pain was due to that, therefore the company should not be called upon to pay for an injury the inconvenience of which resulted partly and indirectly from disease or bodily infirmity previously existing. We think that question was fully and fairly submitted to the jury and need not be discussed.

The judgment will be affirmed.

meaning of the contract of insurance, was a question of fact for the jury, who found that such loss of the hand was entire. The court said that if the hand was injured so as to become useless as a hand the defendant became liable for its use under the contract. Lord v. American Mut. Acci. Assn. 89 Wis. 19, 26 L. R. A. 741.

In Sneek v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 81 Hun. 831, under a policy providing indemnity for injuries "if loss by severance of one entire hand" should result, where the plaintiff's hand was cut off three fourths of an inch back of the knuckle joint and just back of the second bone of the thumb, it was held that to bring the case within the provisions of the question "the loss must be of the entire hand. Of course this means substantially the entire hand, both in respect to its structure and its use. In this case upon the undisputed evidence, there was not such a loss in either respect."

But on a subsequent appeal in the same case (88 Hun. 94), after plaintiff had testified substantially that he had no use of the injured member as a hand, and never had since the accident, although admitting that upon the former trial he had probably testified that he could use it to place under and against objects for the purpose of lifting and pushing, it was held that "the term 'entire hand' is to be taken in its general acceptance and ordinary meaning." The court said that "it would seem to be an extremely narrow and technical construction of this contract to say that only a physical removal of every particle of that portion of the human anatomy known as the hand would entitle the insured to recover under the clause of the policy now under consideration." And it was held that the trial court erred in holding that the plaintiff had not suffered the loss "by severance of one entire hand," and in holding that he was not entitled to recover. (This in effect overrules the prior decision.)

Under a policy providing for indemnity for "loss of a hand at and above the wrist joint" the insured "shall be considered totally disabled," it was held that the loss of the use of the hand was covered by the policy, and a recovery was allowed although the insured was afterwards employed by the company in another line of work as a yard switchman. Gahagan v. Morrissey, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 135.

A recovery was allowed where a bank cashier lost his hand by falling against a band saw some time after he had used the same, which injury was claimed to have been caused by stepping on something and stumbling and falling against the saw. The instructions were to the effect that under a clause providing that "the member is required and agrees to use all due diligence for his personal safety and protection," no recovery could be had if the insured was negligent, and that under a clause that the insurance shall not cover "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger" the member's going into a planing mill was not such an exposure, but that whether such an exposure took place in the mill was a question for the jury. The jury were also instructed that under a clause providing that the certificate should be void "as to all accidents occurring [to the insured] when engaged in any profession, employment, or exposure not [herein] rated . . . as a preferred occupation," if the injury occurred while he was in the act of using the saw and such act was incident to his ordinary avocation he still could recover, and that he would not change his avocation by doing an occasional act connected with some other avocation. The jury were also instructed that if the plaintiff voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger he could not recover. Hess v. Preferred Masonic Mut. Acci. Assn. (Mich.) 8 Det. L. N. 906.

In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Snowden, 45 Neb. 249, where a stock driver lost his hand in attempting to climb on a train, the question was whether the clause of the policy providing against "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, entering or trying to enter or leave a moving conveyance using steam as a motive power," prevented a recovery.

For loss of hand, see also Hutchinson v. Supreme Tent, K. of M. of the World, 68 Hun. 365.

c. Feet.

Under a policy with the clause "suffers the loss of the entire sight of both eyes, or the loss of two entire hands or two entire feet, or one entire hand or one entire foot," it was held that an injury from a bullet in the spine producing an immediate and total paralysis of the lower part of his body, and entirely destroying the use of both feet was a loss of two entire feet within the meaning of the policy. Sheenan v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 88 Wis. 507, 9 L. R. A. 684.

But no recovery was allowed under a policy providing for injuries which shall "wholly disable and prevent him from the prosecution of any and every kind of business pertaining to the occupation," and providing for permanent partial disablement, viz., the loss of one foot, where the in-

And under a clause providing for compensation for "one entire hand and one entire foot" no recovery could be had for the loss of one foot where the assured did not also lose one hand. Gentry v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. (C. P.) 8 Ohio Dec. 114.

VI. Lunacy.

Under the rules of a friendly society providing that he shall receive eight shillings per week during any sickness or accident that may befall him, and another rule providing for a member sending a certificate if his illness should continue for more than a month, and another that when any member falls sick he shall send a written report to the steward, where the society was formed under 18 & 19 Vict. chap. 63, § 9, subs. 2, providing for the relief or maintenance of members in old age, sickness, or widowhood, it was held that lunacy was the effect of a diseased mind or body, and should come within the meaning of sickness. Burton v. Eyden, 28 L. T. N. S. 408, L. R. 8 Q. B. 295, 42 L. J. M. C. N. S. 115, 21 Week. Rep. 503.

VII. Sickness.

Under a clause providing against "falling sick" a recovery was not allowed where the incapacity resulted from old age. Dunkley v. Harrison, 56 L. T. N. S. 860.

But see next subdivision as to old age.

And the provision in a constitution and by-laws of a benefit society allowing benefits "in case of sickness" and providing that "when any member — takes sick" he shall be entitled to such benefits, "if it be so that he is not able to attend to his daily labor," was held not to include a case of a permanent bodily injury which did not affect the general health of the person. In this case the insured was crippled as to one leg, and was "unable to perform severe manual labor, and in all probability will forever continue to be unable to perform the duties of a coachman or to perform severe manual labor." This was held not to be sickness. Kelly v. Ancient Order of Hibernians, 9 Daly, 239.

And no recovery was allowed for sickness where 88 L. R. A.

chant. It is sufficient if his injuries were such that common care and prudence required him to desist from transacting any such business in order to effectuate a cure.

3. Inability to transact some kinds or branches of business pertaining to his occupation as merchant would not constitute total disability within the meaning of the policy, provided he was able to transact other kinds or branches of business pertaining to such occupation.

4. But ability to occasionally perform some trivial or unimportant act connected with some kind of business pertaining to such occupation would not render his disability partial, instead of total, provided he was unable to substantially, or to some material extent, transact any kind of business pertaining to such occupation.

5. The fact that he occasionally performed some act connected with his business as a merchant would not necessarily the policy provided "for confinement to the bed, caused by sickness in the sum of $6.40 per week," where the insured was confined to the bed only one day. Gainor v. St. Lawrence L. Asso. 21 Misc. 27.

But the term "sickness" was held to apply where the insured became affected with lunacy, which was held to be the effect of a diseased mind or body. Burton v. Eyden, 28 L. T. N. S. 408, L. R. 8 Q. B. 295, 42 L. J. M. C. N. S. 115, 21 Week. Rep. 503.

In Dodds v. Canadian Mut. Aid Asso. 19 Ont. Rep. 70, it was said that total disability might arise from various causes, such as illness.

VIII. Old age.

Where the disability was caused by bronchitis and asthma aggravated by old age, it was held that "the words 'total disability' used in the certificate are there used without any limitation whatever, either as to the duration of the disability, or as to the cause from which it shall arise, or as to the doing of what there shall be the disability. Total disability may be temporary or it may be permanent; it may arise from various causes, such as illness, old age, or accident; and there may be total disability to do some things and not others. Construing, however, the words 'total disability' used in the certificate to mean permanent total disability or total disability for life, the evidence showed beyond dispute that the plaintiff was totally disabled permanently and for life from doing manual labor." Dodds v. Canadian Mut. Aid Asso. 19 Ont. Rep. 70.

Under a rule of a friendly society providing that a member "falling sick, lame, or blind, or being otherwise disabled from work, shall be entitled to receive relief for and during sixteen weeks, if his illness continues so long," a member could not recover where his incapacity resulted from old age. Dunkley v. Harrison, 56 L. T. N. S. 860.

Grantham, J., said that if physical sickness was produced by old age it might be different.

IX. Death.

Under a policy providing for weekly indemnity in respect to bodily injuries effected through external, violent, or accidental means, and also stipulating that in case of death the company will pay the principal sum where the injured was killed instantly, no recovery could be had for indemnity for disability, as death was not the kind of disability to which the policy referred. Hall v. American Employers' Liability Ins. Co. 96 Ga. 413.

prove that he was not totally disabled within the meaning of the policy. The frequency and nature of these acts would ordinarily be for the consideration of the jury in determining whether he was totally disabled as above defined.

(June 16, 1897.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Fillmore County denying a motion for a new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. A. Fosness, McConnell & Schweizer, and Burdett Thayer for appellant.

Messrs. C. D. Allen and Gray & Thompson for respondent.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, an accident insurance company, issued its policy to plaintiff, whereby it insured him as a merchant by occupation, under classification preferred, "in the sum of $25 per week, against loss of time not exceeding twenty-six consecutive weeks, resulting from bodily injuries effected through means aforesaid

So, where the policy provided for the case of death or the case of total disability from labor by accident, and provided that for bodily injuries which shall "immediately and wholly disable and prevent him from the prosecution of any and every kind of business, . . . he shall be indemnified against loss of time caused thereby, in the sum of $10 per week, for such period of continuous total disability, . . . not exceeding, however, twenty-six consecutive weeks," and the insured was killed almost instantly, his administrator could not wait twenty-six weeks and bring an action on the theory that the insured was totally disabled within the meaning of the policy and was in some way entitled to indemnity for a period not to exceed twenty-six weeks at the rate of $10 per week. Dawson v. Accident Ins. Co. 88 Mo. App. 355.

See Perry v. Providence L. Ins. & Invest. Co. 103 Mass. 242, where it was claimed that death prevented a recovery for injury resulting in death.

Where the policy provided for payment for bodily injuries resulting in death, and also for indemnity for bodily injuries immediately and wholly disabling the assured, and he continued to work for two weeks after the injury, and there was no evidence of total disability, notice of the accident at the time it occurred was not a necessary condition of a death claim where the policy omitted to provide for such notice. McFarland v. United States Mut. Accl. Asso. 124 Mo. 204.

X. "Immediately" construed.

Under a policy providing for indemnity "from bodily injury effected during the term of such insurance . . . which should, independently of all other causes, immediately and wholly disable," it was held that "immediately" means that the disability must have ensued so closely upon the accident that he was wholly disabled from proceeding and transacting the business of his occupation regularly and in its due and proper course. Where total disability did not occur until about two months after the accident a recovery could not be had. Merrill v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 91 Wis. 329.

And no recovery was allowed where the insurance was against loss of time resulting from bodily injuries effected through external, violent, [external, violent, and accidental] wholly and continuously disabling said member from transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to the occupation above stated." Plaintiff alleged that on May 21, 1895, and during the life of the policy, he was accidentally thrown from his bicycle, and violently thrown forward on his face, thereby dislocating the thumb of his right hand, breaking loose some of his teeth, and so injuring or jarring his head and neck as to affect his spine and nerves to such an extent as to produce severe nervous prostration, by reason of which injuries he was wholly and continuously disabled from transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation as a merchant for seventeen weeks. The principal contest is as to the construction of that part of the policy which we have italicized, and particularly the term "wholly disabled." Accident insurance being of comparatively recent origin, the policies do not seem to have acquired any settled form, and the decisions construing them are comparatively few, and do not seem to have agreed on any very definite meaning to be given to the term "total disability." Such authorities as there are will be found quite fully cited in Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 501, and Niblack, Mut. Ben. Soc. §§ 401 et seq. See also 4 Harvard, Law Rev. p. 180.

and accidental means, which should "Independently of all other causes, immediately, wholly, and continuously disable" him "from transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation" where thirty days had elapsed from the time the injury was received before the insured was disabled so that he could not attend to his business. This decision turned upon the construction of the word "immediately." Williams v. Preferred Mut. Accl. Asso. 91 Ga. 698.

So, where five days elapsed from the time of the injury to the disability, under a policy providing against bodily injuries "which shall, independently of all other causes, immediately, wholly, and continuously disable him from transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation as above stated," it was held that the declaration should show, not only that the plaintiff was wholly and continuously disabled, but also "immediately." Preferred Masonic Mut. Accl. Asso. v. Jones, 60 Ill. App. 108.

And no recovery was allowed under a policy for only one day providing for "loss of time from the time of the accident and injury, which totally disabled and prevented from all kinds of business by reason of bodily injuries effected during the term of the policy through violent or accidental means," where an injury was received, but there was no total disability until a second injury, which happened sixteen days subsequently and by aggravating the first rendered him totally disabled. Rhodes v. Railway Passengers Ins. Co. 5 Laus. 51.

But a recovery was allowed under a policy providing for injuries which "shall immediately, continuously, and wholly disable and prevent him from performing any and every kind of duty pertaining to his business" where it was contended that the disability was only partial from the 3d until the 11th of January, and was not immediate, continuous, and total. A verdict for the plaintiff was affirmed where the instruction was that if "the total disability commenced on the 11th, and he was totally disabled for five weeks after that, then he would not be entitled to recover, for the reason that there was only a partial disability from the 3d until the 11th," and the evidence showed that the attempt by the assured to do occasionally portions

The cases which have placed a construction upon the term "total disability" might seem to be divided into two classes, viz., those which construe it liberally in favor of the insured, and those which construe it strictly against him. Among those of the first class may be cited, Hooper v. Accidental Death Ins. Co. 5 Hurlst. & N. 545, 556; Young v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 80 Me. 244; Turner v. Fidelity & C. Co. (Mich.) 4 Det. L. N. 85; and of the second class, Lyon v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 46 Iowa, 631, and Sareland v. Fidelity & C. Co. 67 Wis. 174, 58 Am. Rep. 863.

Any apparent conflict in the decisions may, however, be mostly reconciled in view of differences in the language of the policies, and of the different occupations under which the parties were insured. As is well said in Wolcott v. United Life & Acci. Ins. Assn. 55 Hun, 98: "Total disability must, from the necessity of the case, be a relative matter, and must depend largely upon the occupation and employment in which the party insured is engaged." One who labors with his hands might be so disabled by a severe injury to one hand as not to be able to labor at all at his usual occupation, whereas a merchant or a professional man might by the same injury be only disabled from transacting some kinds of business pertaining to his occupation. In policies of this character the aim of the insurer usually is to get as large premiums as possible by incurring the least possible liability; and, on the other hand, after an accident occurs, the usual aim of the insured is to recover the greatest amount of indemnity for the least possible injury. All that the courts can do is to construe the contract which the parties have made for themselves; but in doing so they should give it a reasonable construction, so as, if possible, to give effect to the purpose for which it was made. There are a few propositions applicable to the construction of the policy under consideration, which, under the evidence, are decisive of this case. The first is that total disability does not mean absolute physical inability on the part of the insured to transact any kind of business pertaining to his occupation. It is sufficient if his injuries were of such a character that common care and prudence required him to desist from the transaction of any such business so long as it was reasonably necessary to effectuate a cure. This was a duty which he owed to the insurer as well as to himself. Young v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 80 Me. 244. The second is that under the particular terms of this policy, to wit, "from transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to the occupation of his work as a barber were so painful that he had to desist. Hohn v. Interstate Casualty Co. (Mich.) 4 Det. L. N. 777.

And under a policy providing that "insurance shall not cover disappearances, nor injuries of which there is no visible, external mark upon the body of the insured" an injury which "was visible soon after the accident, and as a consequence of the injury" was covered by this clause. Pennington v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 85 Iowa, 468.

XI. "Per week" construed.

Where the policy provided for "total disability (confinement to the bed) caused by sickness, in the sum of $6.47 per week," it was held that the total disability insured against must be evidenced by actual confinement to bed. It was further held that under a provision "that seven full days confinement to bed shall constitute a week's sickness, . . . and no indemnity will be paid for a less period," no recovery could be had where it was conceded that the plaintiff, although suffering from malaria during the period sued for, was confined to the bed only one day. Gainor v. St. Lawrence Life Assn. 21 Misc. 27.

XII. Other matters.

The insurance company was not exonerated where the assured was disabled, although his employer gratuitously gave him compensation. Globe Acci. Ins. Co. v. Helwig, 13 Ind. App. 539.

Where the medical examiner of the benefit association refused to certify to the proofs of disability, but the fault was that of the defendant's own agent, the company could not set up as a defense an omission caused by the negligence of its agent. Young v. Grand Council, A. O. of A. 63 Minn. 506.

Where the policy said when "permanently disabled from following his or her usual or other occupation, by reason of disease or accident," a report may be made by a board of three physicians and on approval of the supreme medical examiner the member shall be entitled to one half the benefit, provided that where the disability is caused by accident and is patent to the eyes of all, the examination by the board of physicians may be dispensed with, a demurrer was sustained to the third 88 L. R. A.

paragraph of the answer which pleaded that the injury was received in an affray, and therefore was not accidental. It was further alleged in the answer that appellee was not thereby permanently disabled from following his usual occupation. The discussion of the case was upon the argument that the injury came from an affray, and not an accident; but as it happened in Kentucky, and there was no allegation what the statute was there, it was presumed that the common law applied, and that there was no fault on the part of the insured. Supreme Council, O. of C. F. v. Garrigus, 104 Ind. 133, 54 Am. Rep. 298.

In Howe v. Provident Fund Soc. 7 Ind. App. 586 where the application provided for indemnity in the same ratio that "my weekly income bears to the amount of the weekly indemnity insured for," and the indemnity insured for was $25 a week and the income was only $15 a week, a recovery was limited to the amount of the income.

In Eaton v. Atlas Acci. Ins. Co. 89 Me. 570, it was admitted that the insured was totally disabled, and the questions in that case were whether the company was liable for an injury received while returning from a funeral on Sunday on a bicycle by a road which was longer than the direct road, and whether the claim should be paid at a fifth-class rate because the injury occurred while insured was engaged for pleasure or recreation in amateur bicycling, and whether under a clause providing "for any injury received while doing any act or thing pertaining to any occupation or exposure claimed by the company as more hazardous" the insured should be entitled to receive only such amount as the company pay for such increased hazard.

XIII. Summary.

In the foregoing cases the clauses of the various policies which were construed were as follows:

"From transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation"—a recovery was denied in Spicer v. Commercial Mut. Acci. Co. 4 Pa. Dist. R. 271; Gracey v. People's Mut. Acci. Ins. Assn. 21 Pitts. L. J. N. S. 25; Ford v. United States Mut. Acci. Relief Co. 148 Mass. 153, 1 L. R. A. 700; Bean v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 94 Cal. 581; Knapp v.

above stated" (merchant), inability to perform some kinds of business pertaining to that occupation would not constitute total disability within the meaning of the policy. For example, the occupation of a retail country merchant (as plaintiff was) embraces various departments or kinds of business, such as keeping the books, making out accounts, and settling with customers; waiting on customers, and doing up their purchases in packages; also the handling and arranging of goods in the store. If an injury disabled the insured merchant from transacting one or more of these branches of the business, but left him able to transact others with due regard to his health, he would not be totally disabled within the meaning of this policy. But, fourth, the mere fact that he might be able, with due regard to his health, to occasionally perform some single and trivial act connected with some kind of business pertaining to his occupation as a merchant would not render his disability partial instead of total, provided he was unable substantially or to some material extent to transact any kind of business pertaining to such occupation. To illustrate this proposition by reference to the evidence in this case, it appears, as we shall assume, that on one or two occasions where the plaintiff went into his store when down town for other purposes he handed out some small article to a customer, and took the change for it. This would not necessarily prove that he was able to attend to the business of waiting on customers, and that he was not "wholly disabled" within the meaning of the policy. He might be able, on temporary visits to the store, to occasionally perform a trifling act of this nature, and yet be substantially and essentially unable to transact any kind of business pertaining to his occupation of merchant. The frequency and nature of these acts would be for the consideration of the jury in determining whether he was totally disabled, but would ordinarily be by no means conclusive on that question.

It only remains to apply these principles or rules to the evidence. The evidence was, as might be expected, conflicting; but that introduced on part of the plaintiff reasonably tended to show that the dislocation of his thumb was by no means the most serious of his injuries; that by his fall he so injured his head and neck as to produce severe nervous prostration, which so seriously affected his general health and strength as to render him unable to transact, to any material or substantial extent, any part of his business as merchant; that due regard to his health required him to wholly desist from attempting to do so, and that he was so advised by his physician; that when at home he went down town several times a week to receive medical treatment from his physician, and to get shaved; that when he did so he would frequently go into his store, and sit down for a brief time, but when there took no part or interest in the transaction of the business except the trivial acts on two or three occasions, already referred to; that upon the advice of his physician he went to Chicago to consult a medical specialist; that when he returned, his health not appearing to be improved, his family took him off on two occasions on a summer outing; and that it was not until the last of September or the first of October that he was sufficiently recovered to give any considerable attention to any part of his business. This evidence, in our judgment, justified the jury in finding that he was, for the full seventeen weeks, wholly disabled, within the meaning of the policy, from transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation as a merchant.

The requests to charge referred to in the assignments of error were properly refused, for the reason, if no other, that they all assumed that if the plaintiff on some particular date performed some single act connected with his business,—as, for example, handing a customer a package of garden seeds, or a dozen of nails,—it necessarily followed that he was not “wholly disabled” at that date within the meaning of the policy.

In his application for this insurance the plaintiff stated the value of his time to be $25 a week. It cropped out on the trial that he held like insurance for like amounts in three other companies. As no point was made on the trial but that he was entitled to recover, if at all, $25 a week during his total disability on the policy in suit, the question of the effect of the other insurance on the amount he is entitled to recover is not before us.

Order affirmed.

(.....Minn.....)

*1. The city of Tower, through its common council, granted to a street railway, its successors and assigns, the right and privilege of constructing, maintaining, and operating a line of street railways on any and all of its streets and public highways for a period of twenty years, the cars on said railway to be propelled by horses, mules, steam, electric, or other motor, for the purpose of transporting passengers and freight. ordinance reads as follows: “This franchise is granted upon condition that the company faithfully fulfil the requirements herein expressed, and should the company fail therein or wilfully abandon such road, and neglect or refuse to operate it, then this franchise to become null and void. Said company agree that they will forfeit said road to the city of Tower in one year after said company cease to operate said road.” The railway company became insolvent, and neglected and ceased to operate the road for more than one year. Held, that the word “road,” as used in said section of the ordinance, has the same import as if it read “railroad.”

2. Held, also, that the word “forfeiture,” as used in said ordinance, did not signify a nonenforceable penalty nor liquidated damages, but authorized the court, upon default of the conditions of the grant, to declare, in a proper action, an absolute forfeiture of the railway franchises, including rails, ties, roadbed, and things granted.

3. Railway franchises and grants are usually made for the benefit of the public, and where public interests are involved in the things and conditions granted, and it is impossible or impracticable to recover compensation when the conditions are broken by the grantee, and the facts clearly appear, the grantor has the right to resume, through the declarations of the courts, the corporate franchises and things forfeited, if the grant so provides.

APPEAL by petitioner from an order of the District Court for St. Louis County sustaining a demurrer to a petition filed to determine the right to certain steel rails which had been laid in petitioner's streets. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. G. Bonham for appellant.

Messrs. Draper, Davis, & Hollister, and H. J. Grannis, for respondent, American Loan & Trust Company:

If there is no obligation in the nature of the contract on the part of the railway company to operate the road for a definite period, its failure to do so cannot subject it to damages, liquidated or otherwise.

Scott v. Bush, 26 Mich. 418, 12 Am. Rep. 311; 1 Sutherland, Damages, p. 475.

While the railway company was acting within the limits of the grant, the city council could not rescind or revoke the rights conferred by the ordinance.

Nash v. Lowry, 37 Minn. 261; Citizens' Street R. Co. v. City R. Co. 56 Fed. Rep. 746; State, Kansas, v. Corrigan Consol. Street R. Co. 85 Mo. 282, 55 Am. Rep. 361; Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Memphis, 53 Fed. Rep. 715.

The rights and privileges conferred, although given to a particular company, constitute a mere license until accepted and acted upon by the company. At any time prior to such acceptance the ordinance may be revoked. When the company accepts and acts upon the ordinance, contract rights are created which protect it in the exercise of the privileges conferred by the grant, subject, however, to be defeated by noncompliance with the terms thereof.

The word "forfeit" or "forfeiture," when used in a contract, imports a penalty, unless it is clearly apparent from the other terms of the contract that such is not the intention of the parties.

Van Buren v. Diggs, 52 U. S. 11 How. 461, 13 L. ed. 771; Taylor v. Sandiford, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 15, 5 L. ed. 385; Colwell v. Lawrence, 38 N. Y. 71. See also Stearns v. Barrett, 1 Pick. 443, 11 Am. Dec. 228.

Even in doubtful cases the rule is that the sum named as a penalty shall be construed to be such, unless that construction is overcome by a clear intention to the contrary, derived from the other parts of the agreement.

Mr. John Jenswold, Jr., for respondent Crassweller.

Buck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is a municipal corporation in the county of St. Louis, and one of the defendants is a corporation created and existing under the laws of this state. The defendant Crassweller is its receiver, and the American Loan & Trust Company, defendant, claims some interest in the property hereinafter referred to. On the 18th day of March, 1890, the common council of the plaintiff corporation, having the power so to do, passed an ordinance granting to and authorizing the defendant Tower & Soudan Street-Railway Company, its successors and assigns, the right and privilege of constructing, maintaining, and operating a line or lines of street railway on any and all streets, avenues, alleys, and bridges or public highways of said city for a period of twenty years from and after the passage of the ordinance, the cars thereon to be propelled by horses, mules, steam, electric, or other motor, as the company might determine, for the purpose of transporting passengers and freight. The grant was made upon various conditions, among others that it should have in operation a continuous line of railway from and to certain specified points, and the 12th section of the ordinance reads as follows: "This franchise is granted upon condition that the company faithfully fulfil the requirements herein expressed, and should the company fail therein or wilfully abandon such road, and neglect or refuse to operate it, then this franchise to become null and void. Said company agree that they will forfeit said road to the city of Tower in one year after said company cease to operate said road." There were certain other conditions in the ordinance beneficial to each party, not necessary to enumerate. But the railway company, prior to the day of the passage of the ordinance applied to said city to issue its bonds to aid in the construction of said railway, and on the day when said ordinance was so granted the legal voters of said city voted to issue bonds of the denomination of $6,000 to said railway company in aid of the construction of said railway, and which bonds were duly delivered to and accepted by said company as part consideration for said railway company's agreement to construct, maintain, and operate said street railway for a period of twenty years from and after the date of said grant. Said railway company constructed its line of railway according to its agreement and the conditions of said ordinance, and operated the same until about the 4th day of March, 1894, when said company, without any fault on the part of this plaintiff and against the protests of its officers, wholly ceased, neglected, and refused to operate said road; and thereupon, on the 26th day of November, 1895, plaintiff's city council passed an ordinance declaring the franchise of said Tower & Soudan Street-Railway Company to be null and void on account of its failure to operate said railway after March 4, 1894, and for its wilful abandonment of the same. Part of the road of said railway company consists of 11,500 yards of steel T rails, of the value of $2,300. The railway company becoming insolvent, the defendant Crassweller was appointed its receiver, and plaintiff, having received due authority from the court, brought this suit against him and the other defendants named, for the purpose of having the title to said steel rails determined, and prayed judgment that all the rights of the defendant Tower & Soudan Street-Railway Company under the contract hereinbefore set forth be forfeited, and that plaintiff be adjudged entitled to the absolute ownership and possession of said steel rails free and clear of all claims, demands, and liens of any and all the defendants in this action. The receiver and the trust company interposed demurrers to the complaint upon the grounds that upon the face of said complaint it did not state facts sufficient to state a cause of action. The court sustained the demurrers, and the plaintiff appeals.

The two material questions raised and discussed were: (1) Does the word "road," as used in § 12 of the ordinance, refer to the franchise, or does it include the steel rails forming a part of the roadbed? and (2) does the word "forfeit" in said section provide for a penalty of such a nature that it is nonenforceable as such against the railway company?

Upon the first question very little need be said. The word "road," as used in § 12, includes the roadbed, with the ties, rails, and all that constitutes a completed superstructure on which cars transported passengers or property, or both. By reference to our statutes upon the subject of railroads, it will be found that in numerous instances the word "road" is used in the same sense and with the same meaning as "railroad." Of course, whether the word "road" is used as synonymous with, or the equivalent of, "railroad," depends upon its context. In the section above quoted it has the same import as if it read "railroad."

Upon the second question counsel have discussed the question as to whether the sentence, "Said company agree that they will forfeit said road to the city of Tower in one year after said company cease to operate said road," was to be construed as nonenforceable penalty or as liquidated damages which could be recovered. We do not agree with either counsel, but think that the ordinance shows a grant upon conditions which, if broken by the grantee, create a forfeiture. The demurrer admits that the conditions were broken, and the law adjudges the forfeiture. The nonuser went to the very essence of the contract between the city and the railway company. The privileges granted and consideration furnished by the city to the company had in view the construction and continued operation of the railway for a period of twenty years, and upon these conditions the consideration and special privileges were granted to the company. The complete suspension of the operation of the railway for more than one year brought about this forfeiture of their corporate rights. Upon these conceded facts there was no discretion in the trial court as to the course it should have pursued, and it should have overruled the demurrers instead of sustaining them. This was not a state franchise, but a grant of authority from the city of Tower resting in contract, and redress for violations of such contract, as in other violations where public interests are involved, should be had by the usual remedies. The rule as to forfeiture, in cases of this kind, should be regarded in its nature analogous to forfeitures frequently determined where the state is concerned as a party, and brings suit against a corporation for violation of its chartered privileges. The case of State, Hahn, v. Minnesota C. R. Co. 36 Minn. 246, is an illustration of this rule. There the state granted to the railway company all the rights, franchises, and property of the Minneapolis & Cedar Valley Railroad Company, which was incorporated by the act of the territorial legislature in 1856, by which act it was authorized to construct and operate a certain railway, and by a subsequent act it was endowed with the lands granted by an act of Congress to aid in the construction of the line of railroad which by its charter it was authorized to build. It failed to comply with the conditions upon which its franchises were granted. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 76, § 11 (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5899), then provided that, whenever any railroad corporation shall for one year suspend the lawful business of such corporation, such company or corporation shall be deemed to have forfeited the rights, privileges, and franchises granted by any act of incorporation or acquired under the laws of this state, and shall be adjudged to be dissolved; and the court held that, under this statute, there was no room for any discretion on the part of the court, when the facts clearly appeared, to refuse judgment of forfeiture, and that the terms of the statute admitted of no excuse or explanation, but were mandatory, 88 L. R. A.

and that the government might resume its corporate franchises for a misuser or nonuser thereof. In the case of Farnsworth v. Minnesota & P. R. Co. 92 U. S. 49, 23 L. ed. 530, the court held that where a grant of land and connected franchise is made to a corporation for the construction of a railroad by a statute which provides for their forfeiture upon failure to perform the work within a prescribed time, the forfeiture may be declared by legislative act, without judicial proceedings to ascertain and determine the failure of the grantee. In the opinion it is also stated that where there is a mere contract between the parties a court will relieve when compensation can be given, but that a forfeiture will be upheld on considerations of public policy, as well as from the impossibility of obtaining compensation from the railroad company for its default, on the same principle upon which courts of equity refuse relief against forfeitures incurred under the by-laws of corporations for nonpayment of stock subscriptions. In regard to the rule that forfeitures are regarded with disfavor the court further said: "But it is said that provisions for forfeiture are regarded with disfavor and construed with strictness, and that courts of equity will lean against their enforcement. This, as a general rule, is true when applied to cases of contract, and the forfeiture relates to a matter admitting of compensation or restoration; but there can be no leaning of the court against a forfeiture which is intended to secure the construction of a work, in which the public is interested, where compensation cannot be made for the default of the party, nor where the forfeiture is imposed by positive law." The case of Sparks v. Liverpool Waterworks Co. 13 Ves. Jr. 428, illustrates this doctrine. The company there was incorporated to supply the town and port of Liverpool with water; and the property in and the profits of the undertaking were vested in the company in such shares and subject to such conditions as should be agreed upon. By articles of agreement, a committee of the company was authorized to call upon the shareholders for the several sums payable by them on their respective shares; and it was, among other things, provided that, in case any shareholder made default in the payment of his calls for twenty-one days after the time appointed, and for ten days after subsequent notice addressed to his then or last usual place of abode, his share or shares should be absolutely forfeited for the benefit of the other members of the corporation. The plaintiff was the owner of certain shares of stock in the company upon which payment had been made upon thirty-four calls. The payment of the thirty-fifth call was omitted through his failure to receive personal notice of the call, it having been sent to his town residence while he was absent in the country, and not having been forwarded to him. For the nonpayment upon the call his shares were declared forfeited. Immediately upon receiving information of the call, on his return to the city, he gave directions for its payment, and on the following day the amount was sent to the bankers of the company. The committee of the company, however, informed him that they could give him no relief, as they had acted according to the laws of the company, from which no deviation could be made. The plaintiff thereupon filed a bill for relief against the forfeiture, on the grounds of accident, and that compensation might be made, and no injury be sustained by the company, his counsel also insisting upon the invalidity of the by-law as unreasonable, exorbitant, and uncertain; but the court dismissed the bill, for the reason that the enterprise was a public undertaking, requiring for its successful prosecution punctuality of payment from the shareholders. Consideration of public policy forbade the granting of relief; for, as the court observed, "If this species of equity is open to the parties engaged in these undertakings, they could not be carried on." The recovery of damages was not sought in the cases cited, and it is apparent that it would have been impracticable, if not impossible, to have adopted any rule of damages, and the same doctrine would apply to this case. There was no dispute in those cases but what the conditions were violated, and hence, applying the statutory law except in the case last cited, the things granted were forfeited by its express provisions. It was the legislative rule, not that damages should be recovered in the way of a money judgment, but that, if there was a noncompliance with the terms of the grant, there should be a forfeiture of the thing granted. That the legislature has the power to attach limitations and restrictions upon its grants, to the extent of a forfeiture of the thing granted, is undoubted. Railroad franchises and grants are made for the benefit of the public, and where the conditions upon which they are allowed to be created are voluntarily violated by the company, it places itself in a position where its grant may be annulled by a forfeiture as provided in the law.

In the case at bar, the ordinance having been accepted by the railway company, it became its charter, and between the parties a contract, and from the very nature of the public business to be carried on, if it suspended operations for one year, its road was to be forfeited. The remedy was not by way of damages, for that might still leave the company in existence, but insolvent, as in this case, and with perhaps a doubtful claim to the exclusive privileges granted by the ordinance, and thus greatly embarrass the city dealing with other companies who might seek the privilege of constructing in said city another railway over the same route. Here the conditions of the grant having been violated, the forfeiture arises by the express terms of the contract, and at the end of the time limited the road was to be forfeited to the city. Even if the city did not have the absolute right to declare the rights and franchises of the company forfeited and terminated, and take immediate possession of the "road" and all things embraced within the meaning of that term, yet there can be no doubt of its power to maintain an action of this kind, and if, by answering, the defendants can show on the trial any legal or equitable defense, that is a matter for further adjudication.

The counsel for the respondents strenuously contend in their brief that the parties did not intend that the railroad company should make compensation to the city in case of default by nonuser, and upon this point they use the following language: "In the case at bar the ordinance does not indicate, in any of its terms, that the forfeiture referred to in § 12 is to be treated as compensation to the city for any injury suffered, or for the breach of any contract or obligation on the part of the railway company. In no part of the ordinance is there any reference to any compensation to be paid the city for anything which the company may do thereunder." We agree with counsel upon this point, but this concession is one favorable to the appellant, not the respondents. Money compensation was not intended by the parties, and, as we have already stated, could not well be obtained for default of the defendant railway company. The absence of any agreement for compensation by reason of such default adds strength to the doctrine that the forfeiture clause should be declared absolute. The cases cited are in a great measure based upon the rule that where no compensation can be made for default of the party in the construction of public works or nonuser of a franchise, and where the public are interested, such as the operation of a railway, an absolute forfeiture will be declared.

Order reversed.

Canty, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in all that is said in the foregoing opinion. The question before us is simply this: When a condition attached to a grant is broken, and a forfeiture declared, will an action lie to enforce the forfeiture? As a general rule there can be no doubt that it will lie. If the grantor has done anything to waive the forfeiture, or anything which makes it inequitable to enforce such forfeiture, that is a matter of defense which must be set up by answer. This is all there is now before the court. But the majority opinion seems to go on and decide, or at least intimate, that such a forfeiture cannot be waived, and compare the case to one where the legislature has granted the power or franchise on condition, and has specially provided for forfeiture in case of a breach of the condition. The legislature has a right to change a rule of law, and to provide for a nonwaivable forfeiture in a certain case or class of cases. But ordinarily a city council has no such power to change such a rule of law. In the absence of a law which should be interpreted as making the forfeiture nonwaivable, it may well be doubted whether a condition of forfeiture attached to a public grant may not be waived as well as a condition attached to a private grant. But, as before stated, the question of waiver is not now before the court, and should not be passed on at this time. The complaint contains nothing which can be construed into a waiver, and therefore states a cause of action.

GARRATT FORD COMPANY

(..... R. L.)

A contract of a foreign corporation, if not contrary to public policy, is not invalid because the corporation has not complied with Gen. Laws, chap. 253, §§ 36-41, requiring it to appoint a resident of the state as its attorney, but not declaring that such contract shall be void, while another statute expressly provides that in case of a foreign insurance company the contract shall be valid.

Stiness, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, a corporation located in Boston, Massachusetts, sold to the defendant a tank, through a salesman who took the order in Providence, and it now seeks to recover the price in this suit. The defendant asked the judge presiding at the trial to charge that the plaintiff, being a foreign corporation, which had not complied with the law of this state in appointing a resident of this state as its attorney (Gen. Laws, chap. 253, §§ 36-41), was not entitled to maintain this action. To the refusal of the judge so to charge, the defendant asks for a new trial, on the ground of erroneous ruling.

The question whether a corporation of one state can do business in another state without complying with the laws of such state is one which has frequently arisen, and upon which decisions are conflicting, although many decisions turn upon the language of a statute. Thus, it is held that a statute prohibiting a foreign corporation from doing business in a state without complying with its terms makes such business illegal and void, and that no such corporation can maintain an action to enforce its illegal contracts; and where the statute does not provide for the consequences of noncompliance, the argument is that the acts of the corporation must be void, or else the statute would be nugatory. In Massachusetts a penalty is imposed upon the agent doing business; but the statute (Stat. 1884, chap. 330, § 3) says that a failure to comply with the conditions shall not affect the validity of an act of the corporation. Rogers v. Simmons, 155 Mass. 259. Some statutes declare the acts to be void. In such cases there can be no question of validity. Some cases hold that where the statute imposes a penalty upon the agent, but is silent as to the validity of the act, it is to be presumed that the legislature intended the penalty as a sufficient safeguard for compliance, and that to declare the acts of the corporation void would go further than the statute, and impose an additional penalty, by construction, which should not be done. A notable case of this kind is Fritts v. Palmer, 132 U. S. 282, 33 L. ed. 817, in which the court says: "The fair implication is that, in the judgment of the legislature of Colorado, this penalty was ample to effect the object of the statutes prescribing the terms upon which foreign corporations might do business in that state. It is not for the judiciary, at the instance or for the benefit of private parties, claiming under deeds executed by the person who had previously conveyed to the corporation, according to the forms prescribed for passing title to real estate, to inflict the additional and harsh penalty of forfeiting, for the benefit of such parties, the estate thus conveyed to the corporation and by it conveyed to others. . . . If the legislature had intended to declare that no title should pass under a conveyance to a foreign corporation purchasing real estate before it acquires the right to engage in business in the state, and that such a conveyance should be an absolute nullity as between the grantor and grantee, leaving the grantor to deal with the property as if he had never sold it, that intention would have been clearly manifested." To the same effect are Dearborn Foundry Co. v. Augustine, 5 Wash. 67; Edison General Electric Co. v. Canadian P. Nar. Co. 24 L. R. A. 815 [8 Wash. 370], with a note which holds the contrary view. See also an instructive article by Mr. Gunn in Am. L. Reg. Jan. 1897, p. 19.

Without multiplying authorities, we think that the reasoning which we have quoted is conclusive, although we concede that the greater number of authorities are probably the other way. We think, moreover, that we find support for this view in similar legislation in this state. In R. I. Gen. Laws, chap. 182, § 17, it is declared, in the case of a foreign insurance company, that the contract shall be valid, and the same declaration is made as to resident insurance companies which fail to comply with the law. The argument is pressed that, because the declaration of validity is made in these cases, its omission in the statute before us leads to the inference of the invalidity of other contracts. We do not think that the legislature intended to make one class of contracts valid, and other contracts, under similar conditions, invalid. If the legislature intends to make such contracts as the one in suit invalid, it is easy to say so; but, in the absence of such a provision, it is a wide stretch of judicial construction for the court to hold that such a result was intended. The purpose of the statute is not to invalidate contracts, but to require foreign corporations to appoint an attorney in the state upon whom service of process may be made. This purpose seems to be adequately served by imposing a penalty upon the agent who ventures to do business for the company without complying with the law. While we do not question the right of the state to impose such conditions and penalties upon foreign companies doing business here as it may deem proper, subject to the provisions of the Federal Constitution as to the regulation of commerce among the states, yet, in view of the vast amount of business now done by such corporations, we think it is a conservative position to hold that the legislature did not intend to exempt our citizens from paying just debts, upon grounds of noncompliance with our statutes, which may have been fully known to the debtors, when the general assembly has not clearly expressed that intention, and the inference of it is not necessary to the object of the statute. We are referred to Electric News & M. Transfer Co. v. Perry, 75 Fed. Rep. 898, in which it is claimed that our statute was construed to preclude a foreign corporation, which had not complied with it, from maintaining a suit. That case, however, was a bill in equity for an injunction to restrain police officers of Pawtucket, who had seized the property of the complainant for a violation of our statute against pool selling, from interfering with their business. Judge Colt, in the opinion, very properly said that a foreign corporation which has not complied with statutory provisions "cannot invoke the aid of this court to prohibit the defendants from interfering with a business which it has no legal right to carry on." That is a very different thing from holding that a contract is void which, in its nature, is not contrary to public policy. Our decision is that the court did not err in refusing the instruction asked for, and that the petition for a new trial must be dismissed.

Case remitted to the common pleas division, with direction to enter judgment on the verdict.

(.....R. I.....)

1. A contract whereby a benefit is to accrue upon the death or physical disability of a person, which benefit is or may be conditioned upon the collection of an assessment upon persons holding similar contracts, is a contract of insurance within the meaning of Gen. Laws, chap. 184, § 2, respecting business by foreign insurance companies.
2. Jurisdiction of a foreign insurance company doing business in the state without complying with the statute, which requires it before doing business to appoint the insurance commissioner as attorney on whom process may be served, cannot be acquired by service on such commissioner, where the facts appear from the plaintiff's own showing, and the defendant has not appeared to plead to the jurisdiction, and is not shown to have received notice, either actual or constructive.

recover the amount alleged to be due on a benefit insurance policy. Petition denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Willard B. Tanner, for petitioner:

The defendant was doing an insurance business in this state.

Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 149; State, Graham, v. Nichols, 78 Iowa, 747; Knight's Templar & M. Life Indemnity Co. v. Berry, 4 U. S. App. 358, 50 Fed. Rep. 511; National Union v. Marlow, 40 U. S. App. 95, 74 Fed. Rep. 775; Niblack, Ben. Soc. 2d ed. § 8.

The service of the writ was sufficient because the defendant is estopped to deny that they have not appointed the commissioner their attorney to accept service, after having done business in the state and received the benefits.

Sparks v. National Masonic Acci. Asso. 78 Fed. Rep. 277; Ehrman v. Teutonic Ins. Co. 1 McCrary, 123; Moch v. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. 10 Fed. Rep. 696; Knapp, S. & Co. v. National Mut. F. Ins. Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 607; Hagerman v. Empire State Co. 97 Pa. 584; Foster v. Charles Betcher Lumber Co. 23 L. R. A. 490, note, 5 S. D. 57; 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 128, cases cited.

The elements of an estoppel are present because there is involved, first, the representation in insuring the plaintiff that they were authorized to do business in this state, a condition of which was appointing the commissioner attorney to accept service; second, knowledge of the facts on the part of the company that they had not appointed the commissioner their attorney; third, the intention that the plaintiff should act on the implied representation that the company was authorized to do business in the state; fourth, the representation was acted on by the plaintiff in accepting insurance, since it may be fairly said that the plaintiff would not have paid his money for insurance in an order which was not authorized to do business in the state.

Tillinghast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is before us on the plaintiff's petition for a new trial. It was brought in the common pleas division, was not answered by the defendant, and was dismissed by the court for lack of service. The record shows that the defendant is a corporation of the so called "fraternal class," incorporated in the state of New York; that it is doing business in this state; that the plaintiff was a member of a subordinate lodge, organized under said corporation, in the city of Providence; and that this action is brought upon a liability incurred by said defendant. The writ in the case was served by leaving an attested copy thereof with the insurance commissioner of this state. The record shows, however, that he had not been appointed by the defendant as its attorney to accept service, under R. I. Gen. Laws, chap. 182, § 8, which is as follows: "No insurance company not incorporated under the authority of this state, shall directly or indirectly issue policies, take risks, or transact business in this state, until it shall have first appointed in writing the insurance commissioner of this state to be the true and lawful attorney of such company in and for this state, upon whom all lawful process in any action or proceeding against the company may be served with the same effect as if the company existed in this state. Said power of attorney shall stipulate and agree on the part of the company that any lawful process against the company which is served on said attorney shall be of the same legal force and validity as if served on the company, and that the authority shall continue in force so long as any liability remains outstanding against the company in this state. A certificate of such appointment, duly certified and authenticated, shall be filed in the office of the insurance commissioner, and copies certified by him shall be received in evidence in all the courts in this state. Service upon such attorney shall be deemed sufficient service upon the principal."

The first question which we are called upon to decide is whether the contract on which the action is based is a contract of insurance, within the meaning of our statute. We think it is clear, upon the evidence submitted, that it is such a contract, and that the defendant is doing an insurance business in this state. The making of a contract like the one in suit, whereby a benefit is to accrue to the plaintiff upon his death or physical disability, which benefit is or may be conditioned upon the collection of an assessment upon persons holding similar contracts, is declared to be a contract of insurance by R. I. Gen. Laws, chap. 184, § 2. See also Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 149; State, Graham, v. Nichols, 78 Iowa, 747; Niblack, Ben. Soc. & Acci. Ins. § 8, and cases cited.

The main question in the case, however, and the one which, in view of the authorities cited by plaintiff's counsel, has caused us to hesitate in deciding, is whether there has been any valid service of the writ. The plaintiff's counsel contends that the service was sufficient, because the defendant is estopped to deny that it has appointed the insurance commissioner its attorney to accept service, after having done business in the state, and received the benefits thereof. While it is probably true, and indeed such seems to be the well-settled law, that the defendant would be estopped to deny that it has complied with the statute as to the appointment of an attorney to accept service, yet a difficulty arises in the application of the principle to this case. The defendant makes no appearance; so that no question of estoppel, as it seems to us, can properly be raised or considered. See Anthony v. Brayton, 7 R. I. 53, 54. The writ was not served upon an agent of the defendant corporation, as was the case in Moch v. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. 10 Fed. Rep. 696, and other cases cited by plaintiff; nor was it served upon any person authorized by the defendant to accept service thereof. Moreover, the fact appears of record, and from the plaintiff's own showing, that the defendant failed to comply with the statute first above quoted, and hence that there was no service of the writ whatsoever, unless we can hold that service upon the insurance commissioner, with the actual knowledge the penalty as a sufficient safeguard for compliance, and that to declare the acts of the corporation void would go further than the statute, and impose an additional penalty, by construction, which should not be done. A notable case of this kind is Fritts v. Palmer, 132 U. S. 282, 33 L. ed. 817, in which the court says: "The fair implication is that, in the judgment of the legislature of Colorado, this penalty was ample to effect the object of the statutes prescribing the terms upon which foreign corporations might do business in that state. The service of the writ was sufficient because the defendant is estopped to deny that they have not appointed the commissioner their attorney to accept service, after having done business in the state and received the benefits.

A certificate of such appointment, duly certified and authenticated, shall be filed in the office of the insurance commissioner, and copies certified by him shall be received in evidence in all the courts in this state. Service upon such attorney shall be deemed sufficient service upon the principal."

The first question which we are called upon to decide is whether the contract on which the action is based is a contract of insurance, within the meaning of our statute. We think it is clear, upon the evidence submitted, that it is such a contract, and that the defendant is doing an insurance business in this state. The making of a contract like the one in suit, whereby a benefit is to accrue to the plaintiff upon his death or physical disability, which benefit is or may be conditioned upon the collection of an assessment upon persons holding similar contracts, is declared to be a contract of insurance by R. The main question in the case, however, and the one which, in view of the authorities cited by plaintiff's counsel, has caused us to hesitate in deciding, is whether there has been any valid service of the writ. The plaintiff's counsel contends that the service was sufficient, because the defendant is estopped to deny that it has appointed the insurance commissioner its attorney to accept service, after having done business in the state, and received the benefits thereof. While it is probably true, and indeed such seems to be the well-settled law, that the defendant would be estopped to deny that it has complied with the statute as to the appointment of an attorney to accept service, yet a difficulty arises in the application of the principle to this case. The defendant makes no appearance; so that no question of estoppel, as it seems to us, can properly be raised or considered. See Anthony v. Brayton, 7 R. I. 53, 54. The writ was not served upon an agent of the defendant corporation, as was the case in Moch v. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. 10 Fed. Rep. 696, and other cases cited by plaintiff; nor was it served upon any person authorized by the defendant to accept service thereof. Moreover, the fact appears of record, and from the plaintiff's own showing, that the defendant failed to comply with the statute first above quoted, and hence that there was no service of the writ whatsoever, unless we can hold that service upon the insurance commissioner, with the actual knowledge on our part that he was never authorized to accept the same, gives jurisdiction. It seems to us that to so hold would violate the very foundation principle of all judicial proceedings which principle requires that, in order to give the court jurisdiction over a defendant where it is a proceeding in personam, he must have notice, either actual or constructive, of the proceeding instituted against him. In this case the defendant had neither. And that fact appears, not by reason of the defendant's setting up the same, as it does in the cases relied on by plaintiff, but from the record itself. And herein lies the difference between this case and those which have been cited by plaintiff's counsel. In those cases there was an appearance for the defendant, either general or special, at some stage of the proceeding, and the question of jurisdiction was litigated and decided adversely to the defendants respectively. Such was the case in Hagerman v. Empire State Co. 97 Pa. 534, where the writ was served on an agent of the defendant found in the state. The defendant had not complied with the statute in the appointment of an agent on whom process might be served. The court held that "when a foreign corporation, transacting business in this state, has failed to establish an office, and report the name of its agent to the secretary of the commonwealth, but has some person residing therein who acts as its agent, it must be presumed that the corporation has substituted such agent as one on whom service is authorized to be made." Moreover, under a statute of that state, service of process against a foreign corporation may be made upon any officer, agent, or engineer of the corporation, either personally or by copy. In Ehrman v. Teutonia Ins. Co. 1 McCrary, 128, 1 Fed. Rep. 471, the defendant appeared and filed a plea to the jurisdiction, which plea was held to be defective. The court, however, considered the main point intended to be raised by the pleader, and held that the defendant could not be heard to say that service of the summons on the state auditor was not a good personal service on the company. It also held that, from the fact of the defendant's doing business in the state, the presumption of its assent to service in the mode prescribed by the statute arose, and that no averment or evidence to the contrary was admissible to defeat the jurisdiction, and that the defendant would not be permitted to relieve itself from a liability which the written stipulation required by the statute would have imposed, by pleading its own fraud on the law of the state and her citizens, under the maxim that no man shall take advantage of his own wrong. Poster v. Charles Betcher Lumber Co. 5 S. D. 57, 23 L. R. A. 490, was a defaulted case in the court below, where, after judgment, the defendant appeared, and moved to set aside the judgment, on the ground that the writ was not served on any authorized agent of the defendant, which motion was denied, and an appeal was taken. The record showed that the writ was served on two of the managing agents of the defendant. The defendant had failed to comply with the statute in the appointment of an agent authorized to accept service of process. The court held that, in the first place, the service on the managing agent of defendant was good, under the statute of that state, which expressly declares that such service shall be good, and, in the second place, that the failure to comply with the laws of the state, in the appointment of an agent on whom process might be served, could not be taken advantage of by it. Sparks v. National Masonic Acci. Assn. 73 Fed. Rep. 277, was a defaulted case in the court below, the record of which court shows "that personal service was had upon defendant, in accordance with the laws of this state, as provided for by § 5912 of the [Revised] Statutes [of Missouri] of 1899, by serving the writ, with a copy of the petition, upon the superintendent of the insurance department of this state, the person authorized by law to receive such service, more than thirty days before the first day of this term." In an action on the judgment the defense set up was that the court rendering the same was without jurisdiction, and hence that the judgment was void. The defendant asserted that it never appeared in said action wherein the judgment was rendered. It denied that it was ever served with process, and also asserted that it never appointed the superintendent of the insurance department of the state of Missouri, or any other person on whom service might be made. The court held that, by the fact of doing business in the state, the defendant asserted a compliance with the laws thereof; and after enjoying the benefits of the business, and receiving the money of the assured, it could not be heard to say that it never submitted to the jurisdiction of the state. Moch v. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. 10 Fed. Rep. 696, in which the general question of obtaining jurisdiction over a foreign corporation is very fully and ably discussed, was a case where the plaintiff served his writ upon an agent of the defendant in the state of Louisiana, and obtained judgment by default. Shortly afterwards the defendant appeared specially by its attorney, and moved that the suit be dismissed, on the ground that the defendant had not been legally cited, and hence that the court was without jurisdiction to render judgment in the case. This motion was denied, and no appeal was taken therefrom. Upon the judgment thus obtained, suit was subsequently brought in the United States circuit court of Virginia, the defendant having its principal office in Richmond, in said state. The defendant pleaded, among other things, that the person upon whom the writ was originally served in Louisiana was not its agent for the purpose of accepting service, and that the court below had no jurisdiction by reason thereof. It was held that where a court of general jurisdiction in another sovereignty has passed upon the question of its own jurisdiction, when expressly raised by plea, the parties to such a suit are bound in the home court, under the principle of res judicata. It was also held that an insurance company, chartered and resident in one state, which does business in another state, through an agent there, may be sued in that state, if its statute law does not forbid, by service of process on that agent, whether he has express power of attorney to receive or accept such service or not; and that this is especially so where the law of such state requires every foreign insurance company doing business therein to appoint an agent in the state empowered to receive service of process. See also Osborne v. Shawmut Ins. Co. 51 Vt. 278. A collection of the cases on the general question before us may be found in Foster v. Charles Betcher Lumber Co. 28 L. R. A. 490, et seq., 5 S. D. 57.

It will thus be seen that in those cases where the defendant appeared and pleaded to the jurisdiction, by setting up the fact that it had not appointed someone authorized by it to accept service of process, as required by statute, the courts uniformly held that this could not be allowed, the defendant being estopped from setting up its own misconduct. It will also be seen that in those cases where judgment was rendered by default the return on the writ showed a valid service prima facie, and nothing was brought upon the record by the plaintiff to contradict the same, so that the court was fully warranted in exercising its jurisdiction; that is to say, the court, having no knowledge to the contrary, was bound to presume that the defendant had discharged its statutory duty by appointing the person therein designated as its agent to accept service, and hence that service upon such person was good. Here, however, no such presumption can be said to arise, in the face of the record before us, which shows that, as a matter of fact, the defendant had not complied with the statute first above quoted; and hence the court cannot stultify itself by holding that any such presumption exists. Indeed, it would be absurd to say that a presumption arises as to the existence of a certain jurisdictional fact when the court is judicially informed that it does not exist. So that, even recognizing the full force and authority of the decisions cited in support of the plaintiff's position, yet we do not think that, in the circumstances aforesaid, they are decisive of the question before us.

The case of Knapp, S. & Co. Co. v. National Mut. F. Ins. Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 607, is clearly in point. That was a case in the United States circuit court of Missouri, where the statutory requirement as to the appointment of the insurance commissioner by a foreign corporation doing business in the state is similar to the one here. Service of the writ was made upon said insurance commissioner, who declined to receive the summons and copy of the petition which was handed to him, but he gave no reason therefor. No appearance was entered by the defendant, and the plaintiff asked for a default. The court (Brewer, J.) held that the service was good if the insurance commissioner had power to receive the same, and that, as it was alleged in the petition that the company was doing business in the state, having agents and officers there, the court would presume that it had complied with the law, and therefore, prima facie, at least, the service was good, whereupon a judgment by default was entered. Had it come to the knowledge of the court, however, from the plaintiff's own showing, as it does in the case before us, that, as a matter of fact, said commissioner was not authorized to receive service of the writ, it is evident that the court would have held that there was no service, and hence no jurisdiction.

The petition for new trial must therefore be denied.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

JONATHAN TURNER'S SONS, Appts.,

LEE GIN & MACHINE COMPANY.

(.....Tenn.....)

Money tendered and paid into court as the full amount due the plaintiff constitutes a full discharge when plaintiff takes it from the court, although he protests that more is due and declines to accept it as full payment, if the terms on which it was tendered are not waived by the defendant or modified by rule of court.

(April Term, 1897.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Shelby County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an account. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—As to the effect of an unaccepted tender on the lien of a mortgage or pledge, see note to Parker v. Reasley (N. C.) 23 L. R. A. 231. 38 L. R. A.

Messrs. Thomas M. Scruggs and W. B. Henderson for appellants.

Mr. H. C. Warriner, for appellee:

The plea of tender and acceptance is not a plea in abatement, but is a plea in bar, and precludes any further recovery upon the matters sued on.

There is no law or statute authorizing magistrates to receive and hold money made the subject of tender by litigations before them. They are not by law authorized to receive such money officially. The proper practice is for defendant to make tender before trial, then repeat the tender before the magistrate, and then bring the money into the appellate court at the time the papers are filed therein.

Keys v. Roder, 1 Head, 20.

In Tennessee there is no such thing as a payment of money into court under a rule of court as known to the old practice. The defendant is allowed to pay money into court by a statute and without any of the restrictions and conditions imposed by the old rule.

Shannon's Code, § 4667.

This legislation was supplemental and amendatory to the "plea of tender;" but its adoption has operated to make the payment of money into court under the old general rule obsolete. It has been the law since about 1852, and is apparently taken from the Alabama Code 1852, § 2245.

The authorities cited by plaintiff, to wit: Comyns' Dig. title Pleader, C 10; Tidd, Pr. 619, 620, 627, 630; Boyden v. Moore, 5 Mass. 365; Williams v. Ingersoll, 12 Pick. 345; Murray v. Bethune, 1 Wend. 191; Sleight v. Rhineland, 1 Johns. 192; Spalding v. Vandercook, 2 Wend. 431; Johnston v. Columbian Ins. Co. 7 Johns. 315; Goslin v. Hodson, 24 Vt. 140; Keith v. Smith, 1 Swan, 95.—do not apply to this case or to the facts; they are based upon the principles applicable strictly to a payment into court under the old general rule.

The defendant made tender, unexcepted to in form, of a sum less than that claimed by plaintiffs, as and for the full amount due them, and it was delivered to the magistrate at the request of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs thereupon voluntarily applied for and received the amount so tendered under these circumstances, and they thereby accepted the tender as made, and they cannot now claim that they took it as payment pro tanto on their demand, and they cannot prosecute their suit for any alleged balance.

Haeussler v. Duross, 14 Mo. App. 103; Gardner v. Black, 98 Ala. 638; Hanson v. Todd, 95 Ala. 828; Monroe v. Chaldeck, 78 Ill. 429; Adams v. Helm, 55 Mo. 468.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought before a justice of the peace of Shelby county upon an open account for $200 and interest. The warrant was taken out August 3, 1896. On the 12th of August, 1896, defendant appeared, and paid to the justice of the peace $57, and the following minute entry was made by the justice: "Be it remembered that on this 12th day of August, 1896, came James Lee, Jr., and tendered plaintiff $57, claiming that this is the whole sum due. Thereupon plaintiff declined to accept the same, and the said James Lee, Jr., paid said $57 into court upon a verbal plea of tender." On the next day, August 13, 1896, defendant appeared by attorney, and filed the following plea: "The defendant James Lee, Jr., has tendered to the plaintiff the sum of $57, and the same, together with the costs, has been accepted by plaintiff's attorney, and the defendant therefore prays that the suit herein be dismissed, and he go hence without future cost." On the 17th day of August, 1896, the justice of the peace rendered judgment for the plaintiffs against the defendant for $224 and costs. The judgment further proceeded to recite that: "It appearing to the court that James Lee, Jr., paid into court August 12, 1896, upon an oral plea of tender, $57, the judgment is credited with that sum paid over to the plaintiffs this day by the court, leaving $167, for which sum, with interest until paid, execution will issue, and all costs." The defendant thereupon appealed to the second circuit court of Shelby county. On the 11th of January, 1897, this cause was heard in the appellate court before the trial judge without a jury, and a judgment was rendered reciting, among other things, "that at plaintiffs' request the court first heard the cause on the plea of tender, and acceptance of same by the plaintiffs' attorney, and on hearing the testimony of plaintiffs' attorney the court finds for the defendant on said plea of tender and acceptance, and that same is in bar of plaintiffs' action herein." He then proceeds to give judgment for defendant that he be discharged of the debt, and adjudges the costs against the plaintiff, so far as they accrued after the payment of said money to the said justice of the peace. The plaintiffs, upon the hearing, and when the judgment was rendered, offered to prove their claim in full, but the court declined to hear it, holding that proof of the debt was inadmissible after acceptance by plaintiffs of the money paid into court. The plaintiffs have appealed to this court, and assign as error that the court erred in sustaining the plea, and in holding, as a matter of law, that the acceptance from the registry of the court by the plaintiffs of the moneys paid in by defendant under a plea of tender, barred the further prosecution of the suit for the balance of the debt sued on above the amount paid in by the defendant, and in declining to permit plaintiffs to prove their debt as sued for, after striking from the demand the money paid into court.

Upon the trial in the court below the attorney of plaintiff was asked: "Did not the defendant tender you $57 and costs as the amount owing by him to plaintiffs, and in a form satisfactory to you; and with your assent did he not pay same over to F. M. Guthrie, the magistrate before whom the suit was pending?" To which he replied, "Yes, sir." He was then asked: "Did you not, on the same day, or day after, request the said Guthrie to pay said money over to you, and did you not receive the same?" To which he replied, "I did." The contention on behalf of plaintiffs is that, after receiving the $57 from the justice of the peace, they had the right to pursue the collection of the balance of their account of $200 and interest, merely crediting their claim with the $57, as that much paid on account; and in support of this view counsel cites and relies upon Comyns' Dig. title Pleader, C 10; Tidd, Pr. §§ 619, 620, 627, 630; Boyden v. Moore, 5 Mass. 365; Williams v. Ingersoll, 12 Pick. 345; Murray v. Bethune, 1 Wend. 191; Sleight v. Rhineland, 1 Johns. 192; Spalding v. Vandercook, 2 Wend. 431; Johnston v. Columbian Ins. Co. 7 Johns. 315; Goslin v. Hodson, 24 Vt. 140. "The practice of bringing money into court is said to have been first introduced in the reign of Car. II. . . . to avoid the hazard and difficulty of pleading a tender. . . . In these [proper] cases, when the dispute is not whether anything, but how much, is due the plaintiff, the defendant may have leave to bring into court any sum of money he thinks fit; and the courts will make a rule that, unless the plaintiff accepts of it, with costs, in discharge of the action, it shall be struck out of the declaration, and paid out of the court, to the plaintiff or his attorney; and the plaintiff, upon the trial, shall not be permitted to give evidence for the sum brought in." Tidd, Pr. *619. "The motion for leave to bring money into court is a motion of course, and should regularly be made before plea pleaded." Id. *621. "Bringing money into court is, in general, considered as an acknowledgment of the right of action, to the amount of the sum brought in; which the plaintiff, therefore, on producing an office copy of the rule, is entitled to receive at all events, whether he proceed in the action or not, and even though he be nonsuited, or have a verdict against him." Id. *624. In speaking of nonsuiting, Tidd says: "When money is brought into court, unless the plaintiff will accept it, with costs, in discharge of the suit, it is considered as paid before action brought, and struck out of the declaration; and the action proceeds for the residue of the demand, in like manner as if it had been originally commenced for that only." Id. The practice of bringing money into court under the general rule is as follows, to wit: "When money is brought into court, the plaintiff either accepts it with costs, in discharge of the suit, or proceeds in the action. In the former case, he should take an office copy of the rule, and procure an appointment thereon from the master, or one of the prothonotaries, to tax the costs, and serve the same on the defendant's attorney; or, in default thereof, it will be considered that the plaintiff intends to proceed in the action, to recover a larger sum than that paid into court. . . . If the plaintiff proceed in the action, the sum brought into court is, by the terms of the rule, to be struck out of the declaration, and to be paid out of court, to the plaintiff or his attorney; and upon the trial of the issue the plaintiff shall not be permitted to give evidence of the same. In such case, if the plaintiff proceed to trial, otherwise than for the nonpayment of costs, and do not prove more to be due to him than the sum brought in, the plaintiff, on the rule being produced, shall be nonsuited, or have a verdict against him, and pay costs to the defendant. . . . But if more appear to be due to him, he shall have a verdict for the overplus, and costs. . . . And the plaintiff is entitled to costs, up to the time of bringing money into court." Id. 626; Keith v. Smith, 1 Swan, 92. This case was tried in the circuit court in 1849, and decided by our supreme court in 1851. It was an action of assumpsit for work, labor, etc. The pleas were nonassumpsit and notice of set-off. There was no plea of tender at all. The parties had been in cross litigation, and in the last suit defendant offered as set-off a judgment previously rendered in his favor, and to avoid the effect of this set-off plaintiff had tendered the amount of this former judgment, which was refused. It will be noticed that this case was decided before the act authorizing payment of tender to the clerk, taken from the Alabama Code of 1852, and while money could only be paid into court by the debtor, under some rule made. The syllabus is as follows: "Tender in Court, How Made. To be available, a tender made in court must be under a rule of the court, and accompanied by a payment of proper costs up to that time." In such cases, of course, the payment into court must be made upon the terms imposed by the rule. If the general rule is adopted, then the form and practice laid down by Tidd must be observed. If a special rule is made, then the payment must be in accordance with the terms imposed by the special rule. The court said: "It seems that the plaintiff tendered the amount of this judgment to avoid it as a set off, and the tender was refused; he then paid the money to the clerk of the court for the use of the defendant, but it was not received by defendant. The facts in this part of the case are so indistinctly stated that we cannot assume anything definite upon them. The object of the plaintiff doubtless was to avoid the effect of the set-off in reference to the matter of costs, now amounting to the sum of $540. . . . But it does not appear that the money offered as a payment of the judgment was paid into court under an order and rule of the court, authorizing it to be done. If a party bring money into court, he must do so under a rule of the court, and upon payment of proper costs up to that time. The debt so paid will thereupon cease to form any part of the future litigation in that behalf, and the other party will be entitled to receive the money. 1 Tidd, Pr. 620. The proper practice in this respect seems not to have been adopted in the present case." Evidently the court was here considering the practice of the payment of money into court under the general rule as laid down by Tidd, and where the legal scope and effect of such payment was prescribed by the terms of the rule itself. See Caruthers, Lawsuit, p. 226, note 2; Thomp. & S. Code, § 2928, note. Such rule can have no application to the tender of money, and the payment thereof to the clerk, under a statute which imposes no terms whatever, but leaves the effect of tender and acceptance to the general principles applicable to such cases. Unquestionably, under the practice as thus laid down by Tidd, and followed in the case of Keith v. Smith, 1 Swan, 92, the rule of the court under which money was paid into court prescribed the terms upon which it was placed in court, and the terms upon which it might be withdrawn, and these terms would be such as the court should see proper to make. We have already shown what the general rule was when the court did not prescribe any special provisions or conditions. And in many cases the practice was as contended for by plaintiff, to wit, that he might withdraw the amount paid in, and continue his litigation for the balance claimed. In such case the amount thus withdrawn is stricken from the claim, and, in the event the plaintiff is successful to the full amount claimed, he only gets judgment for the balance. But since the Code of 1858 the tender of money and payment into court is made under that statute, and not under a general rule of court. This, of course, refers to payments generally, and not to payments made under special rules prescribing conditions and terms. The provision of the statute is found in § 4647, Shannon's Code, and is in these words: "A plea of tender of money or of a thing in action shall be accompanied by a delivery of the money or thing in action to the clerk of the court." The form of the plea is prescribed in § 4681, subs. 9, Shannon's Code. This statute is taken from the Code of Alabama of 1852 (§ 2245), and carried forward into its new Code as § 2685. This section has received construction in the courts of Alabama in several cases, and the exact prac-tive involved in this case has been considered and passed upon in critical and exhaustive opinions.

In the case of Gardner v. Black (1893) 98 Ala. 638, the statute was construed. This was an action on two counts,—one for damages on breach of contract for failure to pay for building a house, the other on “quantum meruit” for material, work, and labor in the erecting of said house. There were three pleas, one of which was tender of a less amount, which was brought into court with costs. On plaintiff’s motion the money paid into court on the tender was paid over to him. Thereafter defendant moved to dismiss the case upon the ground that plaintiff having withdrawn the money paid into court on a plea of tender, thereby accepted that sum in full satisfaction of his complaint. Motion was overruled, and defendant excepted. The trial proceeded, and judgment was rendered for plaintiff for the balance claimed, and defendant appealed. The court, by McClellan, J., said: “Was there merit in the motion? The fact that the plea of tender did not go to the whole of plaintiff’s demand can be of no consequence whatever against the motion. These pleas never go to the whole claim asserted in the complaint. If they did, no necessity for interposing them could ever arise, as, of course, the plaintiff would always accept the sum tendered and the amount of costs accruing to time of tender. They, on the contrary, admit a part and only a part of the demand and are accompanied by the money necessary to discharge the part so admitted. The defendant says, in effect, ‘I owe you so much of what you claim, and here it is; the balance of your demand I do not owe, and I will defend against it.’ It is manifestly immaterial upon what line the defense as to the residue of the claim may proceed; it may rest in payment, recoupment, etc. In all cases the proposition of the plea is to pay the plaintiff the sum named in satisfaction of the whole claim advanced in the complaint, and if the proposition is accepted the result is complete liquidation of the demand, and this wholly irrespective of the grounds upon which the defendant declines to pay and proposes to deny his liability for the balance. If the defendants here prior to the suit had offered plaintiff $184.44 in full payment of all their liabilities under the building contract and the plaintiff had accepted the money, there of course could be no doubt but that he would thereby have lost all right he might otherwise have had to insist on the payment of a larger sum, however clear such right might originally have been, however frivolous may have been the grounds of defendant’s objection to payment of the whole demand, and whatever line of defense he may have proposed taking against the demand as a whole,—whether by recoupment against it or otherwise. And as has been directly adjudged by this court the withdrawal by the plaintiff of money paid into court on a plea of tender stands upon the same footing and involves the same consequences as the acceptance of a tender before suit brought in full satisfaction of the demand.” The court then quotes from Judge Clopton’s opinion in Hanson v. Todd, 95 Ala. 828, and cites Frank v. Pickens, 69 Ala. 369, opinion by Judge Brickell. The judgment is affirmed. 38 L. R. A.

ment was reversed, and cause dismissed in supreme court. In Hanson v. Todd (1891) 95 Ala. 828, suit was for money due plaintiff for repair of dwelling house, etc. The only disputed question was the amount due. Defendant filed plea of tender of the amount alleged by him to be due, accompanied by delivery of money in court. Plaintiff, without demurrer or issue, received the money from the clerk under an order of the court, and struck from the complaint the amount so received. Thereupon defendant moved to dismiss the suit at plaintiff’s cost. This was refused. There was trial and appeal. The court, speaking by Clopton, J., says: “What is the legal consequence, when the plaintiff elects to take, and receives the money brought into court upon a plea of tender before suit commenced, is the controlling question presented by the record, and the only one necessary to be considered. As a general rule, a debtor has no right to insist that his creditor shall, by the reception of the amount tendered, be precluded from claiming that a greater sum is due, and suing to recover the same. A tender on such conditions that its acceptance would constitute, or clearly imply, an admission by the creditor that it was in full of his claim, is invalid, and may be refused. The only effect of a tender refused, if pleaded and the truth of the plea established, is to stop the interest, and exempt the defendant from the costs of a subsequent suit. While a mere tender, though of the whole amount due, when unaccepted, does not operate to extinguish or satisfy the claim, yet, when made in full of the amount due, and accepted, without protest as to its sufficiency, the debt becomes extinguished. The creditor may reject a tender on condition that he receive it in full of his claim, but if he accepts it, he is bound by the condition, and will not be allowed to keep the money, and repudiate the condition. Miller v. Holden, 18 Vt. 387. A tender, if accepted, is accepted as made. The statute (Code, § 2685) requiring a plea of the tender of money to be accompanied by a delivery of the money to the clerk of the court, is declaratory of the general rule. A plea of tender, if in proper form, contains, substantially, the averment that the sum tendered and brought into court is the amount due plaintiff. The plea is in bar of, and, if proved, defeats any recovery. Bringing the money into court, on such plea, has all the effect of a tender on condition that the plaintiff receive the amount in full satisfaction of his claim. It is disembarassed of the principle that a tender cannot be made in such manner that the reception of the money satisfies the creditor’s demand. The object of the statute, in requiring a plea of tender to be accompanied by a delivery of the money to the clerk of the court, is that it shall be placed in the custody of the court, so that it may be paid to plaintiff whenever willing to accept it, and put an end to the litigation, or may be awarded to the party to whom it is ascertained to belong rightfully. Frank v. Pickens, 69 Ala. 369. . . . When the benefit of the tender is claimed in court, the plaintiff may elect to receive it, and put an end to the litigation, or he may take issue on the plea, and contest the fact, validity, and sufficiency of the tender. The voluntary reception of the money by plaintiff is tantamount to a confession or admission of the truth of the plea—equivalent to an acceptance of the money in satisfaction of his entire demand; he cannot afterwards say that it was accepted only as a payment pro tanto. Under the common-law rule, if the plaintiff take the money which has been brought into court on a plea of tender before suit, the proper judgment is, est inde sine die. 9 Bacon, Abr. 839. The same result logically follows, when the plaintiff withdraws the money brought into court under the statute. In such case, if the plaintiff elects to take the money, the proper practice is for the court to order it paid to him, and render judgment against him for costs. . . . The motion of defendant should have been granted. . . . Reversed, and judgment rendered dismissing the suit at the costs of plaintiff." These Alabama cases are decided with reference to a statute of that state, precisely similar to our statute directing that upon a plea of tender the money be paid to the clerk of the court.

In the case of Adams v. Helm (1874) 55 Mo. 468, the plaintiffs were indebted to defendant in certain notes secured by trust deed on divers lots of land. The trust deed recited that defendant was to take notes secured by trust deed on lots sold in sums of $100 or less, to be received as cash. When the original notes fell due, plaintiffs tendered in discharge of the balance due notes secured by trust deed to the amount of $4,300. Defendant took the notes and deed, remarking that she would not receive them in satisfaction, but only as collaterals. Plaintiffs filed their bill to cancel their original notes, and to have satisfaction of original trust deed declared. The court says: "The only material question is, whether the tender and acceptance of the notes and deed of trust securing the same, as made by the plaintiffs, amounted to a payment or discharge of the balance of their indebtedness to [the defendant] Helm. The tender was made on that express condition, and under a protest to that effect. It was [defendant's] Helm's duty either to refuse it or accept it on the terms as made. She had no right to accept the tender, and prescribe the terms of her acceptance. She should have refused the tender or returned the notes and deed of trust at the time, or she must be held to the terms of the tender as prescribed by the debtor."

The case of Hacussler v. Duross, 14 Mo. App. 108, decided in 1888, is also in point. The suit related to the accounting of a trustee to whom real estate had been conveyed for the benefit of creditors. The assignee of four creditors sued because the trustee had not paid him what he claimed was due out of the proceeds of sale. The trustee tendered plaintiff, before suit, the amount he insisted was due, deposited the same in court with his answer, and plaintiff withdrew the money. It was held that "a plaintiff who so withdraws money cannot afterwards claim that it was accepted merely as a payment on account." A plaintiff, who in accordance with the proferat, accepts money paid into court in discharge of the demand sued on, thereby ends the suit, and is liable for all costs which accrue thereafter. The court says: "The object of this tender and payment into court was to enable plaintiff, if he saw fit, to accept the amount conceded by defendant to be due, so as to put an end to the litigation. Appellant contends that his acceptance of the money paid into court is not to be taken as an admission that the rest of the demand was unfounded, and that he had a right to accept this money pro tanto, and continue the litigation. But a tender must be accepted as made. The payment of money into court had the effect of a tender; and if the money is taken out of court by plaintiff, when expressly offered as in full of plaintiff's claim, plaintiff cannot afterwards say that the tender was accepted, not as made, in satisfaction of the entire demand, but merely as payment on account." The court then examined the various authorities relied on by plaintiff to sustain his contention, several of which are relied on by plaintiffs in the present case, and showed that such authorities, properly construed, do not sustain plaintiff's contention, to wit: Storey v. Krenson, 55 Ind. 401; Esler v. Mitchell, 26 Mich. 500; Spalding v. Vandercook, 2 Wend. 431; Sleight v. Rhineland, 1 Johns. 192; Hildyard v. Blowers, 5 Esp. 69; Johnston v. Columbian Ins. Co. 7 Johns. 315; 1 Tidd, Pr. 619, 626.

We have examined carefully the cases to which we have been cited by counsel for plaintiffs in their able and exhaustive brief. While they are not exactly in point, the tendency of the cases cited, and especially those from New York, is in the direction of their contention. It would be useless to draw distinctions between those cases and the one now on trial, as, in any event, we think the rule and practice laid down and illustrated in the cases we have cited is the better rule under our statute, the fundamental idea and basis of which is that a defendant tendering money and paying the same into court does so in full satisfaction and liquidation of the plaintiff's demand, and, if accepted by plaintiff, must be so received.

Coming to the facts of the case now on trial, it is apparent that the amount paid in by defendant was tendered and paid in as the full amount due to the plaintiffs. It is true that plaintiffs at the time protested that more was due them, and declined to accept the amount paid in as a full discharge of the defendant's debt. Defendant, however, did not waive or relinquish their requirement. The fund was paid in as a full discharge, and it could be drawn out upon no other terms, in the absence of any rule of the court, or the consent of defendant. The plaintiffs applied for the money and received it, and now insist that it can be regarded as a payment only pro tanto, and that they have the right to proceed with their suit to recover the remainder of their claim. We are of opinion that when they applied for and received it they did so upon the condition on which it was deposited; that is, as a full discharge of defendant's debt. Hanson v. Todd, 95 Ala. 828; Adams v. Helm, 55 Mo. 468; Hacussler v. Duross, 14 Mo. App. 108; Moynahan v. Moore [9 Mich. 9], 77 Am. Dec. 486, note; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 927. It is true, the creditor may limit the terms of his acceptance, and, if the debtor assent thereto, he will not be precluded from receiving any additional sum he may show to be due if he so provided. 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 927.

notes 2, 3. But he cannot prescribe the terms upon which it shall be received. Id. And in this case there was no order of the court defining the terms on which it was paid to plaintiffs, and received by them. The theory of the law is that a tender which is not accepted is not equivalent to performance, and does not satisfy or extinguish the obligation, nor bar an action upon it, but only stops interest and costs, if sufficient, and kept good. 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 924; M'Nairy v. Bell, 1 Yerg. 503, 24 Am. Dec. 454; Keys v. Roder, 1 Head, 20; Miller v. McKinney, 5 Lea, 98; Lincoln Sav. Bank v. Ewing, 12 Lea, 608; Moynahan v. Moore [9 Mich. 9], 77 Am. Dec. 488, note. The money paid in becomes the property of the plaintiff because it is an admission of indebtedness to the extent of the amount paid in, and the party paying it loses all right to it. 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 948. It remains, however, if not accepted, in custody of the court as a continuing tender until the rights of the parties are settled, unless withdrawn by consent or under order of court, or taken as tendered. If withdrawn by consent or under order of court, the order of consent fixes the terms of the withdrawal. If taken as tendered, then the terms of the tender control; and, unless drawn out by consent, or under order of court, it can only be taken as tendered; and, if taken, the plaintiff receiving it cannot claim to have taken it upon terms other than those imposed when tender is made. Upon final hearing, if the tender is found to be good and sufficient, it is a discharge of defendant from all liability for the debt and such interest and costs as shall have accrued after tender made. If not sufficient, then it is applied as a payment or credit upon the execution; judgment being rendered for the full amount to which the plaintiff is entitled. 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 938, note; Dakin v. Dunning, 7 Hill, 30, 42 Am. Dec. 83. It is argued that this imposes a hardship upon the plaintiff by holding that, while the amount paid is his property, still he cannot draw it out except upon condition that he surrender the balance of his claim. Again, while thus retained in court, interest will cease, and even the principal may be lost, and it will work a hardship to subject the plaintiff to such danger and loss. But it must be remembered that the money must be paid into court in order to give the plaintiff the option to take it or refuse it. If not accepted, it must remain in court until it shall be decided which party is correct in its contention. The loss of interest must necessarily fall upon someone, and it is but just that it should fall upon that party who is cast in the suit, and who fails in his contention. As to what result will follow if the principal is lost, we need not now decide, as it is not involved in this case. All loss of interest or principal may be obviated by drawing out the fund on such terms as may be agreed on, or as the court may impose. In the absence of such terms or rule, the claim is discharged.

There is no error in the judgment of the court below, and it is affirmed, with costs.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Wisconsin, ex rel. H. C. ASHBAUGH, et al.,
v.
CIRCUIT COURT OF EAU CLAIRE COUNTY et al.

(.....Wis.....)

1. Newspaper articles charging a judge who is a candidate for re-election with corruption and partiality in actions already passed and ended, but not referring to any pending litigation, cannot be punished as a criminal contempt, although they are distributed to officers of the court and to persons summoned as jurors therein, as well as generally circulated.
2. An affidavit alleging the truth of newspaper statements, filed in response to an order to show cause why the affiant should not be punished for a contempt because of such publication, cannot be itself held to constitute a contempt when the original publication did not.
3. A writ of prohibition to restrain the judge from proceeding to punish a contempt in excess of his jurisdiction is an apt and proper remedy.

(September 21, 1897.)

PETITION for a writ of prohibition to prevent defendants from proceeding to punish relators for alleged contempt of court. Writ granted.

Statement by Winslow, J.:

This was an action of prohibition commenced by the issuance of an alternative writ out of this court on the 3d day of April, 1897, upon motion of the attorney general, based upon the sworn petition or complaint of Messrs. Ashbaugh and Doolittle. The object of the action was to prohibit the further prosecution in the circuit court of Eau Claire county of certain proceedings then pending therein, wherein Ashbaugh and Doolittle were charged with having committed a criminal contempt of said court, and were threatened with immediate imprisonment therefor. Returns were in due time made to the alternative writ both by the circuit judge, Hon. W. F. Bailey, and by the sheriff of said county, C. H. Henry, and upon order of this court a supplemental return was made by the circuit judge. These returns were challenged as insufficient by demurrer, and upon argument the demurrer was sustained, and judgment rendered adjudging that the contempt proceedings were in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, and awarding an absolute writ of prohibition against the further prosecution of such preceedings. The facts which appeared by the complaint and the various returns were practically undisputed; and were, in brief, as follows: In March, 1897, the circuit court of Eau Claire county was in session, engaged in the trial of cases, the Honorable W. F. Bailey presiding. Judge Bailey's term was to expire in January, 1898, and the election of his successor was to take place on the 6th day of April, 1897. Judge Bailey was a candidate for re-election and two other candidates, Hon. James O'Neill and F. M. Miner, Esq., were also in the field. The petitioner Ashbaugh was the editor and publisher of a newspaper at Eau Claire, and the petitioner Doolittle was a lawyer in active practice at the same city. The campaign had become somewhat heated and acrimonious by the publication of newspaper articles pro and con. Both of the petitioners were strongly opposed to the re-election of Judge Bailey, and on the 11th day of March Mr. Doolittle published in Ashbaugh's newspaper an article several columns in length, charging the judge with being extravagant in the management of the court, and with being partial and unfair in respect to his official conduct in the trial of causes, and with being influenced by corrupt motives. These charges all referred to proceedings and cases already heard and decided, and not to matters then pending or on trial. On the 31st day of March an editorial article appeared in the said newspaper strongly opposing Judge Bailey's candidacy, and summarizing the charges against him which had been made at length in the Doolittle article. On the 1st day of April following, Judge Bailey made an order on his own motion requiring Messrs. H. H. Hayden and T. F. Frawley to institute contempt proceedings against Ashbaugh and Doolittle on account of the publications. Upon the same day Messrs. Hayden and Frawley presented a sworn petition to the court setting forth the facts as to the writing and publication of the articles, and alleging that Ashbaugh and Doolittle had circulated the articles among the officers of the court and persons summoned as jurors. Upon this petition, and on the 2d day of April, an order was made reciting that "it appears to the satisfaction of the court that H. C. Ashbaugh and L. A. Doolittle have committed a criminal contempt of said court," and requiring Ashbaugh and Doolittle to appear at 8 o'clock P. M. of the same day, and show cause why they should not be punished for said alleged contempt, and providing for the service of the order at least two hours before the hearing. This order was personally served shortly after 11 o'clock A. M. At 8 o'clock P. M. Ashbaugh and Doolittle appeared in court. Doolittle filed an affidavit of prejudice, but the court held that no change of venue could be granted. Further time was asked for, and time was given until 7:30 P. M., when Ashbaugh and Doolittle filed an affidavit alleging the truth of the articles, and asking further time until the 5th of April to prepare an answer. Thereupon an order was made that interrogatories be made and served, and that Ashbaugh and Doolittle appear at 10 o'clock A. M. on the 3d day of April, to which time the proceedings were adjourned. The interrogatories were made, asking whether the defendants wrote, published, and circulated the articles, and such interrogatories were served at about 9 o'clock P. M. of the same day. At 10 o'clock A. M. upon the following day (April 3) the defendants appeared, and asked further time, which was granted, until 7:30 P. M. of the same day. Upon the assembling of the court at that time, the alternative writ of prohibition from this court was produced, and served upon Judge Bailey. Thereupon Judge Bailey announced that he would not proceed further with the pending proceedings, but at once made an order adjudging both Ashbaugh and Doolittle guilty of a new contempt in the immediate presence of the court, by reason of having filed their affidavit alleging the truth of the articles, and committing them to jail for thirty days, such imprisonment to commence at once. The commitment was placed in the hands of the sheriff at once, but was not executed by him. Upon these facts it was adjudged that both of the alleged proceedings for contempt were in excess of the jurisdiction of the circuit court, and the writ of prohibition was made absolute.

Mr. John M. Olin, for relators:

The only authority possessed by any court of record in this state to punish, as for criminal contempt, is given by § 2565, Rev. Stat.

This statute, authorizing courts to punish as for a criminal contempt, should be considered in connection with § 8 of art. 1 of our Constitution.

Every person may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right, and no laws shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press.

This applies to words spoken or published concerning judicial conduct and character.

Storey v. People, 79 Ill. 45.

To constitute a contempt under subd. 6 of § 2565 the publication must be a report or copy of pending judicial proceedings.

State*, 47 Neb. 630; Re Dalton, 46 Kan. 253; Re Thompson, 46 Kan. 254; Re Bahama Islands, [1898] A. C. 138; Storey v. People, 79 Ill. 45; Stuart v. People, 4 Ill. 895.

This case does not fall within subd. 1 of § 2565, which provides for punishing as for criminal contempt any person guilty of disorderly, contemptuous, or insolent behavior committed during its sitting, in its immediate view and presence, and directly tending to interrupt its proceedings, or to impair the respect due its authority.

Dunham v. State, 6 Iowa, 245; State v. Anderson, 40 Iowa, 207.

This statute is a limitation upon the power of the court to punish for criminal contempts.

The question involved in this case is res judicata in this state. Every issue involved in this case was determined by this court in 1855, in the case of Beriah Brown and E. A. Calkins, plaintiffs in error, v. State of Wisconsin, defendant in error.

The statute in question is constitutional.

State v. Frew, 24 W. Va. 416, 49 Am. Rep. 257.

The legislature has the right to limit and regulate the power of lower courts to punish for contempt, whether constructive or direct in character.

The writ of prohibition was the only adequate remedy in this case.

An appeal would not lie.

As to whether a writ of error would lie, in such a case, the authorities are divided; but a great many hold it will not.

4 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 809.

This writ under our statute would only lie from a final judgment.

Rev. Stat. § 8043.

Whether a writ of error would lie or not is immaterial, since the writ of prohibition was the only writ which furnished an adequate remedy under the facts of this case.

When a newspaper or other publication, being read by jurors and attendants upon the courts, has a tendency to interfere with the proper and unbiased administration of the law in pending cases, the resulting liability or responsibility is not limited to a civil action for damages by the parties prejudiced thereby, but it may be adjudged a contempt of court, and accordingly punished.

The Constitution of the state in creating courts of record, vested in them ex vi termini this common-law power to punish for contempt, as an absolute and essential quality of superior courts, as much as the power to sit in judicial order, with open doors, in public session. No statute could be effectual to take it away; no statutory regulation can be effectual so to abridge, impair, or cripple it as to leave the courts without effectual power, effectually to punish as for contempt, disregard of the respect due to judicial administration, and disobedience of judicial determination.

This is merely a judicial modification of the law as to contempt, not a legislative one.

The same modification was made or recognized in Illinois.

Also in South Dakota.

State v. Sweetland, 3 S. D. 508.

In North Carolina it is held that the inherent power of courts to punish summarily for contempts any act committed in their presence, or so near their sittings as to disturb their proceedings, or that is calculated to disturb their business or impair their usefulness or bring them into disrespect or contempt, cannot be taken away by legislation; but that the common-law power of courts to punish for contempt acts not committed in their presence but calculated and intended to impair their usefulness and bring them into disrespect, may be regulated by the legislature.

Re Robinson, 117 N. C. 538.

In Nebraska it is held that a newspaper publication is a contempt of court only when it has reference to a matter then pending in court, and is of a character tending to the prejudice of pending and subsequent proceedings upon such matter.

Percival v. State, 45 Neb. 741.

In West Virginia (State v. Frew, 24 W. Va. 416, 49 Am. Rep. 257), it was held that the statute restricting the power to punish for contempt was, as to the supreme court, of no force. In a subsequent case (State v. McLaugherty, 38 W. Va. 250), it was held that the statute was effectual to control the power of the district courts upon the ground that they could punish the offending parties as for a crime, while in the supreme court there was no such power.

In Ohio it was held that it was not necessary to determine as to the effect of the statute, as the offense in the case came within its provisions, but it expressed grave doubts whether power to restrict the courts in respect to punishment for contempt rested in the legislature.

Myers v. State, 46 Ohio St. 478.

A court may be insulted by the most innocent words uttered in a peculiar manner and tone.

If the words might be contemptuously spoken, that was ample occasion for the decision of the royal court, with which no other court can meddle. Every court in such a case has to form its own judgment.

Wilson's Case, 7 Q. B. 984; Ex parte Robinson, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 505, 22 L. ed. 205.

Disorderly conduct, insulting demeanor to the court, etc., constitute a direct contempt.

The act and conduct were not only a direct contempt, but such a direct contempt as came 38 L. R. A.

within the very letter of the first subdivision of the statute.

Re Chadwick (Mich.) 3 Det. L. N. 221; Myers v. State, 46 Ohio St. 478.

To what extent, if at all, can an appellate court review or revise the judgment of the circuit court, punishing a contempt committed by words and manner in open court.

That it did not extend to the conduct for which the relators here were ordered to be punished prior to the decision by the supreme court herein seems to be clear by the decisions of courts.

The power does not exist in the supreme court to determine in advance (that is, before the circuit court has determined that the alleged matter or conduct is a contempt) by writ of prohibition, whether the matter so charged as a contempt is so in fact.

When a court has jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question which occurs in the case, and whether its decision be correct or otherwise, its judgment, until reversed, is regarded as binding in every other court.

Arnold v. Booth, 14 Wis. 187.

A writ of prohibition is never to be issued unless it clearly appears that the inferior court is about to exceed its jurisdiction. It cannot be made to serve the purpose of a writ of error or certiorari to correct mistakes of that court in deciding any question of law or fact within its jurisdiction.

Winslow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The importance of the questions arising in this case, and the imperative necessity of a wise and just decision, can hardly be overestimated. These questions involve not only the right of a court to enforce due respect for its authority, and punish acts which tend to diminish such proper respect and interfere with the performance of its important public duties, but they involve as well the preservation of personal liberty as against summary imprisonment, the right of free speech, the freedom of the press, and the proper limit which may be placed upon the discussion of the fitness of candidates for public office. Fully realizing, as we believe, the gravity of these questions, we have given the case the fullest and most careful consideration within our power, in order that no false step, involving at once consequences disastrous and far-reaching, might be taken. The questions involved upon which all minor questions depend are but two in number: First, Did the publications in question constitute a criminal contempt of court? and, second, Is the writ of prohibition the proper remedy?

1. Did the publications constitute a criminal contempt of court? In considering this question it has not been deemed necessary to reproduce the articles in this opinion. It is sufficient to say of them that, among other things, they charged Judge Bailey with having been intentionally partial and corrupt in the trial of certain causes in his court. If the charges were true, the unfitness of Judge Bailey for his office was certain. That they were intemperate in tone, and well calculated to exasperate their subject, may be at once admitted. It seems probable also that from their very intemperance they were rather calculated to injure the cause which they were designed to help than otherwise. These questions are, however, foreign to the present inquiry; the question being, not whether Judge Bailey as an individual was grossly slandered, but whether a criminal contempt of court was committed. A criminal contempt at common law may be generally defined as any act which tends either to obstruct the course of justice or to prejudice the trial in any action or proceeding then pending in court. The power of courts of superior jurisdiction created by the Constitution to punish such acts is necessarily inherent in such a court, and arises by implication from the very act creating the court. A court without this power would be at best a mere debating society, and not a court. These principles have been recognized in all courts from time immemorial. Re Rosenberg, 90 Wis. 581-588, and 589; Ex parte Robinson, 83 U. S. 19 Wall. 505, 23 L. ed. 205; Rapalje, Contempt, § 1. Doubtless, this power may be regulated, and the manner of its exercise prescribed, by statute, but certainly it cannot be entirely taken away, nor can its efficiency be so impaired or abridged as to leave the court without power to compel the due respect and obedience which are essential to preserve its character as a judicial tribunal. The decisions on this point are well-nigh unanimous. See authorities collated in note to Percival v. State, 50 Am. St. Rep. 568-573, 45 Neb. 741. It is, and must be a power arbitrary in its nature, and summary in its execution. It is, perhaps, nearest akin to despotic power of any power existing under our form of government. Such being its nature, due regard for the liberty of the citizen imperatively requires that its limits be carefully guarded so that they be not overstepped.

It is important that it exist in full vigor, it is equally important that it be not abused. The greater the power, the greater the care required in its exercise. Being a power which arises and is based upon necessity, it must be measured and limited by the necessity which calls it into existence. The ultimate question then is, Is it necessary to the due administration of justice by a court that the publication of such an article as the one before us be punished as a criminal contempt. Before discussing the authorities upon this question, it will be well to state the exact facts which were charged in the petition of Messrs. Hayden and Frawley in the circuit court. It was alleged that the articles were written by Doolittle, and by his request published by Ashbaugh; that court was in session, with a full panel of jurors, trying jury cases, and that the articles were by the defendants generally circulated in the city of Eau Claire, and were distributed to various persons residing in this state, and were by them distributed and delivered to the officers "of said court, and to persons summoned as jurors in said court," and "were read by the officers and jurors so in attendance in said court." The articles themselves referred to no cases pending or on trial, but contained only strictures upon the general character of the judge, and his acts in former cases which had been concluded. The fact should also be remembered that a judicial election was impending, and that the judge was a candidate for re-election. It is evident that, if any contempt was committed, it was what is known as constructive contempt, as distinguished from direct contempt. Rapalje, Contempt, § 22. Numerous cases are cited which are claimed to support the contention that such publications constitute constructive contempt of court. Examination of these cases, however, reveals the fact that the great majority of them simply hold that publications of this nature, which refer to an action or proceeding then pending and undecided, constitute contempt. Such cases are Skurrod's Case, 48 N. H. 423, 97 Am. Dec. 626; State v. Frew, 24 W. Va. 416, 49 Am. Rep. 257; People v. Wilson, 64 Ill. 195, 16 Am. Rep. 528; Territory v. Murray, 7 Mont. 251; Re Chessman, 49 N. J. L. 187, 60 Am. Rep. 596; Cooper v. People, Wyatt, 18 Colo. 887, 878, 6 L. R. A. 480, 443; State, Phelps v. Orleans Civil Dist. Ct. Judge, 45 La. Ann. 1250. The principle on which these cases are placed is that such publications have a natural tendency to prejudice the course of justice in the particular cause then pending, and hence constitute constructive contempt. It is unnecessary in the present case, nor would it be proper, to affirm or deny the correctness of these decisions. Such a case is not now before us. The publications complained of here referred to no pending litigation, nor is it charged that they were circulated or brought into the immediate presence of the court.

Passing from this class of cases, we come to the cases which involve the consideration of adverse or libelous newspaper comments upon the acts of a court in actions already past and ended, and here we find much contrariety of opinion, not to say confusion, in the utterances of courts and text-writers. Cases may be found holding directly that such publications constitute constructive contempts, and may be punished as such. State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 384; Dandridge's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 409; Re Chadwick (Mich.) 8 Det. L. N. 221. The reasoning upon which such decisions rest is that such publications tend to diminish the respect due to the court in the trial of future causes, and thus impair its usefulness. This doctrine is certainly extreme. Carried to its ultimate conclusion, it would call for the punishment of any adverse criticism on the official conduct of a sitting judge, and absolutely prevent all public or private discussion of court proceedings. All such discussions, if unfavorable to the ability or honesty of a judge, must tend in some small degree, at least, to undermine public confidence in the court in the future. On the other hand, many well-considered cases may be found in which it is distinctly held that such publications do not constitute contempt, and cannot be punished as such. Some of these cases go upon the ground that, even if such publications were punishable as constructive contempts at common law, still that it was competent for the legislature to limit such power by statute, and that such power has been limited by statutes substantially similar to our own. Rev. Stat. § 2565. Some of the cases, however, distinctly hold that under our form of government such publications do not constitute contempt, and that to punish them as such would be a serious invasion of the great constitutional guaranties of freedom of speech and of the press. The following decisions are cited as enunciating one or both of these principles. Stuart v. People, 4 Ill. 395; Storey v. People, 79 Ill. 45; Dunham v. State, 6 Iowa, 245; State v. Anderson, 40 Iowa, 207; Cheadle v. State, 110 Ind. 301, 59 Am. Rep. 199; Re Robinson, 117 N. C. 533; State v. Sweetland, 3 S. D. 503; Percival v. State, 45 Neb. 741.

In our own state the question has never been discussed in any opinion. It is a fact, however, that a case arose and was decided upon the merits early in the history of this court, while Chief Justice Whiton was on the bench, involving this very question, although for some reason no opinion was ever filed. The original records are still preserved in the clerk's office, and they disclose the following facts: In October, 1854, Messrs. Brown and Calkins published a newspaper in Madison, and during the October term of the circuit court of Dane county published an article charging corruption and malice upon the grand jury and the presiding judge of the court in the finding of an indictment against the school land commissioners. Proceedings were instituted in the circuit court as for criminal contempt, and, after hearing, the court adjudged that a contempt had been committed, and adjudged that a fine be imposed upon both defendants. The cause was removed to this court upon writ of error, was afterwards argued, and the judgment was wholly reversed on the 21st day of May, 1858. Upon the outside of the record appears the notation "Stuart v. People [4 Ill.] 6 Scam. 402," and in the volume of court minutes appears the notation, "Opinion by the chief justice." Although no opinion was ever in fact filed, there seems to be no escape from the conclusion that this court at that time held that the publication before it did not constitute a contempt. No other ground appears upon which the judgment could have been reversed upon the merits. But, whatever may be thought of the case just mentioned, or its weight as authority, we are well persuaded that newspaper comments on cases finally decided prior to the publication cannot be considered criminal contempt, and our reasons for that conclusion will be briefly stated. Important as it is that courts should perform their grave public duties unimpeded and unprejudiced by illegitimate influences, there are other rights guaranteed to all citizens by our Constitution and form of government, either expressly or impliedly, which are fully as important, and which must be guarded with an equally jealous care. These rights are the right of free speech and of free publication of the citizen's sentiments "on all subjects" (Const. U. S. Amend. 1; Const. Wis. art. 1, § 8); the right of trial by jury (Const. Wis. art. 1, §§ 5, 7); also the right to freely discuss the merits and qualifications of a candidate for public office, being responsible for the abuse of such right in a proper action at law. In the present case it is of the utmost importance to bear in mind that Judge Bailey was a candidate before the people for re-election. Had he been a candidate for any other office, it would not be contended by anyone that the publications in question would afford ground for any other legal action than an action for libel in the regular course of the law; but the claim is that because he was a judge, and was holding court at that time, such unfavorable criticism of his past actions may be summarily punished by the judge himself as for contempt. Truly, it must be a grievous and weighty necessity which will justify so arbitrary a proceeding, whereby a candidate for office becomes the accuser, judge, and jury, and may within a few hours summarily punish his critic by imprisonment. The result of such a doctrine is that all unfavorable criticism of a sitting judge's past official action can be at once stopped by the judge himself, or, if not stopped, can be punished by immediate imprisonment. If there can be any more effectual way to gag the press, and subvert freedom of speech, we do not know where to find it. Under such a rule the merits of a sitting judge may be rehearsed, but as to his demerits there must be profound silence. In our judgment, no such divinity as this "doth hedge about" a judge; certainly not when he is a candidate for public office.

Recurring to the question with which the discussion opened, namely, Is it necessary that a court should possess this power? we feel bound to hold that, considering the guaranteed rights of the citizen just referred to, no such power as this is necessary for the due administration of justice. It may be freely admitted that under the common law as administered in England the mere writing contemptuously of a superior court or judge has been declared a constructive contempt. 4 Bl. Com. 285. We however, adopted no part of the common law which was inconsistent with our Constitution (Const. Wis. Schedule, § 13), and it seems clear to us that so extreme a power is inconsistent with, and would materially impair, the constitutional rights of free speech and free press. But it is claimed that the publication constituted a criminal contempt, within the provisions of our statute. Section 2555, Rev. Stat., defines criminal contempts, and divides them into seven classes. Of these classes only the first and the sixth have any possible bearing upon the case. These classes are: "(1) Disorderly, contemptuous, or insolent behavior committed during its sittings, in its immediate view and presence, and directly tending to interrupt its proceedings, or to impair the respect due its authority." "(6) The publication of a false or grossly inaccurate report or copy of its proceedings; but no court can punish as a contempt the publication of true, full, and fair reports of any trial, argument, proceedings or decisions had in such court." Certainly the publication in question does not fall within the first subdivision. Acts punishable under this provision must have been in the immediate view and presence of the court, and it was not charged in the complaint of Messrs. Hayden and Frawley that any such act had been committed. It was not even alleged that the publication had been circulated in the court-room. Nor does the sixth subdivision apply, because it was not charged that the references to the proceedings in court were in any respect false or inaccurate. It may well be doubted whether the publication itself could be well called in any proper sense a "report or copy" of the proceedings of the court, but, conceding that it could be so called, the charge of contempt must certainly allege that the report is "false or grossly inaccurate," in order to make a case of contempt. This is jurisdictional. If it be not alleged, no contempt is stated. Our conclusion is that the attempt to punish the publication in question as for contempt was in excess of the jurisdiction of the circuit court.

But another claim was made by the counsel who so ably represented Judge Bailey, in this court which requires some attention. It appears by the return that immediately upon the service of the alternative writ upon him, Judge Bailey announced that he would proceed no further with the pending proceedings, and that they were stayed. After making this announcement, however, the judge at once stated that a new contempt had been committed by Ashbaugh and Doolittle in the immediate presence of the court by the filing of their sworn return or affidavit in response to the original order to show cause stating that the charges in the newspaper articles were true; that this contempt was independent of the alleged contempt by publication, and was not included within the inhibition of the writ, and that he would at once punish them for this contempt. Thereupon the judge proceeded at once to adjudge them guilty of this new contempt, and sentenced them to imprisonment therefor. We are unable to agree with this contention. If, as we have held, the original publication was not contempt, and the attempt to punish it as such was in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, then certainly the defendants had a right, when summoned into court, to allege its truth. They were forced, if they were in any degree honorable men, and not mere slanderers, to allege the truth of the publication. Any other course would demonstrate their pusillanimity. It cannot be endured that a court, by unauthorized summary proceedings, should wring from a man such a declaration, and then abandon the original proceedings, and punish this forced declaration as contempt.

2. The question remains whether the writ of prohibition is the proper remedy. This writ issues only to restrain a court in the exercise of judicial functions outside or beyond its jurisdiction, and when there is no other adequate remedy. State, DePuy, v. Evans, 88 Wis. 265. Having held that the attempt to punish the publication in question as contempt was in excess of the jurisdiction of the circuit court, no reason is seen why the writ is not an apt and proper remedy, unless, indeed, there be other adequate remedies. We do not think that in a case like the present, where immediate imprisonment was threatened, and about to be inflicted, either writ of error or habeas corpus can be said to be an adequate remedy. In either case the trial must have been concluded, and sentence imposed, before the writ could issue, and in the case of habeas corpus the imprisonment must have actually begun. There certainly is grave doubt whether certiorari would lie in any event. Chittenden v. State, 41 Wis. 265. In view of these considerations, it seems certain that neither of the last-named writs would afford an adequate remedy, even conceding that they would be applicable. Prohibition has been used in other jurisdictions in similar cases. Queen v. Lefroy, L. R. 8 Q. B. 184, 4 Moak, Eng. Rep. 250; People, Wright, v. Placer County Judge, 27 Cal. 151; Williams v. Dwinelle, 51 Cal. 442; People, Pierce, v. Carrington, 5 Utah, 531.

During the preparation of this opinion, the writer has been furnished with a pamphlet discussion of the law of contempts, prepared by Judge Bailey. Although arriving at different conclusions from those reached by us, Judge Bailey's discussion of the question bears the marks of his well-known legal ability and industry, and it is but fair to say that it has been of much assistance in finding and considering authorities upon the interesting questions involved in this case. The judgment in this case having already been entered and executed, no mandate is necessary.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of South Carolina

v.

Peter HIGGINS.

(.....S. C.....)

1. A statute forbidding the citizens of any other county from fishing in the waters of two specified counties without a license, without anything to forbid the citizens of those counties from fishing in other counties without a license, violates the constitutional guaranty of the equal protection of the laws.
2. Fish are to be classed as game within the meaning of a constitutional provision against special laws to provide for the protection of game.
3. A special law to prevent fishing for profit by citizens of one county in the waters of another county, which is limited to certain counties, is in violation of the provision of Const. art. 3, § 84, against special laws "where a general law can be made applicable."
4. An arrest under a warrant which was not supported either by oath or affirmation is in violation of Const. art. 1, § 16.

(October 23, 1897.)

APPPLICATION by defendant for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain his release from the custody of the sheriff to which he had been committed for alleged violation of a statute regulating the right to fish. Petitioner discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Huger Sinkler for petitioner.

Mr. C. P. Townsend, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

McIver, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an application, addressed to this court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, by the defendant for a discharge under a writ of habeas corpus. It appears from the sheriff's return to the writ that the defendant was committed to his custody "by virtue of an order of arrest for the violation of act No. 98, Laws of 1896, in that, being a citizen of the county of Charleston, he did catch fish for profit in the waters of Berkeley county, to me directed, a copy of which annexed I transmit to you." The only question made at the argument of the case was whether the act mentioned was in violation of the Constitution. It was contended on the part of the defendant that the act in question violated two of the provisions of the Constitution which went into effect "from and after the 31st day of December in the year of 1895." These two provisions are: First, § 5 of article 1, which reads as follows: "The privileges and immunities of citizens of this state and of the United States under this Constitution shall not be abridged, nor shall any person be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor shall any person be denied the equal protection of the laws;" second, § 84 of article 3, which contains, among others, the following provisions: "The general assembly of this state shall not enact local or special laws concerning any of the following subjects or for any of the following purposes, to wit: . . . To provide for the protection of game. (2) In all other cases, where a general law can be made applicable, no special law shall be enacted."

The act of 1896, which is claimed to be in violation of these two sections of the Constitution, is entitled "An Act to Further Regulate Fishing for Profit in the Waters of This State," and contains the following provisions: Section 1: "That after the passage and approval of this act, it shall not be lawful for a citizen of one county to fish for profit in the waters of another county without first obtaining therefor from the treasurer of the county in which he intends to so fish, a license to do so." The second section simply prescribes the price of such license, and the fund to which it shall be appropriated, and therefore is not pertinent to the present inquiry. The 8d section of the act reads as follows: "That this act shall not apply to any counties in this state other than the counties of Colleton and Berkeley." The 4th section of the act provides the punishment for violating the provisions of the act, and its terms throw no light upon the question which we are to determine. The terms of this act are peculiar; for while its title and the provisions of the 1st section clearly make it a general law, applicable to fishing in any waters of this state, within any of the counties of the state, the provision in the 8d section expressly confines its operation to the two counties therein specified, thereby clearly making the act a local or special law. There is another peculiarity about this act; for the phraseology employed in the 8d section leaves it at least doubtful whether the intention was to prohibit the citizens of Colleton and Berkeley counties alone for fishing for profit in the waters of any other county without a license, as would seem to be the logical inference, inasmuch as the terms of the 1st section expressly apply to the citizens of every county in the state, while the terms of the 8d section are limited to the counties of Colleton and Berkeley,—that is, to the citizens of those two counties, leaving the citizens of all the other counties at liberty to fish anywhere without a license.—or whether the intention was to prohibit the citizens of every other county from fishing for profit in the waters of Colleton and Berkeley without a license. Assuming the latter to be the real intention of the act, as we think it likely was the case, we will consider the question in that aspect. Taking that view of the act, it will be observed that while it forbids the citizens of every county in the state, except those of Colleton and Berkeley, from fishing in the waters of those two counties without a license, there is nothing in the act to forbid the citizens of Colleton and Berkeley from fishing in the waters of every other county in the state without a license. This is a discrimination in favor of the citizens of Colleton and Berkeley coun ties, and is in conflict with that clause of the Constitution quoted above, declaring that no person shall be denied the equal protection of the laws.

But, again, if, as we have seen above, this act is a local or special law, it violates the provisions of § 84 of article 3, cited above, provided it concerns any of the subjects or is for any of the purposes mentioned in that section. The manifest object of the act was to protect fish in the waters of Colleton and Berkeley counties, and, if fish can be regarded as game, then, being a local or special law providing for the protection of game, it is in conflict with the section of the Constitution last referred to, for that section expressly forbids the enactment of any local or special law "to provide for the protection of game." The authorities clearly show that fish can and should be classed as game. In 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, at page 1023, it is said: "Animals pursued and taken by sportsmen are designated as game." And in a note on the next page of that valuable work it is said: "Game includes wild bees and fish;" citing Cooley, Torts (1880), 435. So, in 2 Bl. Com. chap. 80, that standard author, in speaking of animals fera natura, classes fish with deer, pheasants, partridges, etc. So, in Kent, Com. pt. 5, lect. 35, the same classification is made. It is obvious, therefore, that the act in question is in conflict with § 84 of article 3 of the Constitution.

It seems to us also that the act in question, viewed in the light contended for by the state, must be regarded as in violation of another subdivision of § 84 of article 3. Subdivision 11 of that section declares that, "in all other cases where a general law can be made applicable, no special law shall be enacted." It is very clear that this is a case where a general law could have been made applicable. This is conclusively shown by the terms of the 1st section of this very act, which, if it stood alone, would have been a good general law; but when the legislature saw fit, by the provision in the 3d section, to limit its operation to certain specified localities, the act was deprived of its character as a general law, and became a special or local law concerning a subject, and for a purpose expressly forbidden by the Constitution.

There is another view of this case, which, though not mentioned in the argument, may be considered by us, as this is not a case of appeal, but a case in the original jurisdiction of this court; and this view is absolutely conclusive of the defendant's right to a discharge from custody. The Constitution, in § 16 of article 1, forbids the issuing of any warrant for the arrest of any person except upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation. In the case of State v. Wimbush, 9 S. C. N. S. 300, it was held that a warrant issued on a statement of facts not sworn to is unconstitutional, null, and void, and that it was not unlawful to resist an officer attempting to arrest one under an illegal warrant. Now, from the papers accompanying the sheriff's return to the writ of habeas corpus, and referred to in the return, it is manifest that the warrant under which the defendant was arrested was not supported either by oath or affirmation, and the arrest was therefore illegal, and the sheriff had no lawful authority to retain him in custody. For this, if for no other reason, the defendant was clearly entitled to his discharge.

In accordance with these views, an order has heretofore been granted discharging the defendant from custody.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

SUN FIRE OFFICE OF LONDON, Plff. in Err.,

v.
Ida A. CLARK et al.

(53 Ohio St. 414.)

*1. A deed absolute on its face, but shown by a separate written agreement to be a security

*Headnotes by the COURT.

NOTE.—Mortgage as effecting change of title or interest in insured property.

The general rule is that the mere giving of a mortgage does not effect a change of title or interest in the insured property within the meaning of conditions in insurance policies avoiding the policy in case of change of interest or title. The wording of the condition is different in different policies and a slight variation of phraseology has sometimes been sufficient to change the rule.

Insurable interest.

The giving of the mortgage does not terminate the insurable interest of the mortgagor. Buffalo 88 L. R. A.

for the performance of a personal obligation of the grantor to the grantee, is a mortgage.

2. A policy of insurance containing a provision that if any change take place in the title, interest, or possession of the property insured, by sale, transfer, or conveyance, without the consent of the insurer, the policy shall become void, is not invalidated by the making of a mortgage. The words "title" or "possession," as

If an insured mortgages after the insurance is made he nevertheless continues to be interested so as to have a right to recover in case of loss. Gordon v. Massachusetts F. & M. Ins. Co. 2 Pick. 259.

A mortgage of chattels without change of possession will not avoid a policy of insurance. Union Ins. Co. v. Barwick, 36 Neb. 224.

Alienation.

A mortgage is not an alienation.

here used, mean an actual change in law and equity, and the word "interest" means a change in the insurable interest of the owner of the property, neither of which is affected by the execution of a mortgage.

3. Where a policy of insurance stipulates that it shall become void by the taking of additional insurance without the consent of the insurer, such stipulation is not within the provisions of § 3643, Rev. Stat., for the reason that additional insurance does, as a matter of law, increase the risk, and, if taken without the consent of the insurer, invalidates the policy.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Cuyahoga County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Reversed.

A transfer of the estate short of a conveyance of the title is not an alienation of the estate. Masters v. Madison County Mut. Ins. Co. 11 Barb. 624.

A chattel mortgage is not an alienation which will avoid insurance on the property. Rice v. Tower. 1 Gray. 425.

If the policy is to become void in case the property is aliened a chattel mortgage will not avoid it. Sovereign Ins. Co. v. Peters. 12 Can. S. C. 33.

In Abbott v. Hampden Mut. F. Ins. Co. 30 Me. 414, in which the property has been conveyed with a mortgage back, the court says to constitute an alienation it is not necessary that there should be an absolute transfer. If there has been such a disposition of it that any portion has been passed to another the alienation has occurred.

In Farmers' Ins. Co. v. Ashton. 31 Ohio St. 477, the court says it is not necessary for us to consider whether or not a mortgage will avoid the policy under a condition against alienation.

Assignment.

Nor is a mortgage an assignment.

A condition against alienation or assignment does not include a mortgage. Sands v. Standard Ins. Co. 27 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 167, 26 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 113; Smith v. Niagara Dist. Mut. Ins. Co. 38 U. C. Q. B. 575; Wilby v. Standard Ins. Co. 3 Ont. Rep. 115; Bull v. North British Canadian Invest. Co. 14 Ont. Rep. 322.

Title or ownership.

A condition making the policy void if the property is sold or transferred or any change takes place in title or possession is not violated by the giving of a mortgage on the property. Loy v. Home Ins. Co. 24 Minn. 315, 31 Am. Rep. 316.

A stipulation against any change in title or ownership is not violated by a chattel mortgage to one who had an insurable interest in the property when the mortgage was given. Taylor v. Merchants & B. Ins. Co. 33 Iowa. 412.

A policy providing that it should be void in case of any sale, transfer, or change of title, or in case of a voluntary conveyance, is not avoided by giving a mortgage upon the property. Friezen v. Allemania F. Ins. Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 352.

In Hartford Steam Boiler Inspection & Ins. Co. v. Lasher Stocking Co. 66 Vt. 459, which involved the question of liability for premiums, the court held that mortgaging the property does not change or transfer the title so as to make the policy void.

A mortgage is not within a condition against change taking place in the title whether by sale, legal process, judicial decree, or voluntary transfer or conveyance. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Walsh. 54 38 L. R. A.

Statement by Minshall, Ch. J.:

The action below was upon a policy of insurance in the sum of $3,000, made and delivered by the Sun Fire Office of London to Ida A. Clark to indemnify her against loss by fire on her dwelling house, and payable to George W. Pringle as his interest might appear, his interest being that of a mortgagee. The first defense of the answer admitted certain allegations, and then denied all the other averments of the petition. The questions, however, arise upon the second and third defenses in the answer and the issues made thereon. These defenses are as follows:

Second Defense.

"Further answering said petition, defendant for a second defense says that it is one of the express conditions and provisions of the policy of insurance so made by it, and a part thereof, that the same should become void, unless con-

A chattel mortgage is not within a provision against sale or transfer or change of title. Hennessey v. Manhattan F. Ins. Co. 28 Hun, 98.

The headnote in Tallman v. Atlantic F. & M. Ins. Co. 29 How. Pr. 71, states that a chattel mortgage is within a provision against any sale, transfer, or change of title, but it appears from the case that there had been a sale under the mortgage and an absolute change of title before the loss, so that the point as above stated, although raised in the case, was not necessary to its decision, and in fact was not directly decided by the court.

In Canada some of the cases have held that a mortgage was within a condition against change of title.

In Samo v. Gore Dist. Mut. F. Ins. Co. 26 U. C. C. P. 405 (Galt's opinion) the statute made the policy void if there was any change in the title or ownership in the insured property, and it was held that a mortgage not reported to the company would make the policy void under the statute.

A chattel mortgage is a change of title within the meaning of a condition making the policy void in case of change of title in the property. The court says the words "changes of title" must be construed to comprehend any change from the entire unconditional ownership of the assured in the property insured. Citizens' Ins. Co. v. Salterio. 23 Can. S. C. 155, 14 Can. L. T. 360.

But under the statute 36 Vict. chap. 44, § 390, an alienation by way of mortgage will avoid the policy. Mechanics' Bldg. & Sav. Soc. v. Gore Dist. Mut. F. Ins. Co. 3 Ont. App. Rep. 151; Kanady v. Gore Dist. Mut. F. Ins. Co. 44 U. C. Q. B. 261.

Change of interest.

A mortgage is not a change of interest. Lampasas Hotel & P. Co. v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 38 S. W. 361. In that case East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Clarke. 79 Tex. 23, 11 L. R. A. 293, is distinguished, and to some extent criticised.

But the majority of the cases hold otherwise.

A mortgage is within a condition against conveyance of any interest in the property. East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Clarke. 79 Tex. 23, 11 L. R. A. 293.

In Olney v. German Ins. Co. 38 Mich. 94, 13 L. R. 684, there was a condition against encumbrance by mortgage, "or any change in the interest, title, or possession of the property." A chattel mortgage by one of the partners was given on his interest, and the court held that the policy was avoided; but in discussing the question it says the placing of the chattel mortgage by one partner for his in-sent in writing was indorsed thereon by or on behalf of the defendant, if any change took place in the title, interest, location or possession of the property insured (except in case of succession by reason of the death of the insured) whether by sale, transfer, or conveyance, in whole or in part, or by legal process or judicial decree; and defendant alleges that after the making of said policy, and by deed dated November 7, 1889, the plaintiff, Ida A. Clark, conveyed the premises, upon which stood the house by said policy insured, to one Clark A. Rhodes. Her husband, F. W. Clark, joined in said conveyance (which is recorded in vol. 460, page 326, of Cuyahoga County Records) without notice to or consent of this defendant, which was ignorant of the same until after the destruction of said house by fire. By which conveyance said policy became void and of no force and effect."

Third Defense.

"Further answering said petition, defendant, for a third defense says, that it is one of the conditions of the policy of insurance so made by it, and a part thereof, that the same should become void, unless consent in writing was indorsed thereon, by or on behalf of the defendant, if the insured had, or should, after the making of the same, obtain any other policy or agreement for insurance, whether valid or not, on the property in said policy mentioned or any part thereof, and it alleges that on or about the 1st day of December, 1888, the plaintiff, Ida A. Clark, obtained a policy of insurance of the Springfield Fire & Marine Insurance Company on the same house insured by the said policy of defendant, to the amount of $2,000, and on the piano, household furniture, and family wearing apparel while therein contained to the amount of $500, without any dividual benefit upon the partnership chattels works a change of interest therein.

A provision against change of interest is violated by the inclusion of the property in a mortgage thereof through negligence or inattention of the assured. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Barker, 6 Colo. App. 535.

A chattel mortgage is a change affecting the interest of the insured within the meaning of the policy. Salterio v. London F. Ins. Co. 26 N. S. 20.

A chattel mortgage will avoid a policy under a condition making it void if the said property is sold, or interest of the parties therein changed. Torrop v. Imperial F. Ins. Co. 26 Can. S. C. 585.

A condition making the policy void if the interest of the insured in the property should be changed in any manner, whether by act of the parties or by operation of the law, will include the giving of a mortgage upon the property. O'Neill v. Ottawa Agri. Ins. Co. 30 U. C. C. P. 151, 15 Can. L. J. 207.

Sale, alienation, conveyance, transfer, or change of title.

A mortgage is not a sale, alienation, conveyance, transfer, or change of title. Commercial Ins. Co. Spanknebe, 52 Ill. 53, 4 Am. Rep. 582.

Prior to maturity a chattel mortgage will not avoid the policy under a condition against sale, transfer, conveyance, or change in title. Hanover F. Ins. Co. v. Connor, 20 Ill. App. 297.

In Carson v. Jersey City Ins. Co. 43 N. J. L. 300, 39 Am. Rep. 584, the court in argument states that a mortgage is not a violation of a condition against a sale, conveyance, alienation, or change of title.

A mortgage is not a sale, transfer, or change of title. Byers v. Farmers' Ins. Co. 35 Ohio St. 606, 35 Am. Rep. 623.

Sale or otherwise.

In Cowan v. Iowa State Ins. Co. 40 Iowa, 551, 20 Am. Rep. 583, the court, in discussing the effect of a condition against alienation by sale or otherwise, says that nothing less than the transfer of the property insured, whereby the plaintiff would part with all his interest therein, would operate to defeat the policy.

A mortgage is not an alienation by sale or otherwise. But the court intimated that from the decision in Abbott v. Hampden Mut. F. Ins. Co. 30 Me. 414, it would seem that if the provision was that if the property should be alienated in whole or in part a mortgage would violate it. Pollard v. Somerset Mut. F. Ins. Co. 42 Me. 221.

A provision against alienation by sale or otherwise does not include a mortgage. Jackson v. 38 L. R. A.

Massachusetts Mut. F. Ins. Co. 23 Pick. 418; Conover v. Mutual Ins. Co. 8 Denio. 254, 1 N. Y. 290.

In French v. Rogers, 16 N. H. 177, it was questioned whether or not a policy was avoided by execution of a mortgage which provided that if the property is alienated by sale or otherwise the policy should be void.

Alienation in whole or in part.

A mortgage will violate a provision that the policy shall be void if the property or any part thereof shall be alienated, or in case of any change or transfer of title. The mortgage must be regarded as a material change in the interest of the insured. Sossaman v. Pamlico Bkg. & Ins. Co. 78 N. C. 145.

Alteration in ownership or termination of interest.

A mortgage will avoid a policy under a condition that all alienations and alterations in the ownership of the property insured in any material particular shall make void the policy. Edmunds v. Mutual Safety F. Ins. Co. 1 Allen, 811, 79 Am. Dec. 748.

A chattel mortgage is not within conditions against transfer or termination of the interest of the assured by sale or otherwise, or any sale, alienation, transfer, or change of title. Van Deusen v. Charter Oak F. & M. Ins. Co. 1 Robt. 55, 1 Abb. Pr. N. S. 349.

Must be specific provision against encumbrance.

In the absence of a stipulation making it so a mortgage will not defeat the right of the mortgagor to recover on the policy. Dutton v. New England Mut. F. Ins. Co. 29 N. H. 153.

Placing an encumbrance on insured property will not avoid the policy in the absence of a provision avoiding it in case of the placing of a mortgage or other lien upon it. The court said had the insurer intended to provide against encumbrances nothing would have been easier than the insertion of such a clause in the contract by clear and unmistakable language. That this was not done is the best of evidence that it was not the intention of the parties that the policy would be violated by an encumbrance without permission. Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Stewart, 18 Ind. App. 627.

In the absence of any stipulation in the policy in order to avoid it the transfer must be absolute so that no property or interest remains in the insured. If it is in the nature of a mortgage or in trust with a resulting trust in the insured he may recover to the extent of his loss. Lazarus v. Commonwealth Ins. Co. 5 Pick. 76; Rollins v. Columbian Mut. F. Ins. Co. 26 N. H. 300; Folsom v. Belknap County Mut. F. Ins. Co. 30 N. H. 231.

notice to this defendant or its consent thereto, and the loss on said buildings was paid by said insurance company in pursuance of said policy; whereby said policy sued upon herein became and has been ever since, utterly void and of no effect whatever."

To these defenses the plaintiff replied as follows:

First denying the averments of the second defense, she averred: "That at the time mentioned she and her husband mortgaged said property to said Clark A. Rhodes, the instrument being in form only, a deed, and that at the time of said fire said mortgage had not become absolute, nor was the debt secured thereby due and payable. She further avers that she immediately gave notice of such mortgage to said company, both to the agent through whom said policy was issued to the general agent of said defendant in Cleveland, Ohio, and to the company itself, and received from none of these persons or from said defendant any intimation that said policy would be forfeited on account of said mortgage, and on account thereof she did not as she might and would otherwise have done, procure other insurance in place of the policy referred to in said petition.

"Replying to the third defense contained in said answer, this plaintiff says that immediately upon obtaining the policy of insurance mentioned in said third defense, she notified said defendant of said insurance, who consented thereto."

The case was tried to a jury, evidence was offered by both parties upon the issues joined, as appears from a bill of exceptions taken and made a part of the record. At the close of the evidence the court instructed the jury as follows:

And facts cannot be alleged which would prove the conveyance fraudulent for the purpose of restricting the interest of the insured. Carroll v. Boston Marine Ins. Co. 8 Mass. 517.

A mortgage is not a sale or transfer, nor is it a change in title. Judge v. Connecticut F. Ins. Co. 132 Mass. 521. The court says had it been intended to include a mortgage among those changes in title which would avoid the policy, it would seem that they would have been specified in express terms. The mortgagor is still interested to the full value of the property. He makes no such change in title or interest as will be affected by the other transactions mentioned in the policy.

Other conditions.

A chattel mortgage is not an assignment of the policy. Prows v. Ohio Valley Ins. Co. 2 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 14.

The execution of a mortgage is not an increase of risk. Howard F. Ins. Co. v. Bruner, 23 Pa. 50.

But it has been held that whether or not the execution of a mortgage on the property increases the risk is a question for the jury. Collins v. Merchants' & B. Ins. Co. 95 Iowa, 540; Henderson v. Ohio Farmers' Ins. Co. 2 Ohio Dec. 189.

If the policy contains a provision against sale, transfer, or change in title, and mortgaged property is subsequently put into the building, where the risk will attach except for such provision, the mortgage should be deemed a breach of condition, so that the policy will not cover the property so put into the building. Schumitsch v. American Ins. Co. 48 Wis. 25.

Mutual companies.

There seems to be an exception to the general rule in case of mutual companies.

In case of a mutual company alienation by mortgage will render the policy void. Burton v. Gore Dist. Mut. Ins. Co. 14 U. C. Q. B. 342.

Where the insurer is a mutual company and is given a lien on the property insured for assessments on the premium notes, a provision that alienation by sale or otherwise shall render the policy void will include alienation by mortgage, since otherwise the insurer must lose its lien, or the lien must be enforced against an innocent mortgagee. McCulloch v. Indiana Mut. F. Ins. Co. 8 Blackf. 50; Indiana Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Coquillard, 2 Ind. 645.

Absolute conveyance.

As a general rule an absolute deed which is intended as a mortgage will have no more effect upon the insurance than a simple mortgage would.

A policy is not made void by an absolute conveyance. 88 L. R. A.

ance as security for a debt by reason of the clause making it void in case of the termination of the interest of the assured. Holbrook v. American Ins. Co. 1 Curt. C. C. 198.

A condition making the policy void in case of the transfer of the insured property will not apply in case of an absolute transfer which was intended as a mortgage. Ward v. Beck, 18 C. B. N. S. 668, 32 L. J. C. P. N. S. 112, 9 Jur. N. S. 912.

A deed absolute to secure a debt will not avoid a policy under a condition that it should be void if the property is sold or transferred or any change takes place in title or possession. Nussebaum v. Northern Ins. Co. 37 Fed. Rep. 524, 1 L. R. A. 704.

A condition making the policy void in case of any sale, transfer, or change of title in the property is not violated by the giving of an absolute deed for the security of money which contains a defeasance clause upon its face. Virginia F. & M. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Fearin Bros. 62 Ga. 515.

In National Ins. Co. v. Webster, 83 Ill. 470, parol evidence was held admissible to show that an absolute bill of sale was intended as a mortgage, but it would seem that this was for the purpose of showing who was the proper plaintiff in the action, rather than whether or not the policy had been avoided by the transfer.

In Ayres v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 17 Iowa, 176, 85 Am. Dec. 553, two of the three judges sitting held that a transfer to secure debts did not avoid the policy under a condition making it void in case of any sale, transfer, or change of title. But the court was agreed that if the effect of the transfer was to decrease the interest of the insured in the property, as by being for the security of the debts of a third person, the transfer would avoid the policy.

A condition that the policy shall be void if the property is sold is not violated by the giving of a deed absolute in form which is duly recorded if at the same time a defeasance bond is executed, although the bond is never recorded. Bryan v. Traders' Ins. Co. 145 Mass. 389. The court holds that the statute making such a transaction a conveyance as to third parties does not apply, so that the expressions in Foot v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 119 Mass. 259, which tend to hold them to be so, were not necessary to the decision.

A provision in the policy against the termination of the interest of the assured in the property is not violated by a conveyance absolute on its face which is in reality a mortgage. And the fact that the instrument is intended for a mortgage may be shown by parol. Jecko v. St. Louis F. & M. Ins. Co. 7 Mo. App. 808.

An absolute deed intended as a mortgage does not terminate the insurable interest of the mort-

"Under the construction which I have placed upon § 3643, of the Revised Statutes of Ohio, and the pleadings and proof in the case, I deem it my duty to direct the jury to return a verdict for plaintiff for the amount of the policy and interest from March 12, 1890."

Exception was taken to the ruling of the court: a motion was made for a new trial and overruled, and judgment entered on the verdict, which was affirmed by the circuit court. The ruling of the court is assigned for error here.

Messrs. H. C. Ranney and C. W. Fuller, for plaintiff in error:

Even if in the view of the court the conveyance should be merely a mortgage, the authorities support the position that under the peculiar wording of the provision in this policy there would still be a forfeiture of the policy.

Edmonds v. Mutual Safety F. Ins. Co. 1 Allen, 311, 79 Am. Dec. 746; Abbott v. Hampden Mut. F. Ins. Co. 30 Me. 414; May, Ins. § 271; Hitchcock v. North Western Ins. Co. 26 N. Y. 68; Savage v. Howard Ins. Co. 52 N. Y. 502, 11 Am. Rep. 741.

The breach of the condition with reference to additional insurance would, beyond question, under the authorities constitute a good defense to this action.

gagor. Hodges v. Tennessee M. & F. Ins. Co. 8 N. Y. 416.

A deed absolute in form, given to secure a debt, is not a sale or transfer of the property or change of title within the meaning of those words in a condition in an insurance policy. Barry v. Hamburg-Bremen F. Ins. Co. 110 N. Y. 1.

A condition that the interest of the assured must be the entire, unconditional, and sole ownership is not violated by the execution of a bill of sale to secure a debt. Kronk v. Birmingham F. Ins. Co. 91 Pa. 300.

A deed of trust to secure payment of debts is not a sale or change of title. Quarrier v. Ætna F. & M. Ins. Co. 10 W. Va. 507; Nease v. Ætna Ins. Co. 22 W. Va. 283.

An absolute deed with a defeasance which is seasonably recorded is a mortgage and will not defeat a policy under a clause making it void in case of alienation in whole or in part. Smith v. Monmouth Mut. F. Ins. Co. 50 Me. 96.

A deed made as collateral security for a debt which is never created does not avoid a policy under a condition that the policy is to become void if the property is sold or transferred, or if the interest of the assured is other than the entire, unconditional, and sole ownership of the property. New Orleans Ins. Co. v. Gordon, 68 Tex. 144. The court says there is a vast difference between giving a deed and having title to the land. The former is evidence of the latter, but may exist without it.

But where the state statute provides that an absolute conveyance to secure a debt shall be regarded as an absolute conveyance and not as a mortgage it will be within the terms of a condition making the policy void in case the property is sold or the title transferred or changed. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Asberry, 95 Ga. 792.

So, where the defeasance of a deed given to secure a debt is not recorded, and the statutes pro-

The evils which § 3643 was intended to remedy were over insurance, and the dishonesty and fraud attendant upon the gambling nature of such contracts, and nothing was farther from the intention of the legislature than the extension of the language so as to deprive companies of all defenses save two.

Farmers' Ins. Co. v. Wells, 42 Ohio St. 519.

The manifest policy of the statute is to prevent over insurance, and to guard, as far as possible, against carelessness and every inducement to destroy property in order to procure insurance upon it.

The words, "any change increasing the risk," must be restricted to any change in the physical condition and surroundings of the property, and should not be extended so as to include any other possible change in the title, amount of insurance, encumbrance, vacancy, or occupancy, which have hitherto, without question, been valid conditions in the policy.

vided that an absolute conveyance shall not be affected or defeated by an unrecorded defeasance, there will be an alienation within the meaning of a condition in an insurance policy against alienations. Foot v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 119 Mass. 259.

If the policy provides that it shall become void if the property is alienated in whole or in part, and the insured mortgages the property and then transfers his equity of redemption, taking back a defeasance which he neglects to record, although the transfer is recorded, it appearing of record that there has been an alienation, the policy will be void. Tomlinson v. Monmouth Mut. F. Ins. Co. 47 Me. 232.

And a condition making the policy void in case the property shall be sold, will be broken by a conveyance by those holding the equity of redemption to the mortgagee under a parol agreement by him to sell the property and account to them for the proceeds. Dalley v. Westchester F. Ins. Co. 131 Mass. 173.

An alienation is effected by an absolute deed to secure a debt, although it is accompanied by an unsealed agreement to reconvey upon repayment of the amount due. Adams v. Rockingham Mut. F. Ins. Co. 29 Me. 294. The court says the transaction between the parties to the conveyance was not a mortgage of the property, and had not the equitable incidents of a mortgage.

And in Michigan it has been held that a condition against sale, transfer, or change of title is broken by a deed absolute on its face to secure payment of a debt. Western Massachusetts Ins. Co. v. Riker, 10 Mich. 279. The court says if the trust instead of being secret appeared on the face of the conveyance there would still be a change of the title. We think the conveyance would clearly come within the condition of the policy and put an end to the insurance.

Messrs. White, Johnson, & McCaslin, for defendants in error:

The "insurable interest" of the owner of the property mortgaged to secure a debt on which the owner is personally liable extends to the full value of the mortgaged property, and this even though the property is mortgaged to its full value.

The subsequent giving of a mortgage, unaccompanied by possession, does not operate as a change, alteration, or transfer of interest in insured property, within the meaning of a condition in the policy prohibiting change, alteration, or transfer of interest or title.

Nor does it operate as a change, alteration, or transfer of title in the meaning of such a condition in the policy.

In the application of the last two propositions it is immaterial what is the form of the instrument, whether a deed absolute on its face, but shown by parol or written defeasance to be only a mortgage, or a trust deed to secure a debt, or an instrument in form of a mortgage.

In giving construction to any statute, the court must consider its policy, and give it such an interpretation as may appear best calculated to advance its object by effecting the design of the legislature. The great object of the statute in question is clearly expressed in the title prefixed to it.

It is not true that the crying evil had been questions as to the value of the property.

The courts condemn the many conditions and warranties contained in the fine print of the applications and policies, prepared by learned and astute counsel for insurance companies, in such a way as, while seeming to promise indemnity, to in fact deprive the insured of all benefit from the policy.

Queen Ins. Co. v. Leslie, 47 Ohio St. 418, 9 L. R. A. 45.

The object of the act obviously was to remedy an evil with which the people of this state had long believed themselves to be grievously afflicted.

The state of things believed to exist was this: The principal act of precaution was, to guard the company against liability for losses.

Delancey v. Rockingham Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 52 N. H. 581.

The legislature of Missouri conceived that the promises held forth to the assured in the policies in general use were but too often a delusion and a snare, and as the courts were powerless to correct the fraud it had to be corrected by statute.

Minshall, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The first question presented arises on the second defense. The evidence sustained the reply of the plaintiff to the effect that the instrument was simply a mortgage. A separate written instrument was given by Rhodes stating that the conveyance was given to secure the payment of a promissory note to him, by Clark and wife, for $2,000, and his liability for them on an injunction bond; and expressly stipulated that the conveyance "was in the nature of a security" to him for the above purposes. Hence it was simply a mortgage. It seems well settled in this state and elsewhere that the making of a mortgage does not violate a provision in a policy of insurance, that any change in the title, interest, or possession of the assured in the property, without the assent of the insurer, shall avoid the policy. The mortgage, being simply a security for the debt, is extinguished by its payment without any reconveyance. The mortgage of itself does not make the mortgagee a freeholder, and a judgment recovered against him does not become a lien on the land, nor is he liable to the dower rights of his wife. It has none of the incidents of a legal or equitable title. True, upon foreclosure and sale, the mortgagee may by purchase at the sale become the owner of the land; but this is a right he enjoys in common with all others. It is also true that as between the mortgagor and mortgagee the latter, on condition broken, is regarded as the legal, but not as the equitable, owner. The mortgagor remains the equitable owner until the property is sold under the order of the court. Until then he may, by paying the debt, redeem the land. So that his insurable interest in the property remains the same,—which is the interest meant by the use of the word in the language of the policy, where it occurs. If lost by fire he remains liable on the debt, and has, by reason of the loss, so much the less property with which to pay it. Hence he has the same interest in its preservation after as before making the mortgage; and the moral hazard of the insurer is not increased. Byers v. Farmers' Ins. Co., 85 Ohio St. 606, 85 Am. Rep. 628; Kronk v. Birmingham F. Ins. Co., 91 Pa. 800; Royal Ins. Co. v. Stinson, 108 U. S. 25, 29, 26 L. ed. 473, 477; Barry v. Hamburg-Bremen F. Ins. Co., 110 N. Y. 1; Judge v. New York Bovey F. Ins. Co., 182 Mass. 521; Bryan v. Traders' Ins. Co., 145 Mass. 389; Commercial Ins. Co. v. Spankneble, 52 Ill. 58, 4 Am. Rep. 582; Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 25, 7 L. ed. 835; Jecko v. St. Louis F. & M. Ins. Co., 7 Mo. App. 303; Guest v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co., 66 Mich. 98; May, Ins. § 272.

The general current of authority is in accordance with these cases; and while a different view has been taken by the courts of some of the states, it will be found that, as a rule, this has proceeded from the old conception that a mortgage is to be regarded as a conveyance; or from a more rigid adherence to the terms of the policy, in disregard of the rule that provisions imposing forfeitures should be strictly construed.

In giving effect to the language of any instrument, regard must be had to its purpose. A mere change in title, where the owner retains the same actual interest in the property—the same insurable interest—is not within the reason of the language employed. The object of the provision containing the language was to protect the insurer against a possible change in the owner's insurable interest in the property by a sale, transfer, or conveyance, whereby the hazards of the contract into which he had entered might be increased without his consent. Hence the generality of the language employed must be restrained to the reason and object of its use by the parties. To do otherwise would be to stick in the letter of the language employed by the parties to express their meaning, without regard to its spirit. May, Ins. § 273; Ayres v. Hartford F. Ins. Co., 17 Iowa, 176, 185, 35 Am. Dec. 558.

Hence, so far as the second defense is concerned, the undisputed evidence shows that 88 L. R. A.

there was no error in the court directing a verdict for the plaintiff. The execution of the conveyance, being simply a mortgage, did not affect the title or interest of the mortgagor in the property (Barry v. Hamburg-Bremen F. Ins. Co., 110 N. Y. 1), and whether made with or without the consent of the company, is immaterial.

2. The principal question in the case arises upon the third defense—the taking of additional insurance without the consent of the company. There was evidence tending to show that there was no consent; so that the correctness of the ruling cannot be affirmed, unless, as a matter of law, it was immaterial. And this upon a construction given to § 3643, Rev. Stat., is what is claimed. It is not claimed but that before the statute the facts stated would have constituted a defense to any recovery on the policy, but it is claimed that under this statute, the taking of additional insurance without the consent of the company does not avoid the policy, unless it is averred and shown that it increased the risk. The court is of a different opinion, and thinks that the statute has no application to the case. It reads as follows: "Sec. 3643. Any person, company, or association, hereafter insuring any building or structure against loss or damage by fire or lightning, by a renewal of a policy heretofore issued, or otherwise, shall cause such building or structure to be examined by an agent of the insurer, and a full description thereof to be made, and the insurable value thereof to be fixed by such agent; in the absence of any change increasing the risk without the consent of the insurers, and also of intentional fraud on the part of the insured, in case of total loss, the whole amount mentioned in the policy or renewal upon which the insurers receive a premium shall be paid, and in case of a partial loss the full amount of the partial loss shall be paid; and in case there are two or more policies upon the property, each policy shall contribute to the payment of the whole or the partial loss in proportion to the amount of insurance mentioned in each policy; but in no case shall the insurer be required to pay more than the amount mentioned in its policy."

This section has been considered by this court in a number of cases. Queen Ins. Co. v. Leslie, 47 Ohio St. 413, 9 L. R. A. 45; Moody v. Amazon Ins. Co., 52 Ohio St. 12, 26 L. R. A. 313. It is not our purpose to question the soundness of either of these cases, when limited and applied to its facts. A careful reading of the statute will disclose, as we think, a simple purpose on the part of the legislature to limit it to such matters connected with the physical condition of the property—its value, structure, and surroundings—as might have been discovered in the examination required to be made by the agent of the company, on an application by the owner for insurance, and not to include or extend to things that would require an examination of records, or anything else outside of the physical condition and situation of the property; certainly not, to a knowledge of things that then had no existence, and could not be divined from anything the examination required to be made by the agent, might disclose. As stated in the syllabus of Queen Ins. Co. v.

Leatie, it is "a condition or situation of the property at the time of the insurance, which the examination the agent is required by the statute to make should have reasonably discovered," that will not defeat a recovery on the policy. In other words, no exception can be taken by the company to anything within the purview of the examination, after issuing the policy; and if any change takes place in the condition of the property, increasing the risk, it must be set up as a defense by the company.

The construction claimed for the statute by the defendant in error is placed upon the generality of the words in the clause of the statute following that which directs the making of an examination by the agent of the company. This examination relates only to the physical condition of the property, and, therefore, by the ordinary rules of construction, the general language immediately following should be limited to a change in such things as come within the purpose of the examination. So interpreted, they can mean no more than that, in the absence of any change in the physical condition of the property increasing the risk, the full amount of the insurance shall be paid in case of a total loss. If it had been intended to enlarge the meaning so as to embrace other matters made material by the terms of the policy, more apt words could, and, as we think, would, have been used. The language would have been so introduced as not to be naturally restrained by the context to a more limited meaning. Confining the meaning of the language "in the absence of any change increasing the risk" to what precedes, gives effect to all that is claimed as the purpose of the legislature in enacting the statute,—the prevention of the evils connected with over insurance, by making companies liable for the full amount insured, after issuing a policy therefor and receiving premiums proportioned to the valuation of the property, made by their agents on an examination of the premises.

As confirming this view as to the construction of the statute, it is difficult to see how an issue of fact could be taken and tried on the question whether the taking of additional insurance in a given case did or did not increase the risk. The fact must generally be the same in all cases, and therefore becomes a question of law, and cannot be changed by averment. Its importance to the insurer, and the reason for the insertion of a stipulation against additional insurance without his consent, is, doubtless, based upon the generally observed fact, that the care of an owner for the preservation of his property is in direct proportion to his interest in it. Therefore, an insurer having stipulated for protection against a lessening of the owner's interest in the property insured, without his consent, may be, in a particular case, be deprived of the benefit of the stipulation by an averment that the plaintiff differs from men in general, and would take the same care of his property whether his interest in it is much or little? Without stopping to inquire whether the legislature might establish such a ground of defense, the absurdity of such an issue is good reason for saying that such an intention cannot be inferred from the mere generality of the words used in this section of the statutes. It would involve an inquiry somewhat novel in courts. The reception of evidence to prove that a man is as good as his fellows in general is not unusual, but to prove that he is better and more to be trusted is seldom, if ever, gone into. It would be difficult, if not impossible, for a jury to return a verdict after the most exhaustive inquiry. As a rule, selfishness is at the bottom of all human conduct. If you would know what a man would be likely to do in a given case, learn what it is to his interest to do. In the absence of any interest, he is likely to do nothing.

The conclusions reached do not trench upon what was decided in either of the preceding cases. In Queen Ins. Co. v. Leatie the answer averred that the property was unoccupied at the issuing of the policy, which was contrary to the representation of the insured. The fact that it was vacant could readily have been discovered by an examination; and the court held that there was no fraud in the representation if made; for if the examination required by the statute had been made, the fact that it was not occupied would have appeared. In Moody v. Amazon Ins. Co. it was averred that the property became vacant after the issuance of the policy without the consent of the company, but the answer did not aver that it increased the risk. Occupancy in any case may be determined by an examination of the property. It is a physical fact open to view; and so within the general language of the statute when restrained to the meaning disclosed by its context. A change in this regard does not, by the statute, invalidate the policy unless it increase the risk, which must be averred, and proved if denied. This is what, as we understand it, was decided on the subject before us, in the case just referred to.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

F. J. KIMBALL et al., Receivers of the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, Pliffs.

v.
George L. CARTER.

(.....Va.....)

1. An exception to a question which subjects the court to the unnecessary labor and danger of mistake by being required to search through a record to ascertain the facts that ought to be embodied in the exception itself will not be considered.
2. An exception to a question will not be considered when the answer is not given.
3. Inclosed lands within the meaning of a statute requiring a railroad to fence its right of way through inclosed lands are those surrounded by a fence, hedge, ditch, wall, or any line of obstacle interposed so as to part off and shut in the land and set it off as private property.
4. The inclosure of lands leased by a lessee from different parties is sufficient to make them inclosed lands while in his possession within the meaning of a statute requiring a railroad through them to be fenced, if the entire tract in his possession is inclosed, although separate parcels are not divided by fences.
5. The inclosure of lands need not be by continuous and lawful fence at all times sufficient to prevent stock passing through it in order to constitute them inclosed lands within the meaning of a statute requiring a railroad right of way to be fenced through such lands.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wythe County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's cattle. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bolling & Stanley for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Waller S. Poage, for defendant in error:

The place of entry, and not the place of killing, is the test by which plaintiff's right to recover is tried.

Thornton, Railroad Fences, pp. 215, 382, and cases cited; 3 Wood, Railway Laws, p. 1559, and note.

On the questions of fact involved in the case, the jury decided against the defendants, and as the evidence is certified, the case comes here as on a demurrer to the evidence.

See Code, § 8484.

The jury found that the lands were inclosed lands. They found that the defendants had failed to construct a fence as required by law, and they found the cattle came on the track at a place where the defendants were required by law to fence.

NOTE.—On the question what constitutes inclosed lands within the meaning of a statute requiring a railroad through them to be fenced, there does not seem to be much authority prior to this case.

Keith, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

George L. Carter brought an action of trespass on the case in the circuit court of Wythe county against Kimball and Fink, receivers of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, to recover damages for the negligent killing by the railroad company of fourteen cattle in October, 1895.

The case was tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, assessing his damages at $572.55, upon which the court rendered judgment. To certain rulings of the court during the progress of the trial the defendants tendered bills of exceptions, and obtained a writ of error from one of the judges of this court.

The negligence alleged by the plaintiff for which he seeks to hold defendants responsible is the failure of the railroad company to fence its track as required by law to do where it runs through inclosed lands.

The plaintiff is the lessee of several tracts of land lying contiguous to each other, owned by the Max Meadows Land & Improvement Company, J. G. Kent, John P. Sheffey, and the Misses Sayers. Through a portion of the land rented from John P. Sheffey the line of the Norfolk & Western Railway passes at the point where the accident occurred. To the south of the line of railway, and between it and Reed creek, there is a field of about 20 acres, which had been planted in corn, and was prepared to be seeded in wheat. Reed creek, at this point, constitutes the boundary between the lands leased by the plaintiff from Sheffey and those belonging to Joe Kent, of which he was also the lessee. Upon the western boundary of the Sheffey line the farm of Christopher Holston was separated from it by a fence, shown by the evidence to be in a dilapidated condition. In the angle formed by this line of fence and the line of railway the plaintiff had constructed, partly upon the land leased by him of Sheffey and in part upon the land of the railway company, stock pens, in which he had placed 300 head of cattle. During the night they broke down the pen, wandered upon the railway, and fourteen of them were killed by one of the trains of the defendant company.

During the progress of the trial counsel for the plaintiff asked the following question of the plaintiff, who was testifying in his own behalf: "Please explain to the jury the condition of that embankment where the fence runs down to the creek, as to the height of it at the Holston line." This question, as stated in the exception, will be found at page 34 of the evidence. It is in fact at page 37, and marginal page 39.

Of the witness J. G. Kent the following question is asked: "You have been grazing this land for a long time, and attending these lands for a long, long time. Haven't the fences on the farm ordinarily been sufficient to restrain stock?" This question is stated to be at page 70. It is in fact at page 60, and marginal page 75.

Of the witness Dobbins the following question was asked: "State to the jury, please, whether or not you, as the manager for Mr. Carter, and his overseer, have kept the wire and cattle guards in there as far as you could." Stated to be at page 174 of the record, but in fact at top page 125, and marginal page 179.

The court certifies that all of the foregoing questions were asked, and that the answers to the same will be found in the record, and that exception to each of said questions was noted at the time.

After much difficulty, these questions were found in the record, not one of them at the place indicated in the exceptions, and the answer to no one of them in point of fact given. The exceptions, therefore, to these questions, will not be considered. First, because the exceptions are not taken in the proper form. This court has heretofore said, and repeats, that it will not be subjected to the unnecessary labor and the danger of mistake by being required to search through a record in order to ascertain facts that ought to be embodied in the exception itself. See Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Shott, 92 Va. 34; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Ampey, 93 Va. 108.

In the second place, the exception here stated would, in no event, be considered, because, while the question is objected to, the answer is not given, so as to enable the court to pass upon its relevancy and value. Gray's Case, 92 Va. 772; Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Pollard (Va.) 36 L. R. A. 271; and Childress v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (Va.) 26 S. E. 424.

The plaintiff asked for the following instructions:

"No. 1. The court instructs the jury that if they shall believe from the evidence that the cattle of the plaintiff were killed or injured on the railroad of the defendants, operated by them as receivers, by the engine and cars of the said defendants, in charge of their servants, agents, and employees, as charged in the declaration, and shall further believe from the evidence that the said cattle were killed or injured by the defendants, their servants, agents, and employees, at a point on the said railroad on which said railroad passes through the lands leased by the plaintiff from John P. Sheffey, and shall further believe from the evidence that the said lands were inclosed lands, and shall further believe from the evidence that the defendants, their servants, agents, and employees, had failed to fence its right of way or roadbed through the said inclosed lands so leased by the plaintiff at the place of said injury,—then the court instructs the jury that they shall find for the plaintiff, and assess his damages at such sum as to the jury shall seem right and proper, based on the evidence as to the value of said stock at the time the same were killed or injured.

"No. 2. The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the lands of the plaintiff, at the point where the cattle mentioned in the declaration were killed or injured, were cleared agricultural or farming or grazing lands, and were used as such at the time, and were so inclosed as to be reasonably safe for the purposes of such use, then the said lands were inclosed lands, within the meaning of the law requiring the defendant company to fence its roadbed which ran through such lands."

And the defendants asked for the following instructions:

"No. 1. The court instructs the jury that, although they may believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's lands were inclosed, and that it was the duty of the defendants to fence their track through said land, under the statute, yet, if the jury further believe that the cattle which were killed or injured came upon the track of the defendants' railroad, at a point where the plaintiff has a private crossing over and across said railroad, and were struck and killed or injured by the defendants' engine on said crossing, the defendant company, under the statute, could not obstruct the said private crossing by fencing across the same, and are not liable for stock killed or injured in consequence of coming on the track at such private crossing.

"No. 2. The court further instructs the jury that under the statute the defendant company is not bound to fence its track unless the lands through which it runs are inclosed by a continuous and lawful fence running up to the line of the right of way of the defendant company, and if they believe from the evidence that there was not such a continuous and unbroken line of fence sufficient to prevent stock passing through it, then the company was not bound to fence at this point, and they will find for the defendant.

"No. 3. The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that there was on the south side of the defendants' railway, and on each side of the private crossing near Cove creek bridge, a ditch sufficient to prevent the passage of live stock, that then the said defendant was not required to fence its roadbed at said point, and they will find for the defendant.

"No. 4. The court further instructs the jury that the plaintiff cannot claim the line of Reed creek as a lawful fence, so as to relieve him of the duty to inclose his land, since the said creek has never been declared by the legislature of Virginia a lawful fence.

"No. 5. The court instructs the jury that the statute requiring railroads to fence their roadbed applies only to the individual land-owners along its road, where their lands have been properly inclosed; and if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the lands of the plaintiff were not inclosed, but that the inclosure sought to be set up in this case was made by means of the fences surrounding the lands of the Misses A. and E. Savers, the Max Meadows Land & Imp. Co., J. G. Kent, J. P. Sheffey, and Mrs. Holton, and others, then, that this inclosure, if there was one, is not sufficient, and they will find for the defendant."

Whereupon the court gave instructions Nos. 1 and 2 asked for by the plaintiff, and instruction No. 1 asked for by the defendants, but refused to give defendants' instructions Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5, and to this action of the court the defendants excepted.

While the exception is in terms directed to both of the instructions asked for the plaintiff, the argument of counsel for the plaintiff in error was addressed chiefly, if not altogether, to point out objections to instruction No. 2. Indeed, instruction No. 1 seems to be wholly free from objection as a proposition of law, and there is evidence in the record tending to prove each of the facts hypothetically stated in it, and upon which it is predicated.

The plaintiff's instruction No. 2 merits more careful consideration. It says to the jury "that if they believe from the evidence that the lands of the plaintiff, at the point where the cattle were killed, were cleared agricultural or farming or grazing lands, were used as such at the time, and were so inclosed as to be reasonably safe for the purposes of such use, then the said lands were inclosed lands, within the meaning of the law requiring the defendant company to fence its roadbed which ran through such lands." As has already been said, the defendant in error was the lessee of several tracts of land. The accident occurred upon the tract leased by him of J. P. Sheffey; and the defendant in error, in his testimony, states unequivocally that it was inclosed land, and it is conceded that the right of way of the railroad company was not fenced. He states that "the lands are inclosed in two or three ways from different points. It so happens that I have about 500 acres of land which lies in a body, and makes one inclosure from a point more than a mile east from where the wreck occurred. You strike a cattle guard and a line fence between myself and J. C. and J. R. McGavock and the Max Meadows Land Company and others.

Q. That is east, isn't it?

A. Yes, sir. From that point you go around the entire boundary back to the Holston line; and cross this point, the Holston line, west of the cattle pen.

Q. Do you go around the Sheffey farm?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is the Sheffey farm divided into fields for agricultural and grazing purposes?

A. At this point there is one fence a short distance west of the point where the cattle were first struck, running north, dividing what we call the 'large meadow' from the upper meadow, or small meadow.

Q. These lands are all fenced in, aren't they?

A. Yes, sir.

The plaintiffs in error sought, by cross-examination and otherwise, to show that the lands were not inclosed, because the division line between the Sheffey land and the adjoining tract, belonging to Christopher Holston, was in a dilapidated condition, a few panels of the fence having been washed away some months before the accident occurred. The field upon the Sheffey farm at the point of the accident had been cultivated in corn, and had been sown, or was about to be seeded, in wheat. The adjoining field upon the Holston farm was in a similar condition, and therefore the fence which had been carried away by high water had not as yet been restored, there being no present occasion for it. It also appears in evidence that there is no fence along a part of Reed creek where it separates the Sheffey and Kent lands, but, as the creek runs through a channel 6 or 8 feet deep, its banks are relied upon as a sufficient protection to crops and to stock; and it is to be borne in mind that the Kent land is contiguous to the Sheffey tract, and forms, together with it, an unbroken boundary of land, all of which is in the possession of the defendant in error as the lessee of its owners.

Were these lands inclosed, within the meaning of the statute? The term "inclosed lands" is to be interpreted in accordance with the common and ordinary definition of the words used, there being nothing whatever to indicate that they were otherwise employed.

Webster defines "enclosed" or "inclosed," applied to lands, as "separate from common grounds by a fence," citing Blackstone.

Worcester defines it: "To part off or shut in by a fence; to set off as private property,"—citing London Enc.

A fence is defined to be "an inclosure about a field or other space, or about any object; especially an inclosing structure of wood, iron, or other material, intended to prevent intrusion from without or straying from within." Webster, Dict.

"A line of obstacle, as a frame of wood, a wall, hedge, or ditch interposed between two portions of land for the purpose of preventing cattle from going astray, or for protecting a field or property from unlawful encroachment." Worcester, Dict.

The supreme court of Vermont, in Porter v. Aldrich, 89 Vt. 326 (cited in 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, at page 639), says: "The word 'inclosure' imports land inclosed with something more than the imaginary boundary-line; that there should be some visible or tangible obstruction, such as a fence, hedge, ditch, or something equivalent, for the protection of the premises against encroachment by cattle."

And in Biggerstaff v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 60 Mo. 567, it is said: "Where a statute requires railroad companies to fence their tracks along 'inclosed or cultivated fields,' it is not necessary that, in order to be entitled to this protection, the inclosure of the fields should be by lawful fences."

This meaning was adopted in Taylor v. Welbey, 36 Wis. 42, cited in 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 638.

Inclosed lands, therefore, are lands surrounded by a fence; and a fence is a visible or tangible obstruction which may be a hedge, ditch, wall, or a frame of wood, or any line of obstacle interposed between two portions of land so as to part off and shut in the land, and set it off as private property.

If the definition here given of "inclosed lands" is sound,—and it seems to be amply supported by lexicographers and law writers, as well as by adjudged cases,—then instruction No. 2 was as favorable to the plaintiffs in error as they had a right to expect.

The foregoing observations sufficiently dispose of instruction No. 2 asked for by plaintiffs in error.

Instruction No. 1 asked for by plaintiffs in error was granted.

Instruction No. 3 is in the teeth of the statute. The court was asked to say to the jury that the presence of a ditch on each side of the private crossing near Cove creek bridge sufficient to prevent the passage of live stock excused the plaintiffs in error from the duty of erecting a fence as required by §§ 1258 and 1259 of the Code. It may, perhaps, be that the ditch, so far as it extends, if sufficient to prevent the passage of stock, would excuse the plaintiffs in error from the duty of erecting a fence along the space protected by it, but there is no pretense that the right of way was ditched along its entire length through the field in question. The purpose of the statute, among others, is to preclude just such controversies as this instruction invites as to the particular point of entry upon the track by requiring the entire right of way to be fenced throughout the inclosure through which it passes. It might be conceded that the defendants were at the precise point designated in the instruction, within one of the exceptions enumerated in § 1259, and yet the conclusion would not follow that the jury should find for the defendants.

Instruction No. 4 was properly refused, because there was no claim advanced that Reed creek was a lawful fence, nor any duty imposed upon the defendant in error to inclose any part of his lands by a lawful fence.

The fifth instruction asked for by the plaintiffs in error is that, if the jury shall believe that the inclosure relied upon by the defendant in error was by means of fencing surrounding the lands leased by him of several owners, such inclosure would be insufficient. The defendant in error was, as we have said, the lessee of several tracts of land constituting one compact boundary, the whole of which was in his occupancy and enjoyment for grazing and agricultural purposes. When his leases terminate, the condition of the fences dividing the several tracts, or separating the tracts into fields, may become a question between the defendant in error and his lessors; but if, in the enjoyment and cultivation of these lands during the term for which he has rented them, the defendant in error should find it to his advantage to increase or diminish, to change or alter, the fields and inclosures, we do not perceive that it is a matter which at all concerns the plaintiffs in error. So long as the lands in the possession of Carter come substantially within the description of "inclosed lands," as those words are used in the statute, so long it remains the duty of the railroad company to fence its right of way where it passes through these lands.

We are therefore of opinion that there is no error in the action of the court in granting the instructions that it gave and in refusing those which it rejected.

There was a motion to set aside the verdict as contrary to the evidence. In discussing the assignments of error with respect to the instructions, we have seen that there is evidence proving the killing of the stock of the defendant in error; that the right of way of the railroad company passes through the inclosed lands of the defendant in error, but that this right of way was not fenced as the law requires; and the presence of these facts is sufficient to support the verdict of the jury, no question being raised as to the amount of damages.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that there is no error to the prejudice of the plaintiffs in error, and the judgment of the Circuit Court of Wythe County is affirmed.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

M. DOBBINS, Plff. in Err.,
v.

MISSOURI, KANSAS, & TEXAS RAIL-WAY COMPANY of Texas.

(.....Tex.....)

1. The common law imposes no duty upon the owner to use care to keep his property in such condition that persons, even if children of tender years, going thereon without his invitation may not be injured.

2. Railroad companies are not charged with the duty of preventing the accumulation of water on their rights of way by Rev. Stat. 1895, art. 4436, providing that in no case shall any railroad company construct a roadbed without first constructing the necessary culverts or sluices, as the natural lay of the land requires, for necessary drainage thereof.

3. The rule imposing upon the owners the duty not to permit any dangerous excavation to remain on his land so near a street or highway as to endanger persons who may accidentally stray from the same does not apply where one approaches the excavation from another route.

4. The maintenance of an excavation so near a path designed for the use of persons going to and from a railroad-station platform on business as to be dangerous to one straying from the same does not render the company liable for the death of a child who falls into it while playing along the path.

The principle applied in what are known as the Turntable or Dangerous Machine Cases is a most exceptional rule of law, most hesitatingly announced in the early case of *Stout v. Sioux City & P. Can the pool of water in question, as an attractive and alluring object for children, be held dangerous within the rule announced in the Turntable Cases?

As a matter of law the exceptional rule, as affecting the dominion of one over property and usage thereof, in such cases as this, is confined to dangerous machinery, and should not be extended so as to embrace objects not from their nature reasonably likely to produce serious results.

It was error for the court to charge the jury what omission would constitute negligence, whether "to drain the water hole" or "to keep children out" of it.

Denman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Prior to the construction of the roadbed of defendant in error there was, several hundred yards north of the point where Letot station is now situated, a depression from the east to the west which carried off storm water from the surrounding lands. Said roadbed having been constructed north and south across this depression without the necessary culverts and sluices to carry off such water, it was, in its course westward, diverted by the roadbed, and compelled to run south in the excavation made on the right of way on the east side of the track in building the road. In its course it passed along by the section house, thence on by the plank platform provided by the company for the reception and discharge of passengers and freight at said station, cutting a ditch several feet deep, and forming within 2 or 3 feet of the platform a pool of water several feet deep. From this platform a path led to a store and postoffice across the ditch, which was crossed, within 10 feet of said pool of water, on some plank placed there by the company, such pathway being generally used by persons going to and from the platform. There were several houses near the pool, one of which was the company's section house, about 200 feet therefrom, to which plaintiff, Dobbins, lived. The ditch above described ran between this section house and the track, and there was another running on the other side of the house, the two ditches uniting before reaching the pool. Plaintiff's child, less than three years old, escaped alone from the section house under circumstances warranting a finding by the jury that neither he nor his wife was guilty of negligence, and a short time thereafter was found drowned in the pool. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff for damages resulting from the death of the child the company appealed to the court of civil appeals, where the judgment of the trial court was reversed, and the cause remanded, on the ground that there was "no phase of the evidence which justified a verdict for the plaintiff, and the court should have so instructed the jury." Plaintiff has brought the cause to this court upon writ of error complaining of said holding of the court of civil appeals, and alleging, in order to give jurisdiction to this court, "that the judgment of the court of civil appeals reversing the judgment of the district court herein practically settles the case, and petitioner's attorneys here and now state that the decision of the court of civil appeals practically settles the case, and petitioner further says that no proof other than that made on the trial of this cause in the district court can be produced upon another trial, and that no different evidence nor better evidence can be produced on another trial of this case than was produced on the trial in the district court." In addition to the facts above stated there was evidence from which the jury could have found that the pool at its nearest point was not over 2 feet from the path; that there was thickly settled neighborhood around the station; that the pool was attractive and dangerous to little children of the age of deceased; that such children, including deceased, had before often played around same; that no precautions were taken by the company to prevent such children from getting into it; that the company was sometime before the accident informed of such facts, and requested by plaintiff to remove the pool, which was not done. There is no evidence in the record from which the jury could have concluded that the child was or had been traveling or attempting to travel said path at or just before it got into the pool. There is no evidence of any passway from the section house, nor is there any evidence tending to show by what route the child reached the pool. There is no evidence that said path was used or intended to be used by anyone other than those going to and from the platform upon business in some way connected with the company.

The common law imposes no duty upon the owner to use care to keep his property in such condition that persons going thereon without his invitation may not be injured. In considering the question as to whether a duty exists, there is no distinction between a case where an infant is injured and one where the injury is to an adult, though where the duty is imposed the law may exact more vigilance in its discharge as to the former. If there be no duty, the question of negligence is not reached, for negligence can in law only be predicated upon a failure to use the degree of care required of one by law in the discharge of a duty imposed thereby. Since the common law imposes no duty on the railroad to use care to keep its right of way in such condition that persons going thereon without its invitation may not be injured, and since there is no evidence in the record from which the jury could have found such an invitation to the child, it was no more liable in law for its death than would have been a neighbor had it wandered into his uninclosed lands and been drowned in his tank or creek, or been killed by falling down his precipice. Since the principles above stated have been so fully and ably discussed heretofore by many learned jurists, we deem it unnecessary to undertake to elaborate them, but will content ourselves by referring to the opinion of the court of civil appeals and the following cases decided upon similar facts: Hargreaves v. Deacon, 25 Mich. 1; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Edwards (Tex. Sup.) 32 L. R. A. 825; Moran v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 134 Mo. 641, 33 L. R. A. 755; Charlebois v. Gogebic & M. R. R. Co. 91 Mich. 59; Clark v. Manchester, 62 N. H. 577; Greene v. Linton, 7 Misc. 272; Murphy v. Brooklyn, 118 N. Y. 575; Witte v. Stifel, 126 Mo. 295; Gulligan v. Melanconet Mfg. Co. 143 Mass. 527; O'Connor v. Illinois C. R. Co. 44 La. Ann. 389; Richards v. Connell, 45 Neb. 467; Benson v. Baltimore Truclion Co. 77 Md. 535, 20 L. R. A. 714; Sterger v. Van Sicklen, 132 N. Y. 499, 16 L. R. A. 640; Frost v. Eastern R. Co. 64 N. H. 220; Kilr v. Nieman, 63 Wis. 271, 60 Am. Rep. 854; Galveston Oil Co. v. Morton, 70 Tex. 400; Clark v. Rich- 38 L. R. A.

mond, 83 Va. 355; Ratte v. Dawson, 50 Minn. 450; Indianapolis v. Enmelman, 108 Ind. 630, 58 Am. Rep. 65.

We are aware that there are cases asserting a contrary doctrine, but do not think they are based upon sound principle. They rest mainly upon Stour City & P. R. Co. v. Stout (1873) 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745, and cases following same, known as the "Turntable Cases." In the Stout Case there were three questions to be determined: (1) Did the law impose upon the company a duty to use care to keep its property in such condition that persons going thereon without its invitation would not be injured? (2) Was the child, six years old, guilty of contributory negligence? And (3) Was the company guilty of negligence in leaving the turntable unlocked? The first and most important question, without an affirmative answer to which the third could not arise, was not even referred to, and, if we may judge from the opinion, that learned court's attention was not called to its presence in the case; the second was admitted by the railroad in favor of plaintiff; and the third, if the first were determined in the affirmative, was clearly a disputed question of fact, which the court correctly held was settled by the verdict. The main force of the opinion is spent upon this third question in attempting to show that the evidence was of such a character that the jury were justified in finding that the company had not used such care in guarding the turntable as a reasonably prudent person would have done under similar circumstances. There could have been no doubt upon this question. The opinion of the court would have been much more satisfactory if it had undertaken to establish instead of assuming the affirmative of the first question. If a child go uninvited upon a neighbor's property, and be drowned in his tank, creek, or river, or fall off his fence, woodpile, haystack, or precipice, or is injured while playing with his cane mill or corn sheller, and the courts assume the affirmative of the first question above stated, as was done in the Stout Case, the jury would in most cases be warranted in finding that the neighbor had not used reasonable care to so guard his tank, etc., or lock his cane mill or corn sheller, as to avoid such injury. Under this new doctrine the question as to whether the tank, etc., or the cane mill, etc., was attractive and dangerous to the child would be for the jury, and they could as truthfully say it was as they could of the turntable; for our common experience, as well as the reported cases, demonstrate that a great many more children lose their lives by such means than upon turntables. This logical extension, or rather application, of the doctrine of the Stout Case has recently found expression in the case of Pekin v. McMahon, 154 Ill. 141, 27 L. R. A. 206, where a verdict and judgment holding the owner of a lot in the city, upon which there was a pool of water, liable for the death of a boy who went there uninvited, and was drowned, was upheld, the court, after assuming the existence of the duty, as was done in the Stout Case, saying: "The question whether a defendant has or has not been guilty of negligence in case of such an accident upon his land to a child of tender years is for the jury. Involved in this question is the further question whether or not the premises were sufficiently attractive to entice children into danger, and to suggest to the defendant the probability of the occurrence of such accident; and therefore such further question is also a matter to be determined by the jury. Mackey v. Picksburg, 64 Miss. 777; Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745. The subject of the attractiveness of the premises was submitted to the jury by the instructions given for the plaintiff in the case at bar." See also Standal v. Boyd (Minn. 1897) 69 N. W. 899, affirming such a judgment without discussion on authority of the Turntable Cases; Bransom v. Labrot, 81 Ky. 638, 50 Am. Rep. 193; Brinkley Car-Works & Mfg. Co. v. Cooper, 60 Ark. 545. The difficulty about these cases is that they either impose upon owners of property a duty not before imposed by law, or they leave to a jury to find legal negligence in cases where there is no legal duty to exercise care. In these cases the courts, yielding to the hardships of individual instances where owners have been guilty of moral, though not legal, wrongs, in permitting attractive and dangerous turntables and water holes to remain unguarded on their premises in populous cities, to the destruction of little children, have passed beyond the safe and ancient landmarks of the common law and assumed legislative functions imposing a duty where none existed. As a police measure, the lawmaking power may, and doubtless should, without unduly interfering with or burdening private ownership of land, compel the inclosure of pools, etc., situated on private property in such close proximity to thickly settled places as to be unusually attractive and dangerous, and impose criminal and civil liability, or both, for failure to comply with the requirements of such law. When such a duty is imposed, the courts may properly enforce it, or allow damages for its breach, but not before.

We do not wish to be understood as holding that one is not liable for injuries to persons going onto his land uninvited, when such injuries are intentionally inflicted; e. g., where a pit is sunk, or a gun is set on one's land to injure trespassers. In such cases the liability is based upon the breach of the duty imposed by law not to intentionally injure even a trespasser; and such intent may be evidenced by circumstances, as where one secretly digs a pit across a pathway over his land where he has reason to believe another will pass at night. In such cases the liability is not based upon the assumption that the owner owes a duty to the uninvited persons to keep his premises reasonably safe, but upon the fact that he owes a duty to such person not to intentionally injure him. The failure to observe this distinction has led to much confusion. But plaintiff in error contends that article 4486, Rev. Stat. 1895, which reads as follows: "In no case shall any railroad company construct a roadbed without first constructing the necessary culverts or sluices, as the natural lay of the land requires, for the necessary drainage thereof,"—imposed upon the company the duty of preventing the accumulation of water on its right of way. The object of this statute was to prevent the railroad from unnecessarily interfering with the natural drainage of the land on either side of its right of way. The words "for the necessary drainage thereof" express the purpose of the statute, and "thereof" refers to "land." It was not intended to compel the railroad to so leave and maintain the excavations made from time to time on its right of way in such condition as to prevent the accumulation of water therein. While such a requirement might be just in some places, it would be so very burdensome when applied to all portions of the road, that this statute was evidently intended that courts should not construe it as imposing the duty contended for by plaintiff in error in the absence of language plainly expressing such intention on the part of the lawmaking power. We do not regard Rosenthal v. Taylor, B. & H. R. Co. 79 Tex. 325, as in conflict with the construction here given to the statute. There the water was backed up onto the adjoining land, and was allowed to remain until it became stagnant and offensive. The condition of the water was a nuisance interfering with Rosenthal in the enjoyment of his property, and the company would have been liable at common law for that reason if the water had been confined to its right of way. The fact that the company so constructed its roadbed as to violate the statute by backing the water over the adjoining land aggravated and increased the nuisance, for even pure water thus backed upon his lots became a nuisance.

The case before us is not within the rule of law imposing upon the owner the duty not to permit any dangerous excavation to remain on his own land so near a street or highway as to injure persons who, while attempting to follow same, may by mishap fall therein, because (1) there is no evidence tending to show that the child was at the time of the accident traveling or attempting to travel the path, and such duty is not imposed as to persons who approach the excavation by any other route; and (2) the path not being a public road, but merely for the use of persons going to and from the platform on business connected in some way with the company, the invitation to use it would probably not apply to the child in this case, and therefore the law did not impose the duty above mentioned on the railroad as to it; such duty being imposed only as to persons thus invited to use the path.

Being of opinion that the court of civil appeals did not err in reversing and remanding the cause on the ground above stated, it becomes our duty under the statute to here enter judgment that plaintiff in error take nothing by his suit, which is accordingly done.

STATE of Georgia.

There is no law in force in this state which makes it incumbent upon a judge of the superior court, at the time when judgment is to be entered, or after it has been entered, to allow or order a judicial investigation concerning the mental condition of one against whom a lawful verdict of guilty has been rendered in a capital case, and who has thereby become subject to the penalty of death; nor in

The inquiry into the guilt of a person accused of crime must be postponed where he is insane, until such time as he shall be able to properly model his defense. Frith's Case, 22 How. St. Tr. 807.

If insanity is deemed to exist at the time of the arraignment of a person accused of crime counsel should then make the objection, and if sustained the person should be excused from pleading and the proceeding should await his recovery. State v. Reed, 41 La. Ann. 581.

And when a person accused of crime is called upon to plead, if there are circumstances that suggest that he is not in the possession of his reason there should be an inquiry made touching his sanity at that time, as to whether he is in a situation of mind to state what the grounds of defense are. Frith's Case, 22 How. St. Tr. 811.

And if it is found that he fails to plead by the act of God the court will not proceed to try him. Com. v. Braley, 1 Mass. 108.

The rule generally stated is that no person in a state of insanity should be tried, sentenced, or executed for an alleged criminal act. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 218; State v. Reed, 41 La. Ann. 581. And see Taffe v. State, 23 Ark. 34; State v. Peacock, 50 N. J. L. 84; United States v. Lancaster, 7 Biss. 440; and Kinloch's Case, 18 How. St. Tr. 385, infra.

And when a defendant in a criminal case is called for trial or brought up for judgment, if there is any reason to suspect that he is insane the question must be submitted to the jury either of the regular panel or of another to be summoned for that purpose. People v. Farrell, 81 Cal. 578; Ley's Case, 1 Lewin, C. C. 220.

The reason why an insane person should not be tried is that he is disabled by the act of God to make a just defense if he has one. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 218.

either instance is a refusal by such judge to enter upon an investigation of this kind, with or without the aid of a jury, a denial to the prisoner of "due process of law."

ERROR to the Superior Court for Twiggs County to review a judgment refusing to examine into the insanity of Elizabeth Nobles who had been convicted of murder. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

criminal proceeding in his court, not yet closed, a proceeding for the determination as to the present sanity or insanity of the person on trial. State, ex rel. Chandler, 45 La. Ann. 698.

Insanity when discovered was held at common law to bar any further steps against a person accused of crime at whatever stage of the proceeding, and it was always competent to institute an inquiry into his condition. Underwood v. People, 82 Mich. 1.

The rule was that one who after his plea and before his trial becomes of nonsane memory shall not be tried, and if after his trial he becomes of nonsane memory he shall not receive judgment, or if after judgment he becomes of nonsane memory his execution shall be spared, as, were he of sane memory, he might allege something in stay of judgment of execution. Rex v. Dyson, 7 Car. & P. 306; Reg. v. Berry, 34 L. T. N. S. 590, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 447, 45 L. J. M. C. N. S. 123, 18 Cox, C. C. 189.

And 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 697, § 2, providing that no insane person can be tried, sentenced to any punishment, or punished for any crime or offense while he continues in that state, is in strict conformity with the common-law rule on the subject. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 218.

And W. Va. Code, chap. 159, §§ 9, 10, providing that no one while insane shall be tried for crime, and if the court sees reasonable ground to doubt his sanity the trial shall be suspended until a jury shall inquire of such sanity, is only declaratory of the common law. State v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 729, 18 L. R. A. 224.

So, Wis. Rev. Stat. § 4700, providing for an inquiry where there is probability that a person accused of crime is insane at the time of his trial, and thereby incapacitated to act for himself, to determine whether he is insane, is substantially in affirmance of the common-law power of the court, and is not in derogation of the constitutional provisions securing to the accused a fair and impartial trial, as the result of such inquiry can have no legal effect upon the main issue. French v. State, 93 Wis. 325.

And a construction of the statutes of a state on this subject by its courts of last resort will be followed by the Federal courts. Nobles v. Georgia, 168 U. S. 398, 42 L. ed. — (Advance Sheets, Dec. 15, 1897, p. 144). Affirming principal case.

An inquiry as to the present sanity of a person accused of crime, however, is based rather upon public propriety and decency than upon any right of the person. Carr v. State, 98 Ga. 89; Spann v. State, 47 Ga. 549.

And a deaf and dumb person from nativity may be arraigned for a capital offense if intelligent questions can be conveyed to him by signs and symbols. King v. Jones, 1 Leach, C. L. 130.

Mr. Marion W. Harris, for plaintiff in error:

Though a man be compos when he commits a capital crime, yet if he becomes non compos after, he shall not be indicted; if after indictment, he shall not be convicted; if after conviction, he shall not receive judgment; if after judgment, he shall not be ordered for execution; for "furiosus solo furore punitur," and the law knows not but he might have offered some reason, if in his senses, to have stayed these respective proceedings.

4 Bl. Com. 395.

Become insane after conviction. If, after any convict shall have been sentenced to the punishment of death, he shall become insane, the sheriff of the county, with concurrence and assistance of the ordinary thereof, shall summon a jury of twelve men to inquire into such insanity; and if it be found, by the inquisition of such jury, that such convict is insane, the sheriff shall suspend the execution of the sentence directing the death of such convict, and make report of the said inquisition and suspension of execution to the presiding judge of the district, who shall cause the same to be entered on the minutes of the superior court of the county where the conviction was had.

Georgia Code 1882, 4666.

Lunatics, how disposed of. When any person shall, after conviction of a capital crime, become insane, and shall be so declared in accordance with the provisions of § 4666 of the Code, it shall be the duty of the judge to certify the fact, and the said convict shall be received into the lunatic asylum, there to be

And the fact that a defendant in a criminal action was insane when required by the condition of his bail bond to plead to an indictment, and had been taken out of the state and confined in an insane asylum of another state to be treated for his insanity, is no defense to his sureties in a transaction on the bond. Adler v. State, 35 Ark. 517, 37 Am. Rep. 43.

II. Question when and how raised.

Where at any stage of the trial in a criminal prosecution it is found that the accused has not sufficient intellect to understand the nature of the proceeding against him, the jury should be discharged and the person detained under the provisions of 39 & 40 Geo. III. chap. 94, § 2. Reg. v. Berry, 34 L. T. N. S. 580, L. 1 Q. B. Div. 447, 45 L. J. M. C. N. S. 123, 18 Cox, C. C. 189.

If the court, either before or during the progress of the trial of a prosecution for crime, either from observation or upon suggestion of counsel, has facts brought to its attention which raise a doubt of the condition of the defendant's mind as to sanity, the question should be settled before the prosecution is continued. State v. Peacock, 50 N. J. L. 34.

And if at any time a doubt arises as to the sanity of a person accused of crime, it is the duty of the court of its own motion to suspend the trial or further proceedings in the case at whatever stage the doubt arises until the question of sanity is determined. People v. Ah Ying, 42 Cal. 18.

And an inquiry as to the mental condition of a person accused of a crime may be directed upon suggestion of the state's attorney. State, ex rel. Chandler, 45 La. Ann. 606.

So, if a person indicted for felony stands mute upon his arraignment the court may instruct the sheriff to return a jury instantler and try whether he stands mute obstinately or by the visitation of God, and if they find that he stands obstinately mute sentence may be passed without further inquiry. King v. Mercer, 1 Leach, C. L. 183.

And where a suggestion of the insanity of a person accused of crime and deemed to be insane is not made at the arraignment, the objection to his trial may be made at any time before the commencement thereof, and if sustained the trial cannot proceed, and even though not made until the trial has begun, it is not then too late and must be considered and determined in some way, and even after conviction it may be interposed as a reason why sentence should not be passed. State v. Reed, 41 La. Ann. 581.

And a jury may be impaneled by the direction of the court to try and determine whether a person who discovers strong marks of mental derangement on his arraignment was sane or not though he pleaded not guilty to the indictment, and where 38 L. R. A.

a verdict is returned that he was not of sound memory he may be remanded to prison. Com. v. Hathaway, 18 Mass. 290.

And one convicted of murder on arraignment and plea of guilty, and whose sanity at the time of the plea was subsequently made one of the grounds for a motion for a new trial, may properly be rearraigned where upon the case being again called for trial he requested permission to enter a plea of not guilty. Shaw v. State, 32 Tex. Crim. Rep. 155.

So, counsel for the defendant in a criminal case cannot waive an inquiry as to his client's sanity where a doubt exists. People v. Ah Ying, 42 Cal. 18.

And a person accused of crime who is insane at the time of his trial and incompetent to conduct his own defense is incompetent to waive his rights. State v. Patten, 10 La. Ann. 299, 68 Am. Dec. 594.

And where a bill has been found against an insane person for murder, and he has been removed by order of the secretary of state to the county lunatic asylum, the court will nevertheless require that he be brought up and his alleged insanity inquired into by a jury, though the governor of the asylum had made an affidavit that he was in a helpless state of insanity, unless it be shown that it would be dangerous to bring him into court, in which case the court will allow the witnesses their costs and bind them over to appear when called upon. Queen v. Derryhouse, 2 Cox, C. C. 446.

The New York statutes contemplate two cases in which a commission may be appointed, first, after a plea on the merits and before trial to determine his mental condition at the time of the commission of the crime, and second, when a person in confinement under an indictment, whether before or after conviction, appears to be insane, to determine his mental condition at the time of the examination. People v. McElvaine, 125 N. Y. 596.

But the plea or suggestion in a criminal prosecution that the person is now insane cannot be made under the Pennsylvania statute providing that if upon the trial the accused shall appear to the jury to be a lunatic the court shall order him into strict custody, where it was presented after a plea of not guilty had been entered of record and the jury had been sworn upon the merits of the case, and the prisoner was placed in jeopardy. Com. v. Taylor, 16 Phila. 439.

And evidence that a person accused of crime is insane should be introduced at the time of the plea bearing upon that issue where it was known to counsel at the time of the trial, and in such case a new trial will not be granted on the ground of insanity under a statute providing that sanity must be shown before conviction. Burton v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 138.

A person accused of crime who has pleaded guilty to the charge on arraignment, however, should be safely and securely kept and treated as other adjudged insane persons.

Code 1892, 4666 (a).

The tribunal established by said § 4666 was not a judicial tribunal, and did not afford "due process of law" for the determination of the issue presented.

By the settled principles of the common law the ascertainment of the fact of insanity or sanity at any stage of the proceedings, in the course of a legal investigation, was a function of the trial court.

By the common law, at any stage of a criminal case, and especially in capital cases, whether before indictment, upon arraignment, during trial, at verdict, prior to judgment, or even in the shadow of the gallows, the proper suggestion of the present, existing insanity of the defendant as an immunity from further proceedings against him as long as his malady continued, and also a trial in some way of the issue tendered at these respective stages, was his legal right and was not extended as a mere matter of judicial grace. In doubtful cases the issue was always submitted to a jury.

permitted to withdraw that plea where there is evidence sufficient to raise a doubt respecting the condition of his mind at the time he interposed it. People v. Scott, 59 Cal. 341.

The grand jury has no authority to ignore a bill for murder on the ground of insanity, though it appear clearly from the testimony that the accused was in fact insane; it is their duty to find a bill if they believe the acts done were such as would have amounted to murder if done by a person of sound mind so as to enable the court to order the detention of the party during the pleasure of the Queen on arraignment or trial under 39 & 40 Geo. III. chap. 94, §§ 1, 2. Reg. v. Hodges, 8 Car. & P. 196.

And a person indicted for felony who is enlarged on bail to answer is not in confinement within the meaning of that term as used in Ala. Rev. Code, § 1060, authorizing the circuit judge in certain cases to order an inquiry as to the sanity of persons in confinement under indictment and direct their removal to an insane asylum. Ex parte Trice, 53 Ala. 548.

Present insanity at the time of the trial of an indictment for homicide must be specially pleaded in Tennessee, however, and cannot be established like insanity at the time of the commission of the act under a plea of not guilty. Green v. State, 88 Tenn. 614.

And the defense of insanity cannot be put in under Ga. Code, §§ 4673, 4299, providing therefor in case of mental derangement existing at the time of the trial without an averment of the existence of a diseased condition of the mind at that time. Danforth v. State, 75 Ga. 614, 58 Am. Rep. 480.

And a plea of insanity provided for in Irwin's Ga. Code, § 4234, is in its nature a plea for the purpose of preventing a trial on the merits, and though it may cover insanity at the time of the act its essence is that the person is insane at the time of the trial, and it must contain that allegation. Long v. State, 38 Ga. 491.

It has always been the practice in Georgia where insanity at the time of the trial is insisted upon in a criminal prosecution to file a special plea to that effect and try such plea by a special jury. Fogarty v. State, 80 Ga. 450.

And a judgment of a circuit judge on an inquiry as to the sanity of a prisoner in confinement under indictment, under the provisions of Ala. Rev. Code, § 1060, providing therefor, is invalid and a nullity unless notice was given to the person affected by the proceeding and the record recites the existence of every fact upon which jurisdiction is based. Ex parte Trice, 53 Ala. 548.

The better opinion has been stated to be, however, that the objection of present insanity in a criminal prosecution requires no formal pleading, but may be presented orally, and the court may 38 L. R. A.

raise it on its own suggestion. State v. Reed, 41 La. Ann. 581.

Michigan Laws 1873, act 168, providing for the confinement in the insane asylum of the state's prison of persons acquitted of murder or other high crimes on the ground of insanity until discharged by the governor on receipt of the certificate of the circuit judge of the circuit where the trial was had, and the medical superintendent of the state insane asylum, upon an examination made by him after being summoned for that purpose by the prison inspectors, that the person is no longer insane, leaving the inspectors free to act or not as they see fit, and making no provision by which any of the parties could be compelled to act, leaves the liberty of the person confined to depend upon the uncontrolled pleasure of the inspectors, and is unconstitutional in failing to furnish means for the enforcement of the remedy provided, and is in violation of safeguards against restraints of personal liberty without due process of law. Underwood v. People, 33 Mich. 1, 20 Am. Rep. 683.

III. Test of insanity which will prevent trial.

The test of insanity which will prevent a trial in a criminal action is whether the person is mentally competent to make a rational defense. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216; Guagando v. State, 41 Tex. 626.

And the question upon an inquiry as to the present sanity or insanity of the person accused of crime is, Is he sane enough to present to counsel the facts which ought to be stated and presented to the jury upon his trial? State v. O'Grady, 8 Ohio Legal News, 137; Frith's Case, 22 How. St. Tr. 311.

Upon the trial of such an issue the jury is to consider whether he had sufficient intellect to comprehend the course of the proceeding so as to make a proper defense, to challenge any juror that he might wish to object to, and to comprehend the details of the evidence. Rex v. Pritchard, 7 Car. & P. 303.

The knowledge of right and wrong as a test of insanity does not apply to a collateral proceeding to ascertain the mental capacity of a person about to be put on trial for a criminal act. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216.

And a person who by reason of insanity is unable to comprehend his position and to make his defense cannot be placed upon trial for a criminal act. State v. Peacock, 50 N. J. L. 34; United States v. Lancaster, 7 Biss. 440.

And one who has not intelligence enough to understand the nature of the proceedings against her in a criminal prosecution ought to be found not sane on a preliminary proceeding as to present sanity. Rex v. Dyson, 7 Car. & P. 305; Reg. v.

In Georgia the common-law method was intended to apply till after sentence.

When at the stage beyond judgment, the codifiers lopped off this function from the trial court, it was their duty to intrust it to a substitute competent to exercise the function.

No person should be tried for a felony when he has not reason enough to appreciate his peril or to act advisedly with his counsel in suggesting to them such facts as would break the force of the prosecuting evidence, and introduce such exculpatory proof as his case would warrant. Taffe v. State, 23 Ark. 34.

And a conviction against a person accused of crime who is found guilty on the evidence, but that he was not capable of understanding, and had not as a fact understood, the nature of the proceedings against him, cannot be sustained. Reg. v. Berry, 34 L. T. N. S. 590, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 447, 45 L. J. M. C. N. S. 123, 13 Cox, C. C. 189.

A person arraigned for crime who is capable of understanding the nature and object of the proceedings going on against him, and who rightly comprehends his own condition in reference to such proceeding, and can conduct his defense in a rational manner, however, is to be deemed sane for the purposes of being tried, although on some other subjects his mind may be deranged or unsound. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216.

So, a person should not be tried or convicted for felony when he was so intoxicated that he had not reason enough to appreciate his peril or act advisedly, and was not able to understand the facts of his case, and could not communicate with his counsel with intelligence in suggesting to them such facts as would break the force of the prosecuting evidence and in adducing such exculpatory proof as his case would warrant. Taffe v. State, 23 Ark. 34.

The jury in a preliminary proceeding to determine as to present sanity or insanity, under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 697, § 2, providing that no act by a person in a state of insanity can be punished as an offense, and no insane person can be tried or sentenced to any punishment or be punished for any crime or offense while he continues in that state, must be satisfied that the person's mind is in such a state of unsoundness or disease as to exempt him from responsibility, and not merely that he was so infirm as to render him incapable of managing his own affairs. People v. Kleim, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 13.

IV. Determination as to submission of issue.

a. Doubt as to sanity.

The court cannot find a person accused of crime to be insane as that is a matter of fact to be found by the jury, but if upon arraignment it has reason to think him insane, or even has doubt upon that subject, it may order an inquest for the purpose of trying that question; and if it finds him insane it may order him into custody to be kept in conformity to the statute, so long as he shall continue of unsound mind. Webber v. Com. 119 Pa. 223.

Where there is a doubt of the sanity of a person

Hence the common-law method was properly invoked even after sentence, and its denial was a denial of due process of the law.

Spann v. State, 47 Ga. 549; Carr v. State, 96 Ga. 89; Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. ed. 232.

The test is, not that the citizen's right may be obtained by the method established, but that the method shall insure those rights.

State v. Billings, 55 Minn. 487; Brown v. Leves Comrs. 50 Miss. 483; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 237, 41 L. ed. 985.

Since the right to set up insanity both before and after judgment, and the immunity from judgment in the one case and execution in the other which its successful establishment would accused of crime he must not be put upon his trial, but a jury must be impaneled to try the fact. Ley's Case, 1 Lewin, C. C. 239.

And it is the duty of the court to suspend the trial of a criminal prosecution and impanel a jury to inquire into the question when there is reasonable ground for doubt of the sanity of the accused. Gruber v. State, 3 W. Va. 699.

The court, upon an application for a preliminary inquiry as to the sanity of a person accused of crime, may hear the testimony offered, and if, after hearing it, it entertains a doubt as to the present sanity of the prisoner, it is its duty to award an inquest for the trial of that fact before any other proceedings are had. Webber v. Com. 119 Pa. 223.

The court must see reasonable ground to doubt the sanity of a person about to be tried for felony, however, before impaneling a jury to inquire as to his sanity. State v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 723, 18 L. R. A. 124.

It is only in case of doubt as to the present sanity of a person accused of crime upon arraignment, that a preliminary inquiry as to such sanity is to be ordered. Webber v. Com. 119 Pa. 223.

And where the judge in a criminal prosecution has no doubt of the prisoner's present sanity he is not bound to order an inquest, and would not be justified in doing so. Webber v. Com. 119 Pa. 223.

And it is only when the necessity of an examination is specially made to appear to the court in which the indictment is pending that it is bound to order an examination under the provisions of N. Y. Code Crim. Proc. § 653, that if a defendant in confinement under indictment appears at any time before or after conviction to be insane, the court in which the indictment is pending, unless the defendant is under sentence of death, may appoint a commission to examine him and report to the court as to his sanity at the time of the examination. People v. McElvaine, 125 N. Y. 596.

The court in a criminal prosecution is not bound to stop or justified in arresting the progress of the trial upon the mere suggestion of insanity, in the absence of any substantial evidence of the existence of a degree of mental disorder which would unfit the accused from conducting his cause or instructing his counsel. State v. Peacock, 50 N. J. L. 84.

And neither the assertion of the prisoner nor his counsel that he is insane, nor the production of affidavits, nor the entry of a plea of present insanity upon the record in a criminal prosecution, can, of itself alone, suffice to produce the state of doubt which is a necessary prerequisite to the order of an inquiry. Webber v. Com. 119 Pa. 223.

And evidence of mere incapacity to understand and comprehend all his legal rights, and to make known in the most distinct and intelligent manner to his counsel all the facts material to his defense is not sufficient to warrant a reasonable doubt as afford, was a fundamental and inalienable right of the prisoner at common law, then the holding that there was no such right in Elizabeth Nobles and no duty upon the judge of Twiggs superior court to allow it, was not only a denial of due process of law, but a denial and an abridgment of her rights, privileges, and immunities as a citizen of the United States, which the states are inhibited to do.

14 Am. U. S. Const. § 1; Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216.

The right to set up insanity is inalienable, and is, by implication, part of the bill of rights to his sanity upon which an inquiry into the mental condition of a person accused of crime must be instituted, under Iowa Rev. 1880, § 5015, 5019. A doubt must be raised whether at the time there is such mental impairment, either from idiocy, insanity, or the like, as to render it probable that the prisoner cannot, as far as devolves upon him, have a full, fair, and impartial trial. State v. Arnold, 12 Iowa, 479.

Carr, Trial of Lunatics, p. 44, note 1, and citations, 70; Re Spies, 128 U. S. 131, 151-

So, where a defendant in a criminal action, once found insane at the time of his proposed trial, is called for trial a second time, if there is any doubt as to his sanity the court must proceed as at first, and try the question of insanity anew, and so on until the end, as often as occasion may require. People v. Farrell, 31 Cal. 576.

The existence of a doubt as to the present sanity of a person accused of crime is a matter which from the necessity of the case can only be determined by the court itself. Webber v. Com. 119 Pa. 223.

And it is the duty of the court in a criminal prosecution when the subject is brought to its attention by responsible parties to itself make a sufficient inspection and examination to determine whether an application for a commission to ascertain whether the accused is insane is made in good faith and upon plausible grounds, and the apparent facts thus discovered are made the condition of the right of the court to institute the statutory inquisition. People v. McElvaine, 125 N. Y. 506.

The jurisdiction given by Ala. Rev. Code, § 1060, to the circuit judge in certain cases to order an inquiry as to the sanity of prisoners in confinement under indictment vests in the judge, and not in the court. Ex parte Trice, 53 Ala. 546.

b. Evidence to establish doubt.

In determining whether a reasonable doubt exists as to the sanity of a person accused of crime before impaneling a jury to make the inquiry the court is not limited to the case made for the prisoner, but may in its discretion investigate the matter thoroughly and take into consideration all the circumstances. State v. Arnold, 12 Iowa, 479.

And it may inspect and examine him and consider his actions and demeanor and read affidavits and inquire of physicians and others touching his then mental condition, for the purpose of determining what action to take. State v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 729, 18 L. R. A. 224.

And a personal inspection of the prisoner, or an examination of him, whether public or private, or inquiry from an attending physician or those around the accused who have means of knowledge, or any other testimony which may contribute to the creation of a doubt in the mind of the judge, may be resorted to in a criminal prosecution to determine as to the existence of such a doubt as to the sanity of the accused. Webber v. Com. 119 Pa. 223.

Messrs. Glenn & Rountree also for plain tiff in error.

Messrs. J. M. Terrell, Attorney General, and Tom Eason, for the State:

Neither the Constitution of the United States nor of the state of Georgia guarantees to a person convicted of crime who may thereafter become insane the right to have judicially determined the question of sanity.

At common law the stay of the execution depends on the discretion of the judge.

And if from the appearance and conduct of a person accused of crime when called upon to plead there is reason to believe that he is insane the court should institute a preliminary proceeding to ascertain his insanity. Jones v. State, 13 Ala. 153.

But where a prisoner on being called upon to plead stands mute and exhibits symptoms of insanity which the prosecution claims to be feigned, and a jury is impaneled under 39 & 40 Geo. III. chap. 94, § 2, to try his sanity, it is the duty of the prosecution to lay evidence before the jury from which the court may ascertain the truth of the matter, and then counsel for the prisoner may call witnesses to rebut any inference of artifice or design. Reg. v. Davies, 6 Cox, C. C. 323, 3 Car. & K. 323.

And where the prosecution in a criminal action does not adduce evidence in a proceeding to ascertain the sanity of the accused under that statute the judge will interfere to ascertain the truth by examining the officers of the prison, and may postpone the trial independently of the statute until the next assizes. Reg. v. Davies, 6 Cox, C. C. 323, 3 Car. & K. 323.

c. Discretion of the court as to.

The general rule is that the judge in a criminal prosecution in which the present insanity of the accused is suggested may call an inquisition or not at his pleasure. Spann v. State, 47 Ga. 549.

Whether a preliminary proceeding shall be instituted to ascertain as to the sanity of a person accused of crime must be left to the sound discretion of the court, and if the prisoner pleads to the indictment, the omission of the court to institute such an inquiry cannot be assigned as error, though there may be considerable ground for the belief that the prisoner was insane at the time of the trial. Jones v. State, 13 Ala. 153.

And the decision of a trial court on the question of the propriety of impaneling a jury to inquire as to the sanity of a person accused of crime, preliminary to his trial for the criminal act, will not be reversed on appeal unless it manifestly appears that the decision was wrong or that the discretion of the court was abused. State v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 729, 18 L. R. A. 224.

So, refusal of the judge in a criminal prosecution to order a jury to inquire as to the sanity of the accused upon a mere suggestion of present insanity, or even when supported by affidavit, is not an abuse of discretion where he is satisfied that the accused is feigning insanity to avoid a trial, and is competent to make a proper defense. State v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 729, 18 L. R. A. 224.

And a judgment of conviction in a criminal prosecution will not be reversed on appeal because of a refusal to grant a preliminary inquest as to the present sanity of the accused for the mere purpose that the prisoner may be then arraigned to plead his insanity, where the question as to his sanity at the time of the commission of the act and at the time of the trial was determined against him on such trial. Webber v. Com. 119 Pa. 223.

The right of review or the right of appeal to a higher court is not a matter of absolute right.

And refusal to permit a plea of not guilty to be withdrawn in order to determine the question of the person's present insanity, where eight days after the plea a jury was called and the prisoner exercised his right of challenge and permitted them to be sworn, is not error where the judge told the jury that if they should find the prisoner to be insane during the trial but not at the commission of the crime they might say so in their verdict, and then the court would either delay judgment or stay execution. Taylor v. Com. 109 Pa. 262.

So, the provision of N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 658, that when a defendant pleads insanity the court in which the indictment is pending, instead of proceeding with the trial of the indictment, may appoint a commission of not more than three disinterested persons to examine him and report to the court as to his sanity at the time of the commission of the crime, is not mandatory, but invests the trial judge with a discretion to appoint a commissioner or not, as in the exercise of his judgment he may deem it proper or necessary to do. People v. McElvaine, 125 N. Y. 593.

While the decision of the judge as to whether there is reasonable ground to doubt the sanity of the person accused of crime must have a weighty if not decisive influence, however, it has been held that an abuse of discretion would be remediable. State v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 729, 18 L. R. A. 224.

And that refusal by the court in a criminal prosecution to entertain the objection that the accused is now insane, or to hear evidence thereon, or to determine it in any way, is error which will sustain a reversal and remanding of the case. State v. Reed, 41 La. Ann. 581.

And refusal to submit the question as to whether the accused was mentally competent to make a rational defense on a plea of insanity supported by affidavits filed before trial in a criminal case is not cured by trying the issue on insanity after the trial and conviction. Guagando v. State, 41 Tex. 626.

But it will not be found on appeal that a judge abused his discretion in a criminal prosecution in refusing a preliminary inquest as to the present sanity of the accused where his act has been justified both by the verdict and his own freedom from doubt after hearing all the testimony. Webber v. Com. 119 Pa. 223.

A refusal of the court in a criminal prosecution to instruct the jury that the defendant must be acquitted if insane at the time of the trial indicates that it had no doubt of his sanity though testimony tending to show that he was insane had been admitted. People v. Lee Fook, 85 Cal. 300.

And the admission of evidence in a criminal action as to the defendant's insanity does not indicate that the court had a doubt as to his sanity which would require the submission of the question. 88 L. R. A.

As to the manner of dealing with insane convicts under sentence of death, see Carr, Trial of Lunatics, pp. 74, 76, 78, 80.

Cobb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At a special term of the superior court of Twiggs county in July, 1895, Elizabeth Nobles was tried for the offense of murder, and, upon conviction, was sentenced to death. The sentence "having been legally suspended and superseded by the order of the court, the case tion to the jury as a separate and distinct issue from that of guilt or innocence of the offense charged, as required by Cal. Penal Code, § 1383. People v. Lee Fook, 85 Cal. 300.

The absolute right of a person accused of crime to have the question of his sanity tried by jury is not affected by a refusal of the court to order a preliminary inquiry as to such sanity upon the ground that he entertained no doubt thereof where the question of his sanity both at the commission of the offense and at the time of the trial was fairly and fully submitted to the jury who tried the indictment. Webber v. Com. 119 Pa. 223.

V. Disposition of the issue.

a. How tried; generally.

The method of settling a preliminary question as to the present sanity or insanity of a person accused of crime when it is not the subject of statutory regulation is within the discretion of the trial court. State v. Peacock, 50 N. J. L. 34; State v. Reed, 41 La. Ann. 581.

And the rule is the same when the statute merely provides that an insane person shall not be tried. People v. Kleim, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 15; Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216.

At common law in capital cases it was the more usual course when it appeared that the sanity of the accused was doubtful to inquire touching it by a jury, but inspection of the accused by the judge without a jury was allowable. State v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 729, 18 L. R. A. 224.

And inspection by the court is now one of the legal modes of trying the facts of present sanity or insanity of a person accused of crime, and refusal to receive the plea of lunacy in bar of the sentence, and to impanel a jury to try the truth of the plea, is not error where nothing appears in the record to show that the discretion of the court in adopting the mode pursued was erroneously exercised. Bonds v. State, 1 Mart. & Y. 143, 17 Am. Dec. 795.

And it is proper in a preliminary examination as to the present sanity or insanity of a person accused of crime to adhere to the common-law method of trial and verdict of a jury to be impaneled to try the issue. People v. Kleim, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 13.

And the inquiry as to the present sanity or insanity of the person accused of crime might be made by the aid of a quasi commission in the nature of one de lunaticis inquirendo. People v. Kleim, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 13.

The most discreet and proper course is to try an allegation of insanity after the commission of the criminal act before a jury in important cases. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216.

And the general practice where a plea of present insanity is interposed in a criminal prosecution is to submit the issue to a jury impaneled for that purpose. State v. Reed, 41 La. Ann. 581.

And where upon the arraignment of a person ac-came on to be heard before the court" on June 23, 1896, "for the purpose of passing sentence of death in accordance with the verdict of guilty rendered." At this term, Baughn, the plaintiff in error, as the next friend of the condemned woman, appeared, and, in her behalf, objected to the sentence of death being passed, on the ground that she was then insane, and in his application prayed "the court for a trial by jury of the said question of insanity; that the court cause jurors to be regularly summoned and impaneled to try said issue, and that such other proceedings be had in that regard as are usually incident to trials in said court; that petitioner have the right to the court's process to compel the attendance of witnesses, and to such other process as may be right and necessary; and that said sentence be postponed and superseded until the final adjudication of the question." The court declined to entertain the application, and refused "each and every prayer" thereof, and fixed the time for the execution of the sentence on August 7, 1896. Thereupon Baughn, in the same capacity as above stated, by petition, alleged that Elizabeth Nobles was then insane, and that it was contrary to the policy of the law and illegal that the sentence of death should be executed, and "prayed that the court cause jurors to be regularly summoned and impaneled to try said issue, and that such other proceedings be had in that regard as are usually incident to trials of murder it is suggested that he is a deaf mute and incapable of understanding the nature of a trial and its incidents and his rights thereon, it is proper to impanel a jury to try the truth of such suggestions, and in case of a finding that the suggestion is true the court may decline putting the prisoner upon trial. State v. Harris, 8 Jones, L. 126, 78 Am. Dec. 272.

So, in Rex v. Pritchard, 7 Car. & P. 303, in which a person deaf and dumb was to be tried for a capital felony, the judge ordered a jury to be impaneled to try whether he was mute by the visitation of God, and upon finding that he was so the jury was sworn to try whether he was able to plead, and upon a finding that he could plead and his plea by sign of not guilty, the judge ordered that the jury be sworn to try whether the person was now sane or not.

As a general rule where the question of the sanity or insanity of a person accused of crime at the time of the trial is raised it may be tried either by a special jury impaneled for that purpose or by the jury who are to try the indictment. Webber v. Com. 119 Pa. 223. And see People v. Farrell, 81 Cal. 576, and Ley's Case, 1 Lewin, C. C. 230, supra, I.

And in some instances the present sanity of a person accused of crime has been inquired into by the same jury which tries the main question of guilt or innocence and at the same time, but this is deemed objectionable as mingling together questions which ought to be kept distinct. People v. Kleim, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 13.

A defendant in a criminal prosecution who alleges insanity at the time of arraignment is not entitled, as a matter of legal right, to have a separate, independent, and preliminary trial of that question by a jury specially impaneled for that purpose. Webber v. Com. 119 Pa. 223.

The court in a criminal prosecution in which present insanity is suggested can itself enter upon the inquiry as to its existence or submit the question to another jury impaneled for that purpose. State v. Peacock, 56 N. J. L. 34.

And the question of the defendant's insanity at the time of the commission of the act, and at the time of the trial of a criminal prosecution, may be tried along with the other questions in the case, though a different practice may obtain where the insanity is claimed to still exist, and probably should govern where the insanity occurred subsequently to the commission of the offense. State v. Gould, 40 Kan. 253.

And the court in a criminal prosecution may, when a plea of present insanity is interposed during the progress of the trial, permit the trial to proceed, and submit the question of present insanity, with that of guilt or innocence, to the jury. State v. Reed, 41 La. Ann. 581.

Under W. Va. Code, chap. 159, §§ 9, 10, however, where the court sees reasonable ground to doubt the sanity of a person accused of crime, the question of his sanity must be tested by a jury. State v. Harrison, 36 W. Va. 729, 18 L. R. A. 224.

And when there is a reasonable ground for doubt of the sanity of the accused at the time of the trial it is the duty of the court to suspend the trial and impanel another jury to inquire into the question. Gruber v. State, 3 W. Va. 609.

And ordering a trial upon a plea of not guilty in a criminal case to proceed before the same jury that had disagreed and been discharged upon a special issue on insanity is error under a statute providing that in case of such disagreement the court shall order the trial to proceed upon a plea of not guilty, without providing that it should proceed before the same jury. French v. State, 85 Wis. 460, 21 L. R. A. 402.

And where a person on being called upon to plead remains mute, the court cannot hear evidence to prove that he does so through malice and then enter a plea of not guilty under 7 & 8 Geo. IV. chap. 28, § 2; a jury must be impaneled to try the question of malice, and it is upon their finding that the court is authorized to enter the plea. Queen v. Israel, 2 Cox, C. C. 263.

b. Procedure on trial.

In the absence of the exaction of any direct mode of procedure on the trial of an issue as to present insanity the court may mould it to correspond with the analogous methods of proceeding resorted to for the purpose of special issues. State, ex rel. Chandler, 45 La. Ann. 606.

Challenges for cause are allowable on the trial of a preliminary proceeding for the determination of the question of present insanity, as well as on the trial of the final issue. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216.

Peremptory challenges, however, are restricted at common law to the main issue, in which the life of the party is in jeopardy, and they cannot be made upon a collateral issue, for the determination as to the present insanity of a person accused of crime. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216.

And a preliminary proceeding to determine the present sanity of a person accused of crime is not a trial for any offense, within the meaning of the New York statute securing the right to peremptory challenge to every person arraigned and put on trial for any offense punishable with death or with imprisonment for ten years or any longer time, and a refusal to allow such peremptory challenges in such a proceeding is not error. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216.

The question for the determination of triers of challenges to jurors drawn for a preliminary proceeding for the determination of the question of present insanity, which they are to be sworn to determine, is whether the juror is or is not indifferent between the parties to the controversy. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216.

So, whenever a person's soundness of mind and in said court, and that petitioner have the right to the court's process to compel the attendance of witnesses, and such other process as may be right and necessary, and that said sentence of death be suspended and superseded until the final adjudication of the question." The court refused to entertain the petition, and denied "each and every prayer" of the same. The error complained of is the refusal of the judge to entertain these petitions and grant the prayers therein contained, it being claimed that the question of the insanity of the convicted woman should be inquired of by a jury in the superior court, according to the forms of procedure usually incident to trials in that court, that the refusal of the judge to submit this question to a jury is a denial to the prisoner of due process of law, and that there is no proceeding authorized by any statute law of Georgia which amounts to due process of law in such cases, the procedure provided in Penal Code, § 1027, not being judicial in its nature.

"A lunatic or person insane, without lucid intervals, shall not be found guilty of any crime or misdemeanor with which he may be charged; provided, the act so charged as criminal was committed in the condition of such lunacy or insanity; but if a lunatic has lucid intervals of understanding, he shall answer for what he does in those intervals as if he had no deficiency." Penal Code, § 35. The section quoted clearly shows that under the law of this state no person can be legally convicted of a crime committed while in a moment of irreconsequent accountability for his acts are in question the rule that he may control or discharge his counsel at pleasure should be so far relaxed as to permit them to offer evidence on those points even against his will. State v. Patten, 10 La. Ann. 290, 63 Am. Dec. 594.

And he should not be permitted to discharge them after the testimony in behalf of the state is closed, upon their offer to prove his insanity both at the time of and since the criminal act, which defense he repudiates without allowing them to offer proof on the question of insanity. State v. Patten, 10 La. Ann. 290, 63 Am. Dec. 594.

And a person accused of crime, who shows strong symptoms of insanity in court during the taking of an inquest under §§ 40 Geo. III. chap. 94, § 2, to try whether he is insane or not, need not be asked whether he would cross-examine the witnesses on the inquest or would offer any remarks or evidence. Queen v. Goode, 7 Ad. & El. 536.

So, it devolves upon the accused in a preliminary proceeding to determine as to his present sanity or insanity to make out affirmatively that he is not insane. People v. Kleim, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 18.

But where a jury is impaneled to try whether a person is insane or not at the time he is brought up to plead to the indictment the prosecution must begin and first call his witnesses to prove the sanity of the prisoner. Reg. v. Davies, 8 Car. & K. 323, 6 Cox, C. C. 326.

So, the jury on an inquest held to determine the sanity or insanity of a person accused of crime, who had refused to plead and shown symptoms of insanity, may form their own judgment of the present state of his mind from his demeanor during the inquest, and thereupon find him to be insane without any evidence being given. Queen v. Goode, 7 Ad. & El. 536.

And the testimony of a foreign witness cannot be taken upon commission to be read in a criminal prosecution, not upon trial of the indictment, but before commissioners appointed to examine and report as to the sanity of the accused. People v. Haight, 8 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 60.

But the jury on a special plea of insanity in a criminal prosecution under Wis. Rev. Stat. § 4697, and as amended by chap. 184, Laws of 1883, are required to acquit the accused of the offense charged if they should find that there was reasonable doubt as to whether or not he was so insane that he did not comprehend the nature or character of the act or know that it was wrong or unlawful, and they should not be directed to find him sane in case of such reasonable doubt. Revoir v. State, 82 Wis. 295.

And proof that a person accused of crime was deaf and dumb, and that she had been instructed in the dumb alphabet, but that she was not so far advanced as to put words together, and was then incapable of understanding the nature of the proceeding against her and making her defense, will warrant a finding of insanity on a preliminary proceeding as to present sanity. Rex v. Dyson, 7 Car. & P. 305.

Neither the atrocity of the offense committed nor the supposed effect of the verdict in a preliminary examination as to the sanity of a person accused of crime either on the prisoner or on the community should be permitted to influence the jury in determining the question of present insanity. People v. Lake, 2 Park. Crim. Rep. 215.

And evidence that a person accused of crime had been confined in a lunatic asylum, at a time when he was in a state of maniacal irascibility, and that he was much addicted to stealing, and that he denied being insane, and that his conduct while in jail was different from that of other persons, does not show insanity which will render him incompetent to defend himself. Robertson's Case, 1 Swinton, 15.

So, the jury upon an inquiry as to the present condition of a person accused of crime concerning his sanity or insanity are called upon simply to say whether he is now sane or insane, and they have nothing to do with his condition at the time he is alleged to have committed it, except so far as the condition may aid in determining his present condition. State v. O'Grady, 8 Ohio Legal News, 187.

And an inquiry as to the mental condition of a prisoner pursuant to Iowa Rev. 1880, §§ 5015, 5019, providing therefor if a reasonable doubt arises as to his sanity, should be limited to the time he appears for arraignment, or to the occasion which renders the inquiry proper, and should not relate to the time at which the offense of which he is accused was committed. State v. Arnold, 12 Iowa, 479.

And the existence of lunacy or insanity which has not originated since the alleged commission of a murder need not be determined by a jury impaneled to determine whether or not the accused is of sound mind, under Neb. Crim. Code, § 454, limiting such trial to persons becoming insane after the commission of the offense, or § 553 applying solely to the sanity of a person under sentence of death. Walker v. State, 46 Neb. 25.

But where the court in a criminal action has no doubt that the defendant is sane at the time of the trial, and no request is made to have the question of insanity submitted to the jury, as a separate and distinct issue from that of guilt or innocence as provided for by Cal. Penal Code, § 1368, the court may allow evidence as to the defendant's sanity before and after the commission of the offense as bearing upon the question of his insanity at that time, though there was testimony as to his insanity at the time of the trial. People v. Lee Fook, 88 Cal. 300.

So refusal to charge the jury in a criminal prosecution that they might find a verdict either for or against the special plea of insanity, and charging instead that they might find the defendant guilty sponsibility growing out of an unsound mind. If the person charged with the crime desires to avail himself of the provisions of this law, and urge his insanity as a defense to a crime for which he stands indicted, no special plea of any character is necessary, as this defense will be allowed under the plea of not guilty. Danforth v. State, 75 Ga. 614, 58 Am. Rep. 480. "Whenever the plea of insanity is filed, it shall be the duty of the court to cause the issue on that plea to be first tried by a special jury, and if found to be true, the court shall order the defendant to be delivered to the superintendent of the asylum, there to remain until discharged in the manner prescribed by law." Penal Code, § 951. This section secures to a person charged with a crime the right to have the question of his mental condition at the time of the trial inquired into before being required to plead to the indictment. Long v. State, 83 Ga. 491. "If, after any convict shall have been sentenced to the punishment of death, he shall become insane, the sheriff of the county, with the concurrence and assistance of the ordinary thereof, shall summon a jury of twelve men to inquire into such insanity. The following oath shall be administered to the jury, to wit: 'You, and each of you, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you well and truly try this issue of insanity between the state and A. B., now condemned to die, and a true verdict give according to the evidence. So help you God.' If it be found, by the inquiry of such jury, that the convict is insane, under the evidence, is not error where the defendant filed a special plea of insanity but did not insist that it should be first tried, but went to trial on the general issue of not guilty relying upon his insanity to show that he was not guilty of the offense charged. Anderson v. State, 42 Ga. 9.

And an agreement entered into between the counsel in a criminal prosecution in which the accused had entered a plea of guilty that the evidence of the sheriff alone should be used under that plea is not violated by the court in asking certain questions of the defendant in relation to his plea where they are in conformity to Wilson's Texas Crim. Stat. §§ 211, 212, providing that a plea of not guilty shall not be received unless it plainly appear that the accused is sane and is uninfluenced by any consideration of fear or any persuasion or delusive hope of pardon. Burton v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 183.

So, where an issue as to present insanity is submitted to the jury with the general issue if the jury finds the defendant insane it should return such verdict by itself without passing on the general issue, but if it finds him sane it should proceed to pass upon the general issue and return both verdicts together. State v. Reed, 41 La. Ann. 581.

But a verdict on the trial of a preliminary question as to the present sanity or insanity of a person accused of crime, that he was sufficiently sound in mind and memory to distinguish between right and wrong, is defective. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216.

A verdict of insane in an inquiry as to the present sanity or insanity of the person accused of crime under the Ohio statute need not be unanimous, a majority of three fourths only being required. State v. O'Grady, 3 Ohio Legal News, 137.

VI. Effect of the determination.

A trial of the question of present insanity is not a trial of an indictment but is preliminary to such trial, and the object is simply to determine whether the person charged with an offense and alleged to be insane shall be required to plead and proceed to the trial of the main issue of guilty or not guilty. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216.

And where a court has jurisdiction of a criminal case, its jurisdiction to try such case cannot be taken away by the commencement of proceedings in the probate court for the purpose of having the question determined whether the defendant was sane or insane. State v. Gould, 40 Kan. 238.

And affidavits in a criminal prosecution tending to show that at the preliminary examination the defendant was in a state of great nervous excitement and mental derangement and oblivious to what occurred, and others tending to show that he was merely simulating or putting on an appearance of mental derangement, do not raise a question of jurisdiction, and where such examination and the commitment and information based thereon are regular on their face the court has full jurisdiction to try the case. People v. Bawden, 90 Cal. 195.

So, the trial of the question of guilt or innocence in an indictment for crime will not be postponed because of an appeal on the issue of insanity. People v. Moice, 15 Cal. 329.

And when the accused is found to be sane upon a preliminary examination as to present sanity or insanity the court will proceed to try him on the indictment. People v. Lake, 2 Park. Crim. Rep. 215; State v. O'Grady, 3 Ohio Legal News, 137; Gruber v. State, 3 W. Va. 699.

And where a person called upon to plead to an indictment stands mute, and a jury is impaneled to try whether he is mute of malice or by the visitation of God, and a verdict of mute of malice is rendered, the court will order a plea of not guilty to be entered. Reg. v. Schieler, 10 Cox, C. C. 409; Reg. v. Whitfield, 3 Car. & K. 121.

And the trial will proceed in the usual manner. Reg. v. Whitfield, 3 Car. & K. 121.

So, the intention of the provisions of Texas Code Crim. Proc. title 12, chap. 1, that when upon the trial of an issue of insanity it is found that the defendant is sane the judgment of conviction shall be enforced as if no such inquiry had been made is that such judgment of the trial court shall be conclusive of that issue. Darnell v. State, 24 Tex. App. 6.

But the finding of a jury upon a preliminary issue to determine the mental capacity of a person accused of crime to the effect that the person was then sane cannot be taken into consideration upon the question of insanity set up as a defense to the prosecution. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216.

All evidence of present insanity of the prisoner in a criminal prosecution not intended to prove insanity at the time of the commission of the offense should be excluded on the trial of the issue as to guilt or innocence, however, where the question as to the sanity of the prisoner at the time of the trial had been submitted to a jury and he had been found to be sane. Shultz v. State, 13 Tex. 401.

But refusal to permit evidence to be given on a trial of an indictment that the person was insane at any time after the finding of a verdict upon a preliminary issue to ascertain his mental capacity finding him to have been sane, and the exclusion of the opinions of medical witnesses formed from observation of the prisoner after that time as to his sanity, are erroneous. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216.

And an inquiry by a commission of medical experts as to the mental condition of a person accused of crime, appointed upon the suggestion of the as-the sheriff shall suspend the execution of the sentence, and make report of the inquisition and suspension of the execution to the presiding judge of the circuit, who shall cause the same to be entered on the minutes of the superior court of the county where the conviction was had." Penal Code, § 1047. The sections above quoted embrace all of the law of force in this state which relates to the subject of an inquiry into the mental condition of a person charged with or convicted of a criminal offense. If insane at the time the act is committed, he shall not be convicted. The section first above quoted gives him the right to have the question of his mental condition at this time inquired of strictly in accord with procedure usual in courts of justice in this state. Whether he be sane or insane at the time of the commission of the act, the section second above quoted provides for him a trial according to the usual rules of procedure of force in this state on the question of his mental condition at the time that he is placed on trial, and guarantees to him that he shall not be tried while he is in a condition of insanity. At every stage of the trial at which an accused person could raise the question of his mental condition at common law before conviction, the law of force in this state gives the defendant the right to raise such question, and accords to him an opportunity to have the question tried according to the procedure usual in the courts of the state.

The question made in this record is, Can a prisoner, after conviction according to law of a capital offense, demand a trial by a jury in the superior court on the question of his mental condition, in order that the insanity, if assisted district attorney, and a report thereon which forms a part of the record of the case, do not estop the state from entering into any further investigation as to his mental condition, the written report not being conclusive proof as to such condition. State, ex rel. Chandler, 45 La. Ann. 696.

So, where the jury disagree on the trial of a special plea of insanity in a criminal prosecution the trial that follows is to be conducted in the usual manner and the general verdict will conclude the special plea of insanity. French v. State, 93 Wis. 325.

And the issue of insanity cannot be again tried upon the trial of the principal issue where the statute provides that in such event the court shall proceed to trial upon the main issue. French v. State, 93 Wis. 325.

But the fact that it appeared to the court in a criminal prosecution that there was a question as to the sanity of the accused at the time of the commission of the offense does not create a manifest necessity for the discharge of the jury within the meaning of a statute authorizing it in case of manifest necessity, and in case of such discharge the accused cannot be tried again before another jury, but is entitled to his discharge. Gruber v. State, 3 W. Va. 699.

A finding that the accused was insane at the time an offense was committed by a jury impaneled to inquire as to his sanity at the time of the trial, however, is a good defense in bar of a further prosecution for the crime. Gruber v. State, 3 W. Va. 699.

And no trial ought to proceed to the condemnation of a man who by the providence of God is rendered totally incapable of speaking for himself or of instructing others to speak for him. Kinloch's Case, 18 How. St. Tr. 395.

The question on a trial had upon a suggestion that the defendant is insane at the time of his proposed trial is as to the present sanity of the defendant, and a verdict in such a trial is admissible and conclusive in a second trial as to the question of sanity or insanity at the time it was rendered, and may be received in evidence as tending to prove present insanity. People v. Farrell, 81 Cal. 576.

Though in West Virginia when the accused is found to be insane at the time of trial, the jury may then proceed to inquire as to his sanity at the time of the commission of the criminal act. Gruber v. State, 3 W. Va. 699.

So, there is a severance of the cases of two defendants jointly indicted when one of them is adjudged insane on a separate trial of that issue and ordered confined in the insane hospital and his trial postponed until his recovery, and the other is subsequently arraigned and tried alone. Marler v. State, 67 Ala. 55, 42 Am. Rep. 95, 38 L. R. A.

A verdict finding a person accused of crime to be mute by the visitation of God, however, is not an absolute bar to her being tried upon the indictment, and such person may be arraigned and sentenced, but great diligence and circumspection ought to be exercised, and if all means of conveying intelligence to the mind of such a person respecting the nature of the arraignment should prove ineffectual the plea of not guilty should be entered for the prisoner, and it would then become the duty of the court to inquire touching all those points of which the prisoner might take advantage and examine the proceedings with a critical eye and render her every possible service consistent with the rules of law. King v. Steel, 1 Leach, C. L. 451.

So, when in a preliminary examination a person is found insane the law interposes for the protection of his life until he is restored to reason, and in the meantime he will be kept in close confinement for the protection of society. People v. Lake, 3 Park. Crim. Rep. 215.

And the result should be certified to the proper court having jurisdiction where it will be the foundation of an order committing him to an asylum. State v. O'Grady, 8 Ohio Legal News, 137. And see Com. v. Hathaway, 13 Mass. 299; Ex parte Trice, 53 Ala. 548, supra, II; and Webber v. Com. 119 Pa. 223, supra, IV. a.

In England a finding of insanity of the accused in a proceeding to ascertain whether he was sane or insane under 39 & 40 Geo. III. chap. 94, § 2, warrants the issue of an order that the accused be detained in custody during her majesty's pleasure. Reg. v. Davies, 6 Cox, C. C. 326, 3 Car. & K. 323; Rex v. Pritchard, 7 Car. & P. 303; Turner's Case, cited in Sheffield on Lunacy, 409.

And the defendant on a trial for a misdemeanor, where he appears to be insane and the jury find him so, may be ordered to be confined by the court under that statute as well as in cases of treason, murder, and felony. Rex v. Little, Russ. & R. C. C. 430.

And a deaf and dumb person charged with crime may be detained to be instructed if the jury find that she is too ignorant to be put upon her trial. Dyson's Case, 1 Lewin, C. C. 64.

But where the jury in a criminal prosecution are of opinion that the person did not in fact do all that the law deems essential to constitute the offense charged they must find him not guilty generally, and the court has no power to order his detention under 39 & 40 Geo. III. chap. 94, § 2, although the jury should be clearly of opinion that the person was in fact insane. Reg. v. Oxford, 9 Car. & P. 525.

The imprisonment in the penitentiary of a person afflicted with epilepsy who had violated the established, may operate to suspend the execution of the judgment in the case? The record shows that Elizabeth Nobles was convicted and sentenced to death in July, 1895, and that the sentence was not executed. She was called before the court in June, 1896, not for the purpose of being sentenced, because the sentence had been already imposed, but for the purpose of fixing a new time for the execution of the sentence. A person convicted of a capital offense is never sentenced, under the law of this state, but one time. The sentence is the conclusion of the record, and, once entered, the record is complete. It may be that the time fixed in the sentence expires, but the sentence stands in full force. Therefore the life of Elizabeth Nobles was absolutely forfeited by the verdict and the judgment or sentence which was rendered in July, 1895; and, if execution ever takes place, it will be by virtue of this sentence, though at a different time from that originally named. What is commonly referred to as a "resentence" is only the fixing of a new time for the execution of a sentence. The language of the Penal Code (§ 1045) in reference to providing a time for the execution of the death sentence seems to be conclusive of the question that one sentence is all that is ever imposed in a capital case, and that that sentence is to be executed either at the time fixed therein, or at such other time as the judge or other lawful authority of this state shall fix thereafter. "Whenever, for any reason, any convict sentenced to the punishment of death shall not have been executed pursuant to such sentence, and the same shall stand in full force, the presiding judge of the superior court where the conviction was had, on the application of penal laws of the state is not, in view of his affliction, unconstitutional as cruel and unusual punishment. Fogarty v. State, 80 Ga. 450.

So, in Re Staudermann, 8 Abb. N. C. 187, upon a report of the commissioners in lunacy that the defendant who was convicted of murder was an epileptic, but that he could not be considered to have arrived at that condition of diathetic permanency necessary to constitute complete insanity at law, and that his was a case of what the courts have always termed partial insanity, and his status was akin to that of the habitual drunkard who kills while in the delirium of mania a potu, and that no commission of experts previous to his arrest would have certified him as a fit subject for a lunatic asylum, the governor commuted the sentence of the prisoner to imprisonment for life.

A refusal to instruct the jury in a criminal prosecution that if the accused is proved to be non compos mentis the court is authorized to send him to an asylum is not error, however, where they were fully instructed as to the law of insanity. State v. Robinson, 27 S. C. 615.

And the Missouri statute providing for the restraint of persons who are acquitted on the ground of insanity has reference solely to insanity existing at the time of the trial, and the question is solely and exclusively for the determination of the court with which neither the jury nor counsel have anything to do, and where attention is called to it by counsel upon the trial of an indictment it is not improper for the court to state that it would never make an order to send a sane man to the asylum. State v. Klinger, 46 Mo. 224.

VII. Insanity after verdict.

Sentence should be stayed in a criminal prosecution where the accused after verdict and before sentence becomes insane. State v. Brinyea, 5 Ala. 241; State v. Vann, 84 N. C. 722.

The court may after the verdict and before sentence cause an investigation to be made as to the sanity of a person convicted upon suggestion of the district attorney, where doubts arise in respect to it both under the inherent power of the court and under La. Rev. Stat. § 1768, giving direct authority. State, ex rel. Chandler, 45 La. Ann. 696.

And an inquiry by a jury of the panel as to the sanity or insanity of a person accused of crime after the report of a medical commission appointed by the court to examine into his mental condition is not improper as violative of article 6 of the Louisiana Constitution of 1879 or as an attempt to deprive him of his liberty without due process of law. State, ex rel. Chandler, 45 La. Ann. 696.

So, where a person appears to be insane during his trial but not at the date of the commission of the crime for which he is being tried the jury may say so in their verdict, when the court will delay judgment, or execution if issued will be stayed. Com. v. Taylor, 16 Phila. 430.

The question on an inquisition of insanity after a verdict of guilty in a criminal prosecution is not whether the defendant had a fair trial, but whether the defendant was incapable of comprehending the dangerous position in which he was placed and of taking intelligent measures to meet it, and whether the person at the time of his trial was so far of unsound mind as to be incapable of comprehending the nature of the charge against him and of properly presenting his defense, it being the same as that raised by a suggestion of insanity when the prisoner is called upon to plead. United States v. Lancaster, 7 Biss. 440.

And while the burden of proof on an inquisition of insanity after a verdict of guilty in a criminal prosecution rests with the defendant to satisfy the jury that he is in fact insane if the proof when all considered together leaves a reasonable doubt as to his insanity, he should have the benefit of such doubt. United States v. Lancaster, 7 Biss. 440.

And an issue to be submitted to the jury is the proper mode of ascertaining the truth of an allegation that the accused has become insane. State v. Vann, 84 N. C. 722.

The judge in a prosecution for homicide in which the accused has been found guilty of murder and alleges that he is a lunatic as a reason why sentence should not be pronounced against him however, may, if he is satisfied of the falsity, pronounce the sentence without impanelling a jury to ascertain the fact, but in case of doubt or difficulty a venire should be awarded to ascertain the fact. Bonds v. State, Mart. & Y. 143, 17 Am. Dec. 796.

But no right of trial by jury of the question of present insanity of a person accused of crime exists where the jury has found a verdict upon the general issue against the plea of insanity set up as a defense to conviction; the mode of trial rests in the discretion of the court, the plea at this stage being only an appeal to the humanity of the court to postpone the punishment until a recovery takes place or as a merciful dispensation. Laros v. Com. 84 Pa. 200. See on this point BAUGHN V. STATE.

And it is not error for the court to refuse to submit the issue of insanity to the jury under Cal. Penal Code, § 1388, when a defendant is brought up for judgment on conviction where the court entertains no doubt as to his sanity. People v. Pico, 63 Cal. 50.

And sentence will not be stayed in a criminal prosecution on the ground of the insanity of the accused where there is nothing to show that any change in his condition had taken place since the impanelling of the jury, as to stay it for the pur-the solicitor general of the circuit, or other person prosecuting for the state, shall issue a habeas corpus to bring such convict before him; or if such convict be at large, said judge, or any judicial officer of this state, may issue a warrant for his apprehension; and upon the convict being brought before the judge, either by habeas corpus, or under such warrant, he shall proceed to inquire into the facts and circumstances of the case, and if no legal reason exists against the execution of the sentence, he shall sign and issue a warrant to the sheriff of the proper county, commanding him to do execution of such sentence at such time and place as shall be appointed therein, which the sheriff shall do accordingly; and the judge shall cause the proceedings to be entered on the minutes of the superior court of the county."

In the case of Harris v. State, 2 Ga. 290, where complaint was made that the prisoner was improperly sentenced under the provisions of the law contained in the section above quoted, the court says: "The sentence was pose of an inquisition as to his sanity would be in effect to arrest judgment for the same reason which had been unsuccessfully urged before the jury in defense of the criminal charge. State v. Brinyea, 5 Ala. 241.

So, a plea of insanity at bar when a person accused of homicide is called for sentence, uncorroborated by the affidavit of any friend, counsel, physician, jailer, or attendant, must be disregarded where there is nothing in it to raise a doubt in the mind of the court as to the prisoner's sanity. Com. v. Buccieri, 153 Pa. 535.

And a new trial will not be granted in a prosecution for homicide on the ground of the insanity of the defendant during the progress of the trial preventing proper consultation with his counsel where there was no evidence of such insanity. Com. v. Winnemore, 1 Brewst. (Pa.) 356.

So, it has been held that a jury will not be impaneled to determine the sanity of one convicted of a criminal offense, where such question was directly put in issue on the trial. Stover v. Com. 92 Va. 780.

And that a commission to inquire into the sanity of a person convicted of murder in the first degree will not be allowed where the defense of insanity was made at the trial. Com. v. Baranski, 36 Pittsb. L. J. 363.

And that where the question of insanity has been passed upon by the jury, a motion to stay the sentence cannot be entertained. State v. Brinyea, 5 Ala. 241.

The case of BAUGHN v. STATE, recently affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, sub nom. Nobles v. Georgia, 184 U. S. 398, 42 L. ed. — (Advance Sheets, Dec. 15, 1897, p. 144), holds that a denial of a jury trial on an issue of insanity after verdict is not a denial of due process of law.

VIII. Insanity after judgment.

The general rule is that a person, though adjudged to punishment, cannot be punished for a public offense while insane. People v. Schmitt, 106 Cal. 43.

Where a person becomes a lunatic after conviction for a criminal act he can be removed to the asylum on proper proceedings had therefor. Hill v. State, 64 Ga. 453.

And a circuit-court judge has power after the expiration of a term to issue the writ of error coram nobis to reverse a judgment of conviction in a criminal case where it appears that the defendant, 88 L. R. A.

suspended, by the supersedeas consequent upon the first bill of exceptions, until the same was affirmed by this court by the dismissal of the case. It was then in full force. The court below therefore had the right under the Code, upon habeas corpus, to command the sheriff to do execution of the sentence." If we are correct in this interpretation, then on June 28, 1896, when the prisoner was brought before the court for the purpose of being sentenced, she was already under sentence of death, the same having been pronounced in July, 1895; and therefore an application for an investigation into her mental condition could have been had according to the exact terms of the law as embodied in Penal Code, § 1047, providing for such investigation; that is, she was a convict who had been sentenced to the punishment of death, and her presence before the court was simply for the purpose of fixing a time for the execution of such sentence. This being true, it is not necessary to decide what would be the right of a person who demanded an investigation into his mental condition in order was insane at the time of the trial and it was not then made known; and if such fact is disputed by the state a jury may be impaneled in term to try the issue, and the venue of the trial may be changed to another county, but the change carries the whole case. Adler v. State, 35 Ark. 517, 37 Am. Rep. 48.

So, where no plea of present insanity is interposed in a prosecution for homicide, and there is anything in the record or conduct of the accused to create a suspicion of such insanity, the appellate court will of its own motion inquire into his present mental state and make proper recommendation for commutation of sentence and removal to the insane asylum if he is found to be insane. Green v. State, 86 Tenn. 634.

And where there is evidence of present insanity upon an inquisition as to the sanity or insanity of a person accused of crime alleged to have supervened after his conviction and proof that since his conviction he presented by his acts, words, looks, and conduct evidence of insanity, an inquiry may be made into his past life to see if he had been insane or in a previous condition of insanity tending to explain and illustrate his present condition. Spann v. State, 47 Ga. 549.

Under the Georgia statutes in case of a convict becoming insane it is the duty of the sheriff, with the concurrence of the inferior court, to summon a jury of twelve men to inquire into such insanity. Spann v. State, 47 Ga. 549; Nobles v. Georgia, 184 U. S. 398, 42 L. ed. — (Advance Sheets, Dec. 15, 1897, p. 144), Affirming principal case.

No provision is made for the mode of trial, and if it appear on the inquisition that the prisoner is insane the sheriff must suspend the execution and report the inquisition and suspension to the judges who direct the report to be entered on the minutes. Spann v. State, 47 Ga. 549.

But the words "after conviction," in Ga. Code 1882, § 4666a, providing for determination of the question of insanity, are not to be construed as limited to persons who have also been sentenced by force of the preceding § 4666, which provides for an investigation after a convict has been sentenced. Nobles v. Georgia, 184 U. S. 398, 42 L. ed. — (Advance Sheets, Dec. 15, 1897, p. 144), Affirming principal case.

And the determination as to the insanity of a person after sentence and conviction is not insufficient to constitute due process of law on the ground that the investigation is not judicial in its

to establish the fact that he became insane after verdict and before sentence. If it were necessary to decide this question, it could be, with propriety, held that the prisoner was not entitled to be heard upon this question between verdict and sentence, because there was no necessity for such hearing. Without sentence the verdict can never be carried into effect. The moment that sentence is pronounced the right to apply for an investigation under § 1047 of the Penal Code is complete. We therefore treat this as the application of a person convicted and sentenced, to have the question of her mental condition tried by a jury in the superior court according to the forms of procedure incident to investigations in that court. Has a convict the right, after verdict and sentence, and his life, according to "due process of law," thus forfeited to the state, to demand, as "due process of law," that his mental condition shall be inquired into in order to determine whether the judgment of the court shall go into execution? "Inasmuch as the stage of criminal procedure known as 'pleading' has been passed at the time when, after conviction, the issue as to insanity in bar of sentence is asked for, the point as to constitutional right may not be involved." Carr, Trial of Lunatics, p. 87.

In the case of Laros v. Com., 84 Pa. 200, 210, the court says: "The last three assignments of error raise a single question upon the power of the court to inquire by inspection and per testes into the insanity of the prisoner since verdict. We have no precedents in this state, known to us, how the inquiry shall be conducted when such a plea in bar of sentence is put in. It seems to us, however, that no right of trial by jury is involved in the question. A jury having found a verdict against the plea of insanity when set up as a defense to conviction, subsequent insanity cannot be set up in disproof of the conviction. The plea at this stage is only an appeal to the humanity of the court to postpone the punishment until a recovery takes place, or as a merciful dispensation. The rights of the prisoner as an offender on trial for an offense are not involved.

character, the manner in which the question shall be determined being purely a matter of legislative regulation. Nobles v. Georgia, 168 U. S. 398, 42 L. ed. — (Advance Sheets, Dec. 15, 1897, p. 144). Affirming principal case.

A trial of the question of the insanity of a convict suggested after verdict and sentence, however, is at common law in the discretion of the judge without any absolute right on his part to have the issue tried before a court and jury. Nobles v. Georgia, 168 U. S. 398, 42 L. ed. — (Advance Sheets, Dec. 15, 1897, p. 144). Affirming principal case.

And before the verdict of a jury and the judgment and sentence of the court in a criminal prosecution can be nullified by a finding in a proceeding to determine as to the present sanity or insanity of the accused it should be found that the prisoner is actually insane so as to be wholly unconscious of his situation. Re Schneider, 21 D. C. 433.

And an appellate court cannot act in a criminal case upon the evidence furnished by the present mental condition of the accused who has become insane, and upon that ground reverse a judgment against him which is otherwise legal, though there is nothing to preclude his being put in the state insane asylum. People v. Schmitt, 106 Cal. 48.

And refusal of the court in a prosecution for homicide to receive a plea of lunacy in bar of the sentence of death about to be pronounced is not error where the court upon inspection of the prisoner and upon consideration of the case again found nothing which renders it probable that the defendant was a lunatic, or which makes the matter doubtful. Bonds v. State, 1 Mart. & Y. 143, 17 Am. Dec. 795.

If there is nothing to raise a doubt in the mind of the court as to the sanity of the accused in a criminal prosecution when he is called for sentence, it is not only the right, but the imperative duty, of the court to disregard a plea of insanity in bar of the sentence. Com. v. Buccieri, 153 Pa. 5:3.

And refusal to permit a rearrrangement of the accused in a criminal prosecution at the commencement of a new trial is not error where he had been indicted for murder and on arraignment had pleaded to the indictment and been tried and convicted, and upon appeal the judgment had been reversed and a new trial ordered. People v. McElvaine, 125 N. Y. 596.

And refusal to appoint a commission to examine a report on the question of the present sanity of a person accused of homicide where counsel then tendered an oral plea of not guilty with a specification L. R. A.

tion alleging insanity at the commencement of a new trial after a previous arraignment and plea and trial and conviction and reversal is not error where no proof of insanity is given to support the demand for an inquisition, as it will be inferred that the court made the examination required of it, the determination of the question resting in the discretion of the court. People v. McElvaine, 125 N. Y. 596.

So, Pa. act May 14, 1874, Pub. Laws, 160, providing for the disposition and custody of insane persons charged with and acquitted or convicted of crime has no application to the case of a person convicted of murder in the first degree, and after sentence of death has been pronounced upon him he is remitted to the control of the governor either for execution of the sentence or pardon in the manner prescribed by law. Ex parte Briggs, 14 W. N. C. 341; Ex parte Wilson, 19 W. N. C. 37; Baranoski's Case, 9 Pa. Co. Ct. 264.

Nor does Pa. act May 8, 1883, Pub. Laws, 21, § 29, relative to the supervision and control of hospitals and homes in which the insane are placed for treatment, apply. Baranoski's Case, 9 Pa. Co. Ct. 264.

And the court cannot after conviction and sentence control the action of the governor by the appointment of a commission or otherwise, he being the sole judge of the circumstances which may influence him to exercise clemency or enforce the execution. Baranoski's Case, 9 Pa. Co. Ct. 264.

So, the supreme court will not appoint a commission to determine as to the sanity of a person accused of murder in the first degree upon the affidavit of physicians that they believed the prisoner to be insane and in an unfit mental condition to undergo capital punishment, where the governor had previously declined to interfere with the sentence of the court which tried him. Ex parte McGinnis, 14 W. N. C. 221.

IX. Appeals.

As a general rule no appeal from the determination in a proceeding to determine as to present sanity or insanity of a person accused of crime has been provided for.

Thus, the holding of the court upon a demand by the accused in a criminal prosecution, made after conviction upon a plea that he had become insane, for a jury trial of the question of his insanity, and asking for a continuance of the cause to prepare for trial, that he was entitled to a jury to inquire into the fact, and if it should be found favorably to him the judgment must be suspended until his san-

He has had the benefit of a jury trial, and it is now the court only which must be satisfied on the score of humanity. If the right of trial by jury exist at all, it must exist at all times, no matter how often the plea is repeated alleging insanity occurring since the last verdict. Such a right is inconsistent with the due administration of justice. There must be a sound discretion to be exercised by the court. If a case of real doubt arise, a just judge will not fail to relieve his own conscience by submitting the fact to a jury." It is in the power of any person interested in the prisoner to call for an investigation, under Penal Code, § 1047, or the judge himself may order the investigation. The purpose of the legislature evidently was to carry out the principle referred in the decision above quoted, and provide a method for the trial of a question which simply involved a plea to the humanity of the court to postpone the punishment of an insane person until a recovery takes place.

In the case of Jones v. State, 18 Ala. 153, the court in dealing with the question of insanity at the time of trial, says: "Although we are of opinion that the facts disclosed in the bill of exceptions might well have warranted the preliminary inquiry as to the prisoner's mental condition, yet this must be left to the sound discretion of the court. If amid the mystery and veil which shrouds the phenomena of mental aberration, so difficult to penetrate, the judge should be mistaken, and try an insane man (as we incline to think has been done in the case before us), it will present a case in which there may be a strong appeal to executive clemency." In the case of Spann v. State, 47 Ga. 551, in referring to the law now contained in Penal Code, § 1047, Judge McCay says: "The stay for insanity seems to depend on the discretion of the judge at common law. 1 Hale, P. C. 370. He may call in a jury if he pleases. The whole proceeding is merely a stay of execution, and is based rather upon the public will, and a sense of propriety, than on any right in the prisoner. . . . The whole proceeding is rather an inquiry based on public propriety and decency than a matter of right."

While the question as to whether the section under consideration was due process of law is ity is restored, remanding him to prison and continuing the case that the issue might be taus tried, —is not appealable at the instance of the prosecution. State v. Vann, 84 N. C. 772.

So, where a verdict is rendered under 74 Ohio Laws, 839, § 1, Rev. Stat. 7240, 7241, providing that if the jury find the accused to be sane and no trial has been had on the indictment a trial shall be had thereon as if the question had not been tried finding a person to be sane, error will not lie to reverse such proceeding for alleged errors therein, either before or after conviction. Inskeep v. State, 36 Ohio St. 145, 35 Ohio St. 432.

And a verdict and judgment of a jury impaneled to try an issue whether the accused in a criminal prosecution is now sane, rendered after a verdict and judgment of conviction and an appeal therefrom adjudging him to be sane, is not appealable under the Texas statute, the right to appeal being given a defendant in a criminal action only from a judgment of conviction. Darnell v. State, 24 Tex. App. 6.

Nor can error committed on a trial as to present insanity be reviewed on bills of exceptions in New York and does not constitute ground for reversing the judgment afterwards entered on the trial of the indictment. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216.

And the writ of certiorari does not lie from the finding of a jury summoned under Ga. Code, § 4606, to inquire into the sanity of a person who had been convicted of a capital offense and sentenced to be executed and who is alleged to have become insane after such conviction, proceedings thereunder being in the nature of an inquisition not judicial in character, and the statute providing that the inquiry is to be made by the jury and conferring no authority upon anyone to give any direction as to the inquiry, and making no provision for reviewing the same. Carr v. State, 96 Ga. 80.

So, in Spann v. State, 47 Ga. 549, the question whether certiorari would lie to review a determination upon an inquisition as to the sanity of a party accused of crime under the Georgia statute was discussed but not decided, but it was strongly intimated that it would not lie, the court saying that it would be a perversion of terms to call an inquisition of this kind the act of the court, and that the whole proceeding is rather an inquiry based on public propriety and decency than a matter of right.

In California, however, it would seem that there may be an appeal on an issue as to present sanity or insanity. See People v. Moice, 15 Cal. 329, supra, VI.

As to right of appeal from the determination of the court as to whether or not the issue should be submitted, see supra, IV. c.

X. Effect of recovery.

Insanity intervening between the time of the commission of the offense and the trial of the accused therefor will not exculpate the person. Jones v. State, 18 Ala. 153.

And one who commits a crime and becomes insane is amenable therefor upon restoration to sanity upon the same footing as other persons committing criminal acts. State v. Pritchett, 106 N. C. 667.

The postponement of a trial of an insane person will not discharge him from a future trial when his disability shall be removed. Kinloch's Case, 18 How. St. Tr. 365.

And a person accused of crime who was adjudged insane and incapable of pleading and sent to an asylum may be required to plead and be put on trial upon his apparent restoration to sanity without making a formal inquiry as to his later condition. State v. Pritchett, 106 N. C. 667.

And though the authorities of the insane asylum have not certified that he has recovered. State v. Pritchett, 106 N. C. 667.

And where a person accused of crime has been determined to be insane at the time it was intended to try him by a jury summoned for that purpose, upon his subsequent apparent recovery the court may proceed to a trial of the case without having first instituted an additional inquiry into his personal sanity which would have resulted in a formal reversal or vacation of the previous judgment that he was insane. People v. Farrell, 31 Cal. 573.

A person accused of crime cannot be kept in an asylum until his recovery and then placed in jail to be again tried under Tenn. act of 1871, chap. 138, § 7, however, where the evidence as to his insanity was given under a plea of not guilty and related to the time of the criminal act charged and not to the time of the trial, as such statute relates to insanity at the time of the trial only. Firby v. State, 3 Bart. 353.

F. H. B.

not involved directly in the case of Carr v. State, 98 Ga. 89, still in passing upon the right of the superior court to review a proceeding under that section by certiorari, the majority of the court recognized the proceeding as being "rather an inquiry based on public propriety and decency, than upon any right of the [defendant] prisoner." The effect of that decision was to hold that no judicial investigation was required to be given to a person as a matter of right, and that all investigations after conviction were simply to inform the court imposing sentence as to the mental condition of the prisoner, for the sole purpose of determining whether it would be consistent with public decency and propriety to take away the life of a person who had not mind enough to realize what was being done. There being no law in force in this state which authorizes or requires the judge of the superior court to enter into an investigation of the mental condition of Elizabeth Nobles at the time and in the manner prayed for in the petition filed in her behalf, the refusal by the judge to enter into such investigation was not a denial to her of "due process of law;" and there was therefore no error in declining to entertain such petition and in denying "each and every prayer" therein.

Judgment affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE of the State of New York, ex rel.
NEW YORK INSTITUTION FOR THE BLIND, Respts.,

v.

Asbhel P. FITCH, Comptroller of the City of New York, Appt.

(154 N. Y. 14.)

1. An incorporated institution for the blind which has been supported and its property purchased and maintained mainly by appropriations from the state, although it may be only an educational institution so far as it educates paying pupils, is to be regarded, so far as it clothes, educates, and maintains indigent pupils at public expense or by donations from individuals, as a charitable institution subject to the visitation and the rules of the board of charities under Laws 1896, chap. 771, and also to the restriction under Const. art. 8, § 14, against payments by municipalities for any inmate not received and retained pursuant to rules established by the state board of charities.
2. An institution which is educational to some extent may be also a charitable institution within the meaning and intent of the Constitution and statutes respecting charitable institutions.
3. The fact that an institution is subject to the visitation of the superintendent of public instruction is not conclusive against regarding it as a charitable institution subject to the visitation of a board of charities.
4. The constitutional provision that the legislature shall provide for a system of free common schools wherein all the children of the state may be educated has no application to an institution wholly or partly under private control.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming an order of a special term for New York County granting a writ of mandamus requiring defendant to audit and pay a claim of relator for material furnished charity inmates of the relator institution. Reversed.

Messrs. Francis M. Scott and T. E. Hancock, for appellant:

It became the plain duty of the legislature, after the adoption of the Constitution of 1894, to bring the existing mandatory statutes making appropriations to charities into harmony with the new principle.

The functions of the superintendent of public instruction toward the relator do not exclude the jurisdiction of the state board of charities.

Rev. Const. art. 8, § 18.

Messrs. Bowers and Sands, for respondents:

The New York Institution for the Blind is not of a charitable, eleemosynary, correctional, or reformatory character, and therefore is not subject to the visitation of the state board of charities.

A college or other institution primarily established for imparting instruction cannot be called a charitable or eleemosynary institution within the meaning and intent of §§ 11 and 14 of art. 8 of the Constitution.

Under the Constitution of 1895 the legislature may appropriate money for the education of persons in the New York Institution for the Blind, although such persons are not received and retained pursuant to rules made by the state board of charities.

The expression of a particular intent as to the education and support of the blind certainly governs the expression of a general intent as to care, support, and maintenance (nothing said about education) of inmates of charitable, eleemosynary, correctional, and reformatory institutions.

Hoey v. Gilroy, 129 N. Y. 188; Townsend v. Little, 109 U. S. 504, 27 L. ed. 1012; Standen v. University of Oxon. W. Jones, 26; Churchill v. Crease, 5 Bing. 180; De Winton, v. Brecon, 26 Beav. 533; State, Barlett, v. Trenton, 38 N. J. L. 68.

The intent of the Constitution was to subject alone institutions distributing alms for the support and maintenance of the poor to the visitation of the state board of charities. It was not the intent of the Constitution to subject educational institutions to the supervision of such board.

Martin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented in this case involves the consideration and construction of certain provisions of the Constitution and of the statutes by which the relator was organized and continued, and by which it has been supported and the management of its affairs controlled. These provisions of the Constitution are new, having gone into operation on the 1st day of January, 1895. So far as applicable here, they provide: "Neither the credit nor the money of the state shall be given or loaned to or in aid of any association, corporation, or private undertaking. This section shall not, however, prevent the legislature from making such provision for the education and support of the blind, the deaf and dumb, and juvenile delinquents, as to it may seem proper." Article 8, § 9. "No county, city, town, or village shall hereafter give any money or property; or loan its money or credit to or in aid of any individual, association, or corporation; or become directly or indirectly the owner of stock in, or bonds of, any association or corporation; nor shall any such county, city, town, or village be allowed to incur any indebtedness except for county, city, town, or village purposes. This section shall not prevent such county, city, town, or village from making such provision for the aid or support of its poor as may be authorized by law." Article 8, § 10. Section 11 of article 8 provides for a state board of charities, which shall visit and inspect all institutions of a charitable, eleemosynary, correctional, or reformatory character, except those for the insane and adult criminals. Section 13 provides that the visitation and inspection provided for therein shall not be exclusive of other visitation and inspection (then) now authorized by law. Section 14 declares: "Nothing in this Constitution contained shall prevent the legislature from making such provision for the education and support of the blind, the deaf and dumb, and juvenile delinquents, as to it may seem proper; or prevent any county, city, town, or village from providing for the care, support, maintenance, and secular education of inmates of orphan asylums, homes for dependent children or correctional institutions, whether under public or private control. Payments by counties, cities, towns, and villages to charitable, eleemosynary, correctional, and reformatory institutions wholly or partly under private control, for care, support, and maintenance, may be authorized, but shall not be required by the legislature. No such payments shall be made for any inmate of such institutions who is not received and retained therein pursuant to rules established by the state board of charities. Such rule shall be subject to the control of the legislature by general laws." After the adoption of the amended Constitution the legislature enacted a statute which, in substance, authorized the administrative boards or officers of counties, towns, and municipalities in their discretion to appropriate and pay to charitable, eleemosynary, correctional, or reformatory institutions, wholly or partly under private control, for the care, support, and maintenance of inmates, but to be made only for such as were received and retained pursuant to rules established by the state board of charities. Laws 1895, chap. 754. In the same year the legislature passed an act to revise and consolidate the laws relating to that board, which in substance declare that it should be its duty to visit, inspect, and maintain a general supervision of all institutions, societies, or associations which were of a charitable, eleemosynary, correctional, or reformatory character, whether state or municipal, incorporated or not incorporated, which were made subject to its supervision by the Constitution; that the institutions subject to its supervision should include all institutions, societies, and associations which were of a charitable, eleemosynary, reformatory, or correctional character or design; and that institutions for the deaf and dumb and blind should be subject to such visitation and inspection by the state board of charities as the Constitution provides. Laws 1895, chap. 771, §§ 2, 9, 11. It is upon these provisions of the Constitution and statutes that the appellant relies. His claim is that, as the inmates of the relator were not received or retained by it pursuant to the rules established by the board of charities, it was not entitled to the relief which has been awarded. That the relator was wholly or partly under private control, and that the inmates for whose clothing it seeks to recover were not so received or retained, are admitted.

This court has already held that the provisions of the Constitution relating to this subject operated presently, so that, from the time rules were established by the state board of charities, no payments for inmates not received or retained in pursuance thereof would be justified. People, Inebriates' Home, v. Brooklyn, 152 N. Y. 399. Indeed, it is practically conceded by both parties that if the relator is a charitable, eleemosynary, correctional, or reformatory institution, the decisions of the courts below were incorrect, and the orders appealed from should be reversed. That it is either a correctional or reformatory institution is claimed by neither. Thus, the single question to be determined by this court is whether the relator is a charitable or eleemosynary institution. To a proper understanding of that question, it is necessary to ascertain the nature of the New York Institution for the Blind, and the purpose for which it was organized and continued. To that end, a brief history of its organization, the management of its affairs, the manner in which it has been supported, and the class of persons who have been its inmates, seems to be required:

In 1831 Dr. Ackley, who had previously been active in organizing and carrying into operation institutions for the education of the deaf and dumb, turned his attention to the matter of the instruction of the blind. Associating with himself a number of other benevolent gentlemen, they sought to establish an institution wherein the unfortunate blind might be educated, and at the same time learn some useful trade or business by which to obtain a livelihood in after years. With this object in view, they procured the institution of the relator to be organized under and by chapter 214 of the laws of that year. The purpose of its organization, as stated in that act, was the instruction of children who were born blind, or might have become so by disease or accident, and it required the institution to apply its funds or property to that purpose alone. Its first work seems to have been commenced that year in a small room in Canal street, where children taken from the almshouse were instructed under the control of Dr. John D. Russ, who remained in charge of the institution until its utility was established. Its first president was Samuel Ackley, and there were associated with him, as managers and officers of the institution, gentlemen whose known philanthropy was such as to show quite plainly that the purpose of the institution was a benevolent one, and that it was not intended to be one of profit to the corporators. Although the education of the blind had previously been, to some extent, successfully attempted in Europe, the relator seems to have been a pioneer in that work in this country. An institution had been organized in 1829 in Massachusetts, through the exertions of Dr. John D. Foster, under the name of the New England Asylum for the Blind, which was subsequently known as the Perkins Institution and Massachusetts Asylum for the Blind, but it was not opened until 1832. It was first under the charge of Dr. Samuel D. Howe, who commenced in a private house on Pleasant Street, in the city of Boston, with six pupils. In 1833 a similar institution was organized in Philadelphia through the efforts of Robert Vaux. Thus, the idea of organizing special institutions for the instruction of the blind seems to have occurred to humane and benevolent persons in New England, New York, and Philadelphia at about the same time, and without any apparent concert of action. All these institutions were organized and carried into operation through the efforts of the benevolent, and to accomplish a work of charity that had hitherto been neglected in this country.

In 1834 (chap. 316) the relator was authorized to receive four indigent blind persons from each "senate" district in like manner and at like expense to the state as provided by law for the indigent deaf and dumb. Such indigent blind persons, besides their literary or school education, were to be instructed in some trade or employment taught and carried on in the institution. At that time the deaf and dumb were furnished with board, lodging, and tuition, for which the state paid the institution in which they were maintained and educated. Laws 1822, chap. 284; Laws 1830, chap. 170. In 1836 (chap. 226) $12,000 was appropriated to be paid to the relator, to purchase in fee simple the 2 acres of ground occupied by it, and to defray the expenses of repairing the buildings thereon, the conveyance to be made to the state; and it was to receive from each senate district four indigent blind persons in addition to the number then supported by the state, to be supported in like manner and at like expense. In the same year, by chapter 399, the preceding statute was amended and partially repealed. It made the appropriation of $12,000 subject to the condition that the managers should raise $8,000, which, with the $12,000, was to be applied to the purchase of the premises occupied by the relator, to the erection of a workshop, and to repair the buildings thereon. It then provided that the title should be vested in the managers, but that the premises so purchased should be used by them solely for the benefit of the blind, and as provided by the 3d section of chapter 226, which required the managers to receive from each senate district four indigent blind persons in addition to the number then supported by the state. The managers were required to report to the legislature each year. In 1839 (chap. 200) the relator was authorized to receive from each senate district eight additional indigent blind persons, to be educated and maintained in the same manner as provided in the previous statutes; and the sum of $15,000 was appropriated, to be paid in three annual instalments, upon condition that the managers should raise $10,000, which sums were to be applied to pay for the labor and materials necessary to complete the structure upon the premises, and to remove the old buildings thereon. It also provided for clothing such pupils by the counties from which they were sent, the amount not to exceed $20 for each pupil. In 1841 (chap. 175) the legislature appropriated to the relator the sum of $5,000 for the purpose of leveling and grading the grounds belonging to it, providing necessary fixtures, and erecting and completing a wing to the main building, on condition that the relator should raise the sum of $7,000, to be applied to that purpose. In 1845 (chap. 58) there was appropriated to the relator the sum of $25,000, $5,000 to be paid annually for the period of five years, and the managers were required to report under oath to the legislature as to the expenditure of the money so appropriated. In 1848 (chap. 198) the act of 1881, organizing the relator, was amended by adding, "and also for the purpose of affording an asylum and employment for other blind persons." By the same act the legislature appropriated to the relator the sum of $15,000, to be applied to the erection of workshops and other necessary buildings for providing an asylum and employment for the adult blind. In 1852 (chap. 338) the act incorporating the relator was continued, and it was provided that it should receive from each senate district four indigent blind persons to be maintained and educated at the expense of the state; the indigent blind persons then in the institution to form a part of the number to be admitted under that act. In 1859 (chap. 278) it was provided that the relator might sell or convey its real estate in the city of New York between Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth streets and Eighth and Ninth avenues, when the managers deemed it expedient; that $100,000 of the amount received should be invested upon bond and mortgage, $8,000 applied equally to the immediate relief of certain of the adult blind in the institution, the residue expended in the purchase of other real estate for the use of the institution and the erection of suitable buildings, and that any balance should be invested in stocks of the state, or of the cities of Brooklyn or New York, for the benefit and use of the relator. In 1858, $16,640 was appropriated for the instruction of 128 pupils in that institution. And an examination of the various supply bills passed each year from 1853 to the present time discloses appropriations of from $10,000 to $50,000 made in nearly every year for the support of the indigent inmates of the relator, and that they were generally made under the title of "Appropriations for Charitable Institutions." In 1887 (chap. 744) the New York State Institution for the Blind at Batavia was established, and a general scheme for the care and education of the blind was inaugurated. By that statute the relator was to continue to have the custody, charge, maintenance, and education of the pupils intrusted to it by the state, to be compensated as before, and to receive the same amount from the counties for clothing, until the state institution should be ready to receive pupils, when a portion of them was to be transferred to it. The relator, however, was to retain and to continue to receive all pupils from the counties of New York and Kings, to be maintained and educated by it, and to be compensated by the state for their maintenance and education, and for their clothing by the counties from which they were sent. In 1870 an act amending the act incorporating the relator authorized it to receive all such blind persons from New York and Kings, between the ages of eight and twenty-five years, as the superintendent of public instruction should appoint, and the managers should deem of sufficient character and capacity for instruction, who were to be maintained, educated, and supported by the relator at the expense of the state, with a provision authorizing and directing the supervisors of those counties, where, in the opinion of the superintendent the parents or guardians were unable to furnish them with suitable clothing, to annually raise and appropriate $50 for each pupil to be paid to the institution, and applied in furnishing them therewith.

When the relator's claim arose, article 14 of title 15 of the consolidated school law (Laws 1894, chap. 556) provided that all persons possessing the necessary qualifications, who were residents of New York, Kings, Queens, Suffolk, Richmond, Westchester, Putnam, and Rockland counties, should be sent to the institution of the relator; that their board, lodging, and tuition should be paid by the state; that appointments to the institution should be made by the superintendent of public instruction, and where, in his opinion, the applicants were able to bear a portion of the expense, he might impose conditions by which some share of the expense of clothing and education should be borne by their parents, guardians, or friends. The period of instruction for such pupils was five years, but it might be extended to not exceeding eight. During the first thirty-nine years of its existence the whole number of pupils received by the relator was 1,001, being an average of about twenty-six a year. Assuming that each remained in the institution the full term of five years, the average number of pupils in the institution was 180, and about the same number as there were of the indigent blind, who were, before 1870, educated by the relator at the expense of the state. There are now in the institution 177 pupils, thirty of whom are residents of the state of New Jersey, and the remainder are from the counties of New York, Kings, Queens, Suffolk, Rockland, and Richmond. Of these ninety-five are from New York, and the bill presented by the relator for clothing shows that eighty-eight were indigent pupils; and hence that all the pupils in the institution from the county of New York, except seven, were indigent pupils, educated, maintained, and clothed by the state and county.

An examination of the history of the relator, of the statutes organizing and continuing it, and the statutes relating to the management of the affairs of its institution, including the manner of its support and the class of persons who became its inmates, shows that the purpose of its organization was a benevolent one, and that during nearly the entire time from its organization to the present it has been supported, and its property purchased and maintained, mainly by appropriations made by the state, and that it has been treated and regarded as one of the charitable institutions therein. Indeed, that its purpose was a benevolent one was practically admitted by Mr. Waite, who for many years had been the superintendent of the relator, as in his report for the year 1887 he, in substance, said that experience had proved that these schools were essential to the well being of society, and that private philanthropy and public policy could find no work more beneficent and wise in which to unite. The relator is doubtless, to an extent, an educational institution. But that fact alone does not justify the conclusion that it is not a charitable institution, within the meaning and intent of the Constitution and statutes. An institution may be in a sense educational, and at the same time be wholly or partly charitable, as the education and maintenance of indigent pupils while being educated may be the subject of charity as well as support alone. An institution may be both educational and charitable, and, if so, it falls within the provisions of the Constitution and statutes, as it is to be observed that the provisions are that the board of charities shall visit and inspect all institutions which are of a charitable character or design; and hence, to fall within that description, it is not necessary that the institution shall be wholly charitable. It need only be an institution which is wholly or partly charitable in its character and purpose. Nor is the fact that institutions for the instruction of the blind are made subject to the visitation of the superintendent of public instruction controlling in determining this question. It may be conceded that this institution is partially educational, and subject to the visitation of the superintendent of public instruction, and yet by no means follow that it is not an institution which is charitable in its character and purpose, and therefore also subject to the visitation of the board of charities as the Constitution provides that the visitation by the board of charities is not exclusive of any visitation then provided by law, which would clearly include the visitation by the superintendent of public instruction.

The obvious purpose of the legislature in incorporating and continuing the relator, as well as in appropriating the money of the state to the purchase of its real estate, to the erection of its buildings thereon, and to the support of its indigent inmates, was to aid in providing for the education of the unfortunate blind, and, so far as necessary, to aid in supporting and maintaining them, at least while acquiring an education. A need existed on the part of these afflicted people for an education, if one could be acquired. To accomplish this, special schools, employing special methods and special appliances, were required. Without the assistance of the state or the benefactions of individuals, it could not be obtained. To supply this necessity the relator was organized, and the expense of the education of its pupils was defrayed by the state and private contributions, as will be seen from the statutes referred to, and the decisions of our courts in relation to bequests to it. New York Inst. for the Blind v. How, 10 N. Y. 84; Riker v. New York Hospital Soc. 66 How. Pr. 246, 254. It seems quite plain that an institution thus organized and maintained must be regarded as one of a charitable character, within the intent and meaning of the Constitution and statutes. That the New York Institution for the Blind was regarded by the framers of the present Constitution as a charitable institution, as well as educational, is manifest. The attention of the legislature and of the people had been previously called to the subject of the appropriation of the money of the state to the support of the deaf and dumb and blind. In 1891, Supt. Draper called especial attention to the fact that more than $262,000 was annually appropriated to the support of these institutions, that the supervision of the state over them was inefficient, and then observed: "The unadvisedness of expending so much money from the state treasury without close state supervision cannot anywhere be questioned." It is quite obvious that this, with other similar suggestions, the discussion of the subject by the public press, and the numerous petitions presented, called the attention of the convention to the necessity for a closer and more efficient supervision of these institutions. This was a subject which, in the language of the president of the convention, "deeply agitated the minds of the people of the state," and led the convention to the adoption of the provisions under consideration. The president, in stating what had been accomplished by the convention, among other things, said: "Besides that, we have secured the regulation of the state board of charities to this effect: That, wherever any public money is devoted to a private charity for the public service, it shall continue under public control, and the vigilant eye and the strong arm of the people shall be able to follow every dollar of the public money into every institution to which it is so devoted." Again, when we refer to the debates of the convention upon the subject, they show that it was its plain intent to include the relator among the charitable institutions of the state. While referring to the question of the jurisdiction of the state board of charities under the present Constitution, Mr. Lauterbach, who was chairman of the committee on charities, expressly stated that it would have jurisdiction of two institutions for the blind, obviously meaning the relator and the state institution at Batavia, as there seems to be no other in the state. The arrangement of the provisions of the Constitution, as well as the language employed, indicates the same purpose. It will be observed that §§ 9 to 15 of article 8, which contain the provisions as to the education and support of the blind, the deaf and dumb, and juvenile delinquents, relate only to charitable, eleemosynary, correctional, or reformatory institutions, while no mention is made of educational institutions which are not of a charitable character, and §§ 1 to 4 of article 9 relate to institutions within the state which are purely educational. Besides, the various officers of the state, whose duties have led them to consider the relation of the New York Institution for the Blind to the state have, with great uniformity, regarded it as one of the charitable institutions therein. It has been so treated by the several controllers of the state, the superintendents of public instruction, the boards of charities, and by the legislature as well, as will be seen by an examination of the reports of these officers and boards, and the various acts of the legislature appropriating the money of the state for the purchase and maintenance of its property, and for the support of the indigent inmates therein.

It is doubtful if it can be fairly said that the principle here involved has not already been decided by this court. In New York Inst. for the Blind v. How, 10 N. Y. 84, after reviewing the statute by which the relator was organized, and the subsequent statutes relating to its management and the support of its inmates, this court held that the relator was an institution for the support and education of the indigent blind, and was properly described as an institution for the instruction and maintenance of the indigent blind of the city of New York. In Riker v. Leo, 115 N. Y. 98, 102, that case was referred to by Judge Gray, who said: "It was held that though the act of incorporation did not bring the objects of the institution within those described in the will, that 'subsequent legislation had so far modified the charter of the corporation in those particulars that when the will was made these several circumstances had been ingrafted upon it and might well enter into a description of its general scope and purposes.'" In People, Inebriate's Home, v. Brooklyn, 152 N. Y. 399, Andrews, Ch. J., quite thoroughly and exhaustively examined and discussed the history of the public charities of the state, and the origin and purpose of the provisions of the present Constitution relating to that subject. The opinion in that case shows quite plainly that the purpose of the framers of the present Constitution was to bring under the supervision of the board of charities all corporations or institutions of the state that were charitable, or of a charitable character or design, which were wholly or partly under private control, and to prohibit the payment of any public money for the care or maintenance of any inmate of such an institution who was not received and maintained pursuant to rules established by that board. It also shows that the institutions for the care and education of the blind were regarded as charitable institutions, within the meaning of the Constitution and statutes passed in pursuance of its provisions. The opinion in that case is an interesting one, has an instructive and important bearing upon the question under consideration, and seems to practically dispose of it.

Moreover, when we consider the decisions in other jurisdictions, and the doctrine laid down by text-writers, as to what is a charitable institution or a charitable use or trust, they seem to lead to the same conclusion. Thus, in American Asylum v. Phoenix Bank, 4 Conn. 172, 10 Am. Dec. 112, where a corporation had for its sole object the education and instruction of the deaf and dumb, which supported and instructed indigent persons of that class gratuitously, received a pecuniary compensation from pupils of ability to make it, derived its means of dispensing charity from the donations of individuals and of the public, and applied its funds exclusively to the general object of its institution, it was held that it was an institution of a charitable or eleemosynary character. Russell v. Allen, 107 U. S. 163, 27 L. ed. 397, is to the effect that a gift to be employed in founding an institution for the education of the youth of a county is a charitable gift. In Vidal v. Philadelphia, 43 U. S. 2 How. 127, 11 L. ed. 205, it was said that donations for the establishment of colleges, schools, and seminaries of learning, especially for orphans or poor children, were charities in a judicial sense. In Chapin v. School Dist. No. 2, 85 N. H. 445, it was held that a gift to promote education was a charity. Gerke v. Purcell, 25 Ohio St. 229, is to the effect that a charity, in a legal sense, includes, not only gifts for the benefit of the poor, but endowments for the advancement of learning, or institutions for the encouragement of science and art, without any particular reference to the poor, and that schools established by private donations, and which are carried on for the benefit of the public, not with a view of profit, are institutions of purely public charity. The opinion in that case by Judge White is an instructive one upon this question, and he cites many authorities which have a direct bearing upon the question as to what is a charity or a charitable institution. A gift designed to promote the public good by the encouragement of science, learning, and the useful arts, without any reference to the poor, is a charity. American Academy of Arts & Sciences v. Harvard College, 12 Gray. 583. To establish a professorship of the fine arts in a university, or to found an agricultural college, is a charity. Cresson's Appeal, 30 Pa. 437; Price v. Maxwell, 28 Pa. 23; Taylor v. Bryn Mawr College, 34 N. J. Eq. 101. In Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 539, 556, Gray, J., referred to the definition of the word "charitable," as given by Mr. Binney, who defined a charitable or pious gift to be, "Whatever is given for the love of God, or for the love of your neighbor, in the catholic and universal sense,—given from these motives and to these ends,—free from the stain or taint of every consideration that is personal, private, selfish." That definition was approved by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Price v. Maxwell, 28 Pa. 35. The judge then referred to the rule of Lord Camden, adopted by Chancellor Kent, by Lord Lyndhurst, and by the Supreme Court of the United States, which is, "A gift to a general public use, which extends to the poor as well as the rich." Jones v. Williams, 2 Ambl. 652; Coggeshall v. Pelton, 7 Johns. Ch. 292; Mitford v. Reynolds, 1 Phill. Ch. 191, 192; Perin v. Carey, 65 U. S. 24 How. 506, 16 L. ed. 711. He then gave his own definition of the word "charity," as follows: "A charity, in the legal sense, may be more fully defined as a gift, to be applied consistently with existing laws, for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, either by bringing their minds or hearts under the influence of education or religion, by relieving their bodies from disease, suffering, or constraint, by assisting them to establish themselves in life, or by erecting or maintaining public buildings or works, or otherwise lessening the burdens of government." In Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 526, 542, 4 L. ed. 681, 635, Chief Justice Marshall held that that college was an eleemosynary and private corporation. In Angell & Ames on Corporations it is said: "Eleemosynary corporations are such as are instituted upon a principle of charity: their object being the perpetual distribution of the bounty of the founder of them to such persons as he has directed. Of this kind are hospitals for the relief of the impotent, indigent, and sick, or deaf and dumb. And of this kind, also, are all colleges and academies which are founded where assistance is given to the members thereof, in order to enable them to prosecute their studies or devotion with ease and assiduity." Section 39. Morawetz, in his work on Corporations, says: "The distinguishing feature of charitable corporations is, that they are formed for the administration of charitable trusts, and not for the profit of the corporators themselves; for example, corporations formed for the management of free hospitals and asylums for the relief of the poor, insane, blind, or otherwise helpless." Section 4. Kent, in speaking of eleemosynary corporations, says, "In this class are ranked hospitals for the relief of poor, sick, and impotent persons, and colleges and academies established for the promotion of learning and piety, and endowed with property, by public and private donations." 2 Kent, Com. p. 274. In Burrill's Law Dictionary, in defining the word "charitable," it is said: "This word in the expressions 'charitable uses,' 'charitable trusts,' is understood in a very large sense, comprising not only gifts for the benefit of the poor, but endowments for the advancement of learning, or institutions for the encouragement of science and art, and for any other useful and public purpose, as well as donations for pious or religious objects." In Grant on Corporations, 115, it is said: "The legal definition of charity . . . is a gift to a general public use, which extends to the rich as well as poor . . . [and] property held for public purposes is held for charitable uses, in the legal sense of the term 'charity.'" Atty. Gen. v. Heelis, 2 Sim. & Stu. 76; Atty. Gen. v. Dublin, 1 Bligh, N. R. 812, 857. It is doubtless true that in many of the authorities cited the word "charitable" has been given a broader and more comprehensive meaning than should be applied to it as it occurs in the Constitution and statutes relating to the subject under consideration. We think that, in determining the question before us, it should be given only its usual and ordinary meaning, and that, when so understood and applied, the relator must be regarded as a charitable institution, so far as it clothes, educates, and maintains indigent pupils at public expense, or by donations from individuals. So far as it educates pupils who pay for their tuition, board, and maintenance, it is not to be regarded as a charitable, but only as an educational institution. As to those pupils, the board of charities has no jurisdiction or power of supervision. Being to an extent charitable as well as educational, it clearly falls within the provisions of the Constitution and statutes, as an institution of a charitable character or design. The legislature has not attempted, by general laws or otherwise, to control the rules established by the board of charities, and hence the last sentence of § 14 of article 8 of the Constitution has no application to this case.

The contention of the respondent, that the various appropriations for the support and education of indigent blind pupils in its institution have been made in pursuance of the constitutional obligation to provide for the education of all the children of the state, cannot, we think, be sustained. That provision is as follows: "The legislature shall provide for the maintenance and support of a system of free common schools, wherein all the children of the state may be educated." Article 9, § 1. Manifestly, this provision has no application whatever to the appropriations made by the state for the support and education of the indigent blind who have been inmates of the institution of the relator. In the first place, that provision is new, having gone into effect in 1895, and, as nearly all the appropriations made for the care and education of the blind by the relator were anterior to that time, they could not have been based upon it. Besides, that provision relates only to the public or common schools of the state, and has no application to an institution wholly or partly under private control. It seems manifest that the appropriations prior to January 1, 1875, were made independently of the Constitution, because until that time there were no constitutional restrictions upon the power of the legislature to make appropriations of that character. After the amendment which went into effect in 1875, they were made under the special provision of the Constitution as amended, which permitted the legislature to make such provision for the education and support of the blind, the deaf and dumb, and juvenile delinquents, as to it might seem proper. Since the adoption of the Constitution of 1894 the appropriations have been made in pursuance of a similar provision contained in that instrument. That the legislature had power to devote the money of the state to those purposes, under the Constitution as amended in 1874, was clearly recognized in Shepherd's Fold of Protestant Church v. New York, 96 N. Y. 187, 145. In that case Rapallo, J., said: "The general scheme of the constitutional provisions referred to seems to be that the general funds of the state shall not be given to local charitable institutions, except in aid of the blind, the deaf and dumb, and juvenile delinquents." That such institutions were regarded as charitable is to be plainly implied from the language employed. Again, the provision of the Constitution as to the education of all the children of the state in its common schools is a general one, while the provisions for the education and support of the blind, the deaf and dumb, and juvenile delinquents are special, relating only to the classes enumerated. Therefore it is obvious that, as to persons belonging to those classes, the special provisions must govern, to the exclusion of the general one, and the former must be regarded as exceptions to the latter. The claim that, if the institution of the relator is charitable, then all the appropriations made to it by the state since the act of 1870 have been violative of the Constitution, seems wholly untenable. In Shepherd's Fold of Protestant Church v. New York, 96 N. Y. 187, 145, it was held that § 10 of article 8 of the Constitution did not prevent the application of state money to corporations or private institutions for the benefit of the blind, the deaf and dumb, and juvenile delinquents, as it made an exception from the general prohibition in favor of those objects. That seems to be the plain reading of the Constitution. Moreover it was held in that case that under § 11 of article 8 the counties, towns, and municipalities of the state might devote money raised by local taxation to the support of the poor, and that the payment of money by a municipality to a private corporation for the support and education of orphans or friendless children, or for training and educating the children of poor clergymen, came within the exception permitting it to make provision for the support of its poor, and was not in conflict with that section. Within the principle of that case, it seems clear that the state could appropriate its funds for the education and support of the blind, and that counties might appropriate the sum required for clothing the indigent pupils therein who were residents of the county making the appropriation.

If it be said that the 8d section of the act of 1870, requiring the counties of New York and Kings to appropriate money to enable this institution to furnish its indigent pupils with suitable clothing, is mandatory, and hence in conflict with, and abrogated by, § 14 of article 8 of the Constitution as amended in 1894, the answer is that chapter 754 of the Laws of 1895 is the law which controls; and as it was intended to give effect to the amendments of the Constitution in that respect, and to cover the whole subject, it operated as a repeal of that section. If, however, this was not so, and the Constitution abrogated § 8 of the act of 1870, and § 280 of the charter of Greater New York is unconstitutional, I do not perceive how it would in any way change the character of the institution of the relator. It would simply furnish another reason why the decision in this case should be reversed, as in that event the supervisors would not be authorized to raise the amount specified.

Another argument presented by the respondent is that the charter of Greater New York authorizes the board of education to distribute a ratable proportion of the school fund to every pupil in the relator's institution, and hence it must be regarded as educational, and not charitable. The defect in this argument lies chiefly in the assumption of the respondent that an institution cannot be educational, and at the same time a charitable one. We have already seen that very many of the educational institutions of the land have been held to be charitable as well. When title 4 of chapter 18 of the charter of Greater New York, which contains the provisions referred to, is examined, it shows conclusively that many, if not all, the charitable institutions of the city of New York which are to any extent educational are given a ratable proportion of the school fund. It gives a portion of that fund to the schools maintained by the Five Points House of Industry, by the Ladies' Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, by the New York Orphan Asylum, by the Children's Aid Society, by the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, by the two half-orphan asylums, by the Society for the Reformation of Juvenile Delinquents, by the Leake & Watts Orphan House, by the Almshouse for the City of New York, by the Association for the Benefit of Colored Orphans, by the Female Guardian Society, by the New York Juvenile Asylum, by the New York Infant Asylum, by the Nursery and Child's Hospital, and by the orphan asylums and industrial schools in the city of Brooklyn. To say that the appropriation of a portion of the school fund to the education of the inmates of these institutions changed their character from charitable institutions to institutions that are purely educational seems quite absurd.

Any discussion of the question whether the statutes applying a portion of the common-school fund to other than the common schools of the state are unconstitutional or otherwise is wholly out of place at this time. If it be assumed that they are unconstitutional, provided those institutions are charitable in their character or design, it would only prove that the legislature had again overstepped the limits of the Constitution, and passed certain statutes which were unauthorized. If such were the case, similar instances are not so rare as to render the enactment of such a statute sufficient evidence that these institutions were not of a charitable character or design to overcome the facts which so clearly show such to have been their purpose. Besides, when we examine § 661 of the same act we find that it expressly provides that no payments shall be made by the city of New York to any charitable institution wholly or partly under private control for the care, support, secular education, or maintenance of any child surrendered to it, except upon a certificate that such child has been received and is retained by such institution pursuant to the rules and regulations established by the state board of charities. It is true, as claimed, that the Constitution permits the legislature to make provision for the education of the blind; but to say that it, without qualification, permits the legislature to provide for separate education of the blind in an institution wholly or partly under private control, is incorrect. All the provisions of the Constitution relating to this subject should be read together. When so read, it becomes obvious that the power of the legislature to authorize counties to pay for the care, support, or maintenance of the blind is limited to the constitutional provision which forbids such payments for any inmate of a charitable institution wholly or partly under private control, who is not received and retained pursuant to the rules established by the state board of charities. The question here is not whether the legislature may make provision for the education of the blind, and appropriate money of the state for that purpose, but is whether a county or city can pay its money to a charitable institution wholly or partly under private control for the care, support, and maintenance of its inmates who are not received and retained therein pursuant to rules established by the state board of charities. Such payments are expressly forbidden by § 14 of article 8 of the Constitution as amended in 1894. The unqualified declaration of the Constitution is that payments by counties or cities to charitable institutions wholly or partly under private control for care, support, and maintenance may be authorized, but not required, by the legislature, but that no such payments shall be made for any inmate of such institution who is not received and retained pursuant to the rules established by the state board of charities. This declaration of the organic law is plain and unambiguous, and expressly forbids the appropriation of money by the counties and cities of the state to any such purpose unless the inmates are received and retained in the manner stated. Its manifest purpose is to make all appropriations of public moneys by the local political divisions or municipalities of the state to institutions under private control subject to the supervision and rules of the state board of charities.

These considerations lead to the conclusion that the relator was, to an extent, a charitable institution; was, so far as it was charitable, subject to the visitation of the board of charities, and the rules adopted by it; and that no payment could have been properly made to the relator for the maintenance or support of any indigent inmate not received and retained by it pursuant to the rules of that board.

Therefore it follows that the orders of the Appellate Division and Special Term should be reversed, and the relator's motion for a peremptory writ of mandamus be denied, with costs to the appellant in all courts.

O'Brien, J., dissenting:

The defendant, as controller of the city of New York, has in his hands the moneys raised by taxation for the purpose of furnishing clothing to blind pupils from that city receiving instruction in the New York Institution for the Blind, under § 8 of chapter 166 of the Laws of 1870. The institution has presented to the controller the proper bills and vouchers upon which to draw the money, but he has refused to audit or pay them for the sole reason that the state board of charities has notified him that the institution has not complied with certain rules and regulations formulated by that body with respect to charitable, correctional, and reformatory institutions. There is nothing in the record or in the printed rules of the board to show what particular rule is claimed to apply to this institution, or has been disregarded. The managers of the institution assert that it is an educational, and not a charitable, corporation; that it is engaged in the business of educating blind children, and is in no just sense a charitable institution. Moreover, they contend that it would be derogatory to its reputation, standing, and success as an educational institution engaged in the training and instruction of a special class of pupils, who are collected from all parts of the country and from other countries to group it with poorhouses, asylums, and reformatories, rather than strictly educational institutions, where it properly belongs. That such a classification would convey a false impression of the character and objects of the institution, and thus embarrass and hinder its work, is, of course, quite possible. These objections to the position of the controller and the state board of charities are fully set forth by the managers in the papers that appear in the record, and upon which the court, at special term, granted a peremptory writ of mandamus, requiring the controller to audit and pay the bills. The appellate division has affirmed the order, and the controller appeals to this court.

The controversy, in one aspect, turns upon the single question whether the relator, the New York Institution for the Blind, is a charitable or an educational institution. If it is to be classed with the former, and is fairly within the meaning of the provision of the Constitution hereafter referred to, then the state board of charities is entitled to participate with the managers in its government, and has jurisdiction over it for the purpose of prescribing rules and regulations and exercising visitatorial powers; but, if it is to be classed with the latter, it has not. The officers of the institution have stated in the moving papers, as matters of fact, as already noted, that to classify the institution as one dispensing charity in some form, or as one the inmates of which are beneficiaries of charity in some form, would impair its reputation and usefulness as an institution of learning, which it is claimed is its true character. The specific grounds or reasons upon which the managers base this contention have not been stated in such a manner that we can fully appreciate their force, but it is quite obvious that we should not resort to any strained or refined construction of the Constitution or the statutes in order to bring the institution within that class of corporations known and designated as charitable or reformatory. The true character of the corporation must be ascertained from the objects and purposes for which it was created, and the nature of the business in which it is now engaged. The class to which any corporation properly belongs must be determined primarily from its powers and duties as enumerated in the charter. The object of its existence, and the general functions which it may legally exercise and discharge, are always supposed to be found in the statute from which its corporate life is derived.

The relator was incorporated under chapter 214 of the Laws of 1831, for the purposes clearly stated in the statute in these words: "All such persons as now are or hereafter may become members of the said institution shall be and are hereby constituted and appointed a body corporate and politic, in fact and in name, by the name and style of the New York Institution for the Blind, for the purpose of instructing children who have been born blind, or who may have become blind by disease or accident, and by that name they and their successors shall and may have succession, and shall be in law capable of suing and being sued, pleading and being impleaded, defending and being defended in all courts and places whatsoever, in all manner of actions, suits, matters, complaints, and causes whatsoever." The purpose for which the corporation was created was therefore the instruction and education of children who have been born blind, or who may have become blind by disease or accident. It was not created for the purpose of administering any charity, or of dispensing alms for the relief of poor persons. It was a purely private corporation, organized for a purely educational work, namely, the instruction of a particular class of children. It has nothing whatever to do with the maintenance or care of that class known as the "indigent blind," composed of persons of all ages and conditions. They are, no doubt, objects and beneficiaries of charity, and as such maintained and cared for by the state, as a public charge, in whole or in part. So far as this class are concerned, public moneys are raised and paid for care and maintenance, and not for education. The indigent blind are beneficiaries of public charity in the same sense as the inmates of almshouses and poorhouses, though they may be maintained in separate and special institutions. Those institutions are primarily charitable in their nature. The inmates, as a general rule, have passed the educational period of life, and whatever of instruction or mental discipline they may receive is merely incidental to the main object, which is personal relief. Money contributed by the state or any of its political divisions for the purpose of educating blind children is in no sense charity, while that contributed for the support of the indigent blind is, or may be. The duties and obligations of the state with respect to education should not be confused with those that concern the care and support of the poor and unfortunate. The two obligations rest upon distinct theories, and have been assumed upon principles and for reasons that differ widely from each other. The state, through the Constitution, has taken upon itself the duty of imparting to every child within its jurisdiction, whether rich or poor, an education sufficient to enable him to discharge the duties of good citizenship, and to earn his living in some lawful calling. The legislature is commanded to provide for a system of free schools in which all children may be educated. Article 9, § 1. That the state owes as much to the unfortunate child who has been born or becomes blind as it does to the child that can see is a proposition which, it may be assumed, no one will deny. The blind child becomes a citizen, and must engage in the struggle for existence, as well as the more fortunate one who can see. The state is bound to educate them both, but it is obviously impossible to discharge this duty in the same way, or under the same system. The conditions that surround the two children differ so widely that, while one may be educated in the common schools, the other must be educated in a different school, with different modes of instruction and different rules of discipline. It was to meet this obvious want in the case of blind children that the relator was incorporated. The state has not assumed this duty of education from any motives of charity and benevolence. The obligation rests upon a very different, and much more selfish, principle. It is really the principle of self-protection. Since a free state, founded upon the popular will, cannot exist unless sustained by intelligent and educated citizenship, the state itself assumes all the duties and obligations incident to such training and education. Hence every child may claim from the state, as a right, such an education as will enable him to become a good citizen, and that term obviously implies reasonable fitness for all the duties of life. The state may in some cases furnish books for the child, and even clothing, but in doing so it dispenses no charity, but simply discharges an obligation which it has assumed. For every dollar that the state expends in the education of children unable to educate themselves, it is supposed to receive an equivalent in a more elevated standard of citizenship. But no one can claim charity as a right. Contributions for the support of the poor and unfortunate, whether they proceed from public or private sources, are purely voluntary, and founded solely upon motives of religion and humanity. The demands of charity, whether upon individuals or the state, are always addressed to that conscientious sense of duty to relieve human suffering and to administer aid to those who are in distress. While civilized governments in modern times do not disregard its claims, yet they are founded upon a duty of imperfect legal obligation. But the obligation to educate the children who are to become the future citizens is found in the express mandate of the Constitution, and enforced by compulsory laws. Institutions that receive public or private funds for the support of the poor are properly classed as charitable institutions, since they dispense or administer charity in some form to those who are dependent upon it, and the inmates of such institutions are the beneficiaries and recipients of charity. But blind children who are educated wholly or partially by the aid of public moneys are not the beneficiaries of any charity any more than the other children of the state who are educated at the public expense; and institutions for the education or instruction of blind children are not properly classed as charitable institutions, any more than academies or schools receiving state aid. Since all the children of the state may claim the benefit of an education as a right secured to them by the Constitution, the blind child, who happens to receive instruction in a private institution to which the state has contributed money, to a limited extent, because it cannot in that case fully perform the duty of education itself, cannot properly be classified as a pauper. He stands upon the same footing as every other child in the state, and is simply a beneficiary of its policy of free education. The general government, through the action of Congress, has made provision for the support and military education of young men selected from congressional districts according to law: but it has never been supposed that the institutions in which they are educated are of a charitable nature, or that the young men themselves were the objects or beneficiaries of any charity. Keeping always clearly in view the broad distinction between education and charity, we may now examine the statute under which the money in question was raised, in order to ascertain the object and purpose to which it was devoted. It was clearly intended for one or the other of these objects,—that is, charity or education,—but it is important to determine which. The material parts of the act of 1870, and under which this controversy has arisen, are as follows:

"Sec. 1. The managers of the New York Institution for the Blind are hereby authorized to receive, upon the appointment of the superintendent of public instruction, made for a term not exceeding five years, all blind persons, residents of the counties of New York and Kings, between eight and twenty-five years of age, who, in the judgment of the board of managers of said institution, shall be of suitable character and capacity for instruction, and shall have charge of their maintenance, education, and support, and shall receive compensation therefor from the state in the same manner as is now provided by law. The term of such appointments may be extended from time to time, by the superintendent of public instruction, on the recommendation of the board of managers of the said New York Institution for the Blind, for such further period as they may deem advantageous in each individual case

"Sec. 2. Application for admission into the institution shall be made to the board of managers, and each application shall set forth the age, the fact of blindness, and that the applicant is a legal resident of the town, county, and state claimed as his or her residence, with such other information as the board may require; and each application shall be sworn to by the applicant, or his or her parents or guardian, and shall be signed by at least one member of the board of supervisors of the county in which the applicant may reside, and also be recommended by the president and superintendent of the said institution, and transmitted by the said institution to the superintendent of public instruction.

"Sec. 8. The supervisors of the county of New York or Kings, from which state pupils shall be sent to and received in the said institution, whose parents or guardians shall, in the opinion of the superintendent of public instruction, be unable to furnish them with suitable clothing, are hereby authorized and directed in every year while such pupils are in said institution, to raise and appropriate $50 for each of said pupils from said counties respectively, and to pay the sum so raised to the said institution, to be by it applied to furnishing such pupils with suitable clothing while in said institution."

It will be seen that the institution is not obliged to receive any of the persons mentioned in the statute. It is a private institution, and may receive them or not at discretion. It has no power or right to receive them for any purpose but that of instruction or education. It can admit only such as are within certain age limits, embracing the educational period of life, and then only for a limited time. It cannot receive them otherwise than upon the appointment of the superintendent of public instruction, who is the head of the educational department of the state. The children must, in the judgment of the managers, be of suitable character and capacity for instruction. The superintendent cannot properly appoint the persons described, and the managers cannot properly receive them into the institution, except for the purpose of education. They may or may not be poor children, since the statute is silent on that point. The superintendent may make the appointment according to his own judgment, but, whether they are rich or poor, the manifest purpose of placing them in the institution is education. They cannot enter for the purpose of support, or as beneficiaries of charity. It is true that when received the state pays for their education and support, but support and maintenance are in that case merely incidental to education. The children cannot be educated without being kept in the institution, and so education and support must go together, and the state pays for all. But this is not charity. It is the discharge of the obligation which the state has assumed, to furnish to all children an education to fit them for the duties of citizenship. None of the children thus instructed are the beneficiaries or recipients of charity, any more than the children educated in the free common schools. In both cases the state is discharging the obligation, but in different ways and by different methods, since the circumstances and conditions of the children are different, but the theory and principle upon which it acts are in both cases the same. The sole purpose of collecting these blind children in this institution and retaining them there was, not relief from poverty or want, but to impart to them some useful knowledge, which is the end and aim of all education. Since the enactment of the statute of 1870 the state has paid to this institution nearly a million and a quarter dollars out of the public treasury for the education of blind children. This vast sum was not a contribution by the state to charity, any more than the many millions which were paid during the same time for the support of free common schools. In each case the money was really raised and paid for the same general purpose, and in pursuance of the same general policy. The difference was in the methods employed to accomplish the same result, which was education. The private institutions which received and educated these blind children under contract with the state were not for that reason charitable institutions, any more than the schools and academies in which the other children of the state were educated. They cannot be properly classified otherwise than as educational institutions. The state makes use of them as instrumentalities for discharging the obligation enjoined by the Constitution to provide for the education of all the children of the state. Most clearly the relator is not a charitable institution unless it is engaged in administering some charity of which the inmates, or some of them, are the beneficiaries. What charity does it dispense, and what alms do the inmates receive? Whoever asserts that the institution is of a charitable nature should be able to answer these questions clearly and satisfactorily. The institution receives no money from the public for which it does not render a full equivalent, and therefore it receives nothing for charity. It is beyond dispute that the work in which it is engaged is the education of blind children of a certain age, under contracts with their parents or guardians, which include, not only instruction, properly so called, but support for the time during which the educational process is in operation. From the nature of the case, it is impossible to educate these children in one place and support them in another. The main object, which is education, includes the incident of support for the time being, since the two things are inseparable. The institution does nothing for charity. It educates blind children, for a fixed compensation, under an agreement, express or implied, purely as a matter of business. The state is one of its patrons, for the reason that, having assumed the obligation to educate the blind as well as all other children within its borders, it can discharge that obligation as well or better by employing the relator than by building and maintaining like institutions of its own. Hence it sends, through its constituted authorities, children to this institution, under contracts, and when they are received they are on precisely the same footing as the children placed there by parents or guardians. It pays for their instruction, and incidentally for their support, while in the institution, not from any motives or upon any principles of charity, but in order to promote its own interests, by preparing the children to assume the duties of citizenship, to engage in the affairs of life, and, so far as possible, to help themselves in the world, instead of becoming a charge upon the public. It was only upon this theory that the legislature could lawfully have authorized the payment of the large sum already mentioned to this institution, since, as we shall presently see, if the relator is a charitable institution, and the money was given and received for a charitable purpose, the legislature, in appropriating it, and the state controller, in disbursing it, violated the plain restrictions of the Constitution; and yet no question is raised here as to the legality and propriety of these payments by the state.

The contention of the defendant is limited to the money raised by the county, under the 3d section of the act, for the purpose of furnishing clothing to certain of the pupils admitted upon the appointment of the superintendent of public instruction, when in his opinion the parents or guardians of any of the children so admitted shall be unable to furnish it. The argument is that, since this money raised by local taxation is to be paid to the institution for the purpose of defraying the expense of clothing such children as may be unable to procure the proper clothing otherwise, it is a gift for charitable purposes, and the institution receiving it becomes a charitable institution. This contention is, I think, quite inadmissible. The discipline of the institution, requiring a uniform dress, is incidental to the process of education, and, from the nature of the case and the circumstances in which the children are placed, a part of the obligation which the state has assumed, and may devolve upon the locality. But money paid for clothing under such conditions is not charity, any more than money paid for books or other means of instruction would be. Should the state or a county assume the obligation to furnish books or even clothing for certain poor children, in order to enable them to attend the common schools, it would not be a gift to charity, and the schools would not thereby be converted into charitable institutions, nor could the children benefited by the contribution be properly classed as paupers. They would, indeed, be properly classed as beneficiaries of the system of free education enjoined by the Constitution, but that is quite a different thing. The obligation to maintain a system of free education for all may properly carry with it many incidental things involved in or connected with the main object. The consideration of the provision of the present Constitution on this and kindred questions is now in order, as it is upon these provisions that the contention of the defendant mainly rests. They are to be found in certain sections of article 8, and, so far as they have any relation to the questions in this case, read as follows:

"Sec. 9. Neither the credit nor the money of the state shall be given or loaned to or in aid of any association, corporation, or private undertaking. This section shall not, however, prevent the legislature from making such provision for the education and support of the blind, the deaf and dumb, and juvenile delinquents, as to it may seem proper. Nor shall it apply to any fund or property now held, or which may hereafter be held by the state, for educational purposes.

"Sec. 10. No county, city, town, or village shall hereafter give any money or property, or loan its money or credit to or in aid of any individual, association, or corporation, or become directly or indirectly the owner of stock in, or bonds of, any association or corporation; nor shall any such county, city, town, or village be allowed to incur any indebtedness except for county, city, town, or village purposes. This section shall not prevent such county, city, town, or village from making such provision for the aid or support of its poor as may be authorized by law.

"Sec. 11. The legislature shall provide for a state board of charities, which shall visit and inspect all institutions, whether state, county, municipal, incorporated or not incorporated, which are of a charitable, eleemosynary, correctional, or reformatory character, excepting only such institutions as are hereby made subject to the visitation and inspection of either of the commissions hereinafter mentioned, but including all reformatories except those in which adult males convicted of felony shall be confined; a state commission in lunacy, which shall visit and inspect all institutions, either public or private, used for the care and treatment of the insane (not including institutions for epileptics or idiots); a state commission of prisons who shall visit and inspect all institutions used for the detention of sane adults charged with or convicted of crime, or detained as witnesses or debtors."

"Sec. 13. Existing laws relating to institutions referred to in the foregoing sections and to their supervision and inspection, in so far as such laws are not inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution, shall remain in force until amended or repealed by the legislature. The visitation and inspection herein provided for shall not be exclusive of other visitation and inspection now authorized by law.

"Sec. 14. Nothing in this Constitution contained shall prevent the legislature from making such provision for the education and support of the blind, the deaf and dumb, and juvenile delinquents, as to it may seem proper; or prevent any county, city, town, or village from providing for the care, support, maintenance, and secular education, of inmates of orphan asylums, homes for dependent children or correctional institutions, whether under public or private control. Payments by counties, cities, towns, and villages to charitable, eleemosynary, correctional, and reformatory institutions, wholly or partly under private control, for care, support, and maintenance, may be authorized, but shall not be required by the legislature. No such payments shall be made for any inmate of such institutions who is not received and retained therein pursuant to rules established by the state board of charities. Such rules shall be subject to the control of the legislature by general laws." Article 8.

"Sec. 1. The legislature shall provide for the maintenance and support of a system of free common schools, wherein all the children of this state may be educated." Article 9.

"Sec. 4. Neither the state nor any subdivision thereof, shall use its property or credit or any public money, or authorize or permit either to be used, directly or indirectly, in aid or maintenance, other than for examination or inspection, of any school or institution of learning wholly or in part under the control or direction of any religious denomination, or in which any denominational tenet or doctrine is taught." Article 9.

It will be seen upon a careful reading of these sections that two vital points involved in this case, and which, in my opinion, control the decision, are made perfectly clear.

1. The prohibition against payments of public money by cities or other political divisions of the state to institutions where the inmates have not been received and retained therein pursuant to rules established by the state board of charities applies only to charitable, correctional, or reformatory institutions, wholly or partly under private control, for care, support, or maintenance. The institutions subject to visitation and regulation by that board must belong to the class specified, and the inmates must have been received and retained therein for the purpose specified; that is, for care, support, and maintenance. The relator is an educational institution, and the inmates are received and retained therein for the purpose of education and instruction, and not as poor persons, or for care, support, or maintenance. We have already seen that they could not lawfully have been placed in this institution for any such purpose. If their parents or guardians were unable to support or maintain them, they should have been placed in some institution for the indigent blind. The state, in selecting children for instruction in this institution, cannot take into consideration the poverty or wealth of the child. The relator is not an asylum for the relief of poverty or want, in any form or in any degree, but a school for the education of the blind; and the state, when extending the benefits of such an institution to a limited number of the children that it assumes to educate, has no right to place upon them, or any of them, a badge of pauperism, any more than the general government has the right to send the West Point graduates out into the world as poor scholars or the beneficiaries of charity.

2. The restrictions contained in the Constitution upon the payment of public moneys to private institutions, except that contained in § 4 of article 9, have no application to appropriations or moneys for the education of the blind. The broad and sweeping prohibition of the section last referred to against payments to certain religious institutions doubtless applies to all public moneys or property, and to every form of public aid; but obviously it has no application to this case, since the relator is not an institution that comes within the words of the section.

It is suggested that it was the intent and purpose of the constitutional provisions above cited to subject all institutions receiving public aid in any form, whatever their character may be, to visitation and regulation by the state board of charities, but this proposition is clearly indefensible. Schools, academies, colleges, and other educational institutions receive public money from the state or localities, but no fair-construction of the Constitution can bring them within the scope of the powers vested in the department of charities. Nor is it at all necessary, in furtherance of any sound public policy, to resort to any strained construction to accomplish such a result. They are all subject to visitation by the head of the educational department, and thus every public interest is amply protected. Laws 1894, chap. 556, art. 14, § 40.

There is another view of the case that is entitled to great weight in the inquiry whether the relator is a charitable institution, or one for educational purposes. It cannot be held that it is of a charitable nature without condemning as unconstitutional and void the acts of the legislature passed in every year since the enactment of the statutes of 1870, the action of the state controller in paying the money so appropriated to this institution, and all existing laws providing for or requiring such payments. This result must inevitably follow the conclusion that the relator is a private charitable institution, if that view should prevail.

1. It was held in the case of Shepherd's Fold of Protestant Church v. New York, 96 N. Y. 187, that the state could not appropriate and pay from its treasury public money for the support of the poor in a private charitable institution, for the reason that the Constitution forbids it, but that such prohibition did not apply to moneys raised by local taxation. In so far as the state is concerned, the Constitution is the same now as it was then. But we have seen that the state has appropriated, and that the state controller has paid, in every year since the act of 1870 was passed, moneys to this institution, as compensation for the support of the children placed there by the superintendent of public instruction, which amount in the aggregate to the sum above stated. Now, if the relator is a charitable institution, and the money was paid for the support of the poor, or as charity to relieve distress, the Constitution was clearly violated, and the money paid without authority of law. It is only upon the theory that the money was paid to a private educational institution as compensation for the education of blind children that the payment by the state of such a large sum of money to the relator can be justified or defended. In my opinion, it was properly appropriated and paid upon that principle, since the payment of money for the education of the blind is expressly excepted from the restrictions of the Constitution.

2. The 8d section of the act of 1870, which requires the city of New York to raise the money in controversy to defray the expense of clothing certain children placed in this institution, is clearly mandatory; and, as mandatory laws for such payments by cities or counties to charitable institutions are now forbidden by the Constitution, the statute is abrogated entirely. People, Inebriates' Home, v. Brooklyn, 152 N. Y. 399. But if it should be considered as a statute requiring the city to raise money for the education of blind children, as I think it should be, the Constitution does not invalidate it.

3. The act of 1870, in so far as it requires the city of New York to raise and pay money for clothing pupils in this institution, has virtually been superseded by the recent statute known as the "Charter for Greater New York," which requires the city in each year to raise and pay to the relator $50 for each state pupil in the institution from that city whose parents, in the opinion of the superintendent of public instruction, shall be unable to furnish them with suitable clothing, to be by it applied to furnishing such pupils with suitable clothing while in said institution. This is also plainly a mandatory enactment, and is clearly a violation of the Constitution, if the relator is to be classed as a private charitable corporation. But if the money thus provided for should be regarded as a contribution for the education of the blind within the limits of the new city, as it clearly should be, the validity of such a provision is beyond question. But it is only upon this theory, which is wholly inconsistent with the defendant's contention, that the statute can be maintained. Laws 1897, chap. 878, § 280, ¶ 22, subd. 6.

4. The charter also contains another provision which, in its relation to the question under consideration, is worthy of notice. By § 1161 the board of education is required to distribute to the managers of this very corporation a ratable proportion of the school fund to every blind pupil in the institution, without regard to age. Assuming, for the purpose of the argument, that it is a charitable institution, as claimed by the defendant, this enactment is clearly in violation of the Constitution, for two reasons: (1) It is mandatory, requiring a local board to distribute funds in its hands or under its control for local school purposes to a private charitable institution for charitable purposes; (2) it diverts the school fund to charitable uses in disregard of the express inhibition of the fundamental law. Const. art. 9, § 3. People, Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum Soc., v. Brooklyn Bd. of Edu. 18 Barb. 400; Gordon v. Cornes, 47 N. Y. 608; People, Schenectady Astronomical Observatory, v. Allen, 42 N. Y. 404. It is only upon the theory that the institution is a school for the education of the blind that a statute virtually providing that the pupils shall share in the public moneys for school purposes in the same way and in the same proportion as the children educated in the common schools can be upheld. It ought not to require argument to prove that money raised by taxation for school purposes, or derived from the income of the school fund, cannot be devoted to charity, or paid for the benefit of a charitable institution. Such a diversion of a fund would be a manifest fraud upon the taxpayers, even if there were no constitutional restrictions in the way; and yet that is precisely what the legislature has done by this section of the charter, if the relator be a charitable institution, and the money is to be paid to it for a charitable purpose. But if the legislature has authorized it to be paid to an educational institution, and for the purpose of educating blind children, as I think it has, then it was devoted to the very purpose for which it was intended when raised. This provision of the charter cannot be sustained upon any other principle, under the restrictions of the Constitution. It is quite apparent from what has been stated that the legislature, the recent commission of eminent citizens charged with the important duty of preparing a charter for the new city, as well as the chief financial officer of the state, have all acted upon the theory, in dealing with this institution, that it was an educational, and not a charitable, corporation. This theory underlies all the legislation referred to, and, in administration, has been assumed or adopted by every agency of the state.

The learned counsel for the defendant have evidently overlooked an important feature of this case, which has been incidentally referred to in the preceding discussion, but which should perhaps be stated with more distinctness. The legislature, in providing money for the education of the blind, is a law to itself. It is left perfectly free to act as it may think proper, and is not bound by any of the constitutional restrictions or limitations referred to. The language of the Constitution is so clear on this point that it is impossible to misconceive the meaning. "Nothing in this Constitution contained shall prevent the legislature from making such provisions for the education and support of the blind . . . as it may deem proper." Thus, the legislature is given free scope in making provision for the education of the blind. It may grant money for that purpose to public or private institutions, to be raised by general or local taxation. It may direct the payment of such money to such institutions without any conditions whatever, except such as it may itself see fit to impose. The constitutional condition that payments shall not be made unless the inmates are received and retained under the rules of the state board of charities is in that case silent. Neither that nor any of the other restrictions have any application to grants of money for the education of the blind. All appropriations for that particular purpose are subject only to the judgment and discretion of the legislature. In the case at bar the legislature has enacted that certain moneys raised by local taxation shall be paid to the relator. It has granted the money and made it payable without any conditions whatever. But the defendant, as the administrative officer who has charge of the fund, refuses to pay it over unless certain conditions have been complied with by the relator. These conditions, by the very words of the Constitution, have no application to moneys raised for this particular purpose, and the legislature itself has not attached any such conditions to the grant. Thus, the defendant, of his own will, requires the relator, before it can receive the money granted to it by the legislature, to comply with certain conditions or rules that, so far as the relator is concerned, have no foundation in the Constitution or any statute. The legislature has provided, as we have seen, by general laws, that institutions for the education of the blind shall be subject to visitation by the superintendent of public instruction, but that is not made a condition of the payment of the money in question. It has also provided that charitable institutions shall be subject to visitation by the state board of charities (Laws 1896, chap. 546, art. 1, §§ 2, 10), but that is not made a condition upon which the relator is to receive the money in question. One of these statutes (Laws 1895, chap. 771, § 11) provides that institutions for the blind shall be subjected to such visitation by the state board of charities as the Constitution provides. It provides for inspection of charitable institutions, and those include only such institutions as are devoted to the care and support of the indigent blind, as part of the poor, not blind children who are being educated at the public expense in whole or in part. The relator has charge of a large number of blind children who have been placed there and are paid for by parents or guardians. That class constitutes the vast majority of the pupils. If there were no others, surely no one would then claim that it was a charitable institution. It would be absurd to assert that, when every pupil paid his own way, there was any element of charity connected with the relator's operations. Manifestly, it would then be a private school for the blind, and nothing else. But how can it be said that when the state becomes a patron of such a school, and sends children there that it has assumed an obligation to educate, and makes contracts for their education and support while in the institution, just as parents and guardians make contracts, the character of the institution is changed from a private school to an institution of charity? It is more reasonable to say that the state may educate a few of its unfortunate blind children in a private school for that purpose, without classifying them with the objects and beneficiaries of charity. But, apart from all this can there be any doubt that it is perfectly competent for the legislature to pass a mandatory act providing for the support and education of the blind by taxation upon a city, town, or county, and directing the money to be paid to a private institution, such as the relator is, irrespective of any rules of the state board of charities? The Constitution answers the question by expressly enacting that nothing therein contained shall prevent the legislature from doing that very thing, and, if it may do that, then the relator is entitled to receive the money in question without compliance with any conditions whatever, since the restriction upon payments by localities without compliance with the rules of the board of charities has no application to such a case. The plain meaning of the Constitution is that the legislature may place blind children in such institutions as it may think proper, whether public or private, charitable or noncharitable, and provide for their education and support with public money raised either by general or local taxation, and it may direct that money to be paid to the institution in which such children have been placed without compliance with the rules of the board of charities, or any other condition whatever. Nothing in the Constitution can prevent the legislature from executing its own policy, whatever it may be, when making provision for educating the blind. The relator is most clearly a private corporation or institution of some kind. It has no public or political functions of any kind to perform. It has no relations with the state save those which every other private corporation has. The income which it receives and the funds which it has or owns are derived solely from the prosecution of its corporate business, which is the education of blind children. It does not depend upon or derive anything, so far as appears, from charitable gifts or donations, public or private. It is not engaged in dispensing the gratuities of the benevolent or charitable grants from the state, but is conducting its operations with its own means. It receives pupils from parents and guardians and from the state, and educates them for pay. It receives nothing from charity, and gives nothing to charity. Whatever moneys it receives from the state or from localities it receives for the same purpose and in the same way as that from parents and guardians, and it renders to the state the same services and returns the same equivalent. It is not bound by any law to receive pupils from the state, or to retain those which it has received; but may discharge the state pupils at any time; and then, certainly, it would be nothing but a purely private school supported by the private contributions of the parents and guardians, and certainly it would then be impossible for any reasonable man to consider or classify it as a charitable institution. But the true character of the institution, whether charitable or educational, is not to be determined by the presence or absence of a few state pupils, but by the general objects of its incorporation, and the nature of the business in which it is engaged. It cannot be a charitable institution to-day and an educational institution to-morrow, depending always upon the circumstance whether the state is or is not one of the patrons of the school. It is always either the one or the other, and, if it is not charitable when no state pupils are retained, it is not made such by the mere fact that the state makes use of it for the purpose of discharging its obligation to provide for the education of all the children within its limits. There is nothing to show that any of the state pupils could not have been supported and maintained by the parents and guardians at home, but that would not comply with the policy of the state to see to it that even blind children should receive the benefit of an education, so far as possible.

The restrictions with respect to payments by localities to charitable, correctional, and reformatory institutions without compliance with the rules of the state board of charities had no reference whatever to such institutions as the relator. This, I think, is clear, not only from what has been said, but from the very language of the Constitution itself, and the relation which the restrictive words bear to the rest of the section in which they appear. The first sentence of the section takes every provision of the education of the blind out of every restriction in the Constitution, and leaves the legislature at liberty to deal with that subject at discretion. The rest of the section deals with the other classes of persons and other institutions, namely, orphan asylums, homes for dependent children, or correctional institutions, whether under public or private control; and localities are permitted to make provision for the care, support, maintenance, and secular education of their inmates. Having taken these specified institutions out of the general restriction in § 10 of the article against loans or gifts of money by cities, towns, or villages to individuals, associations, or corporations, the remainder of the section simply regulates the manner in which such gifts or grants to such institutions shall be made. It provides—First, that the legislature may authorize, but shall not require, them; and, secondly, that the money shall not be paid to the institution unless the inmates are received and retained therein pursuant to the rules of the department of charities. The framers of the Constitution, in prescribing the regulations, applied them specifically to "charitable, eleemosynary, correctional, and reformatory institutions, wholly or partly under private control," and again to "such institutions;" but it is manifest that these terms are simply descriptive of the institutions specifically named in the preceding part of the section (that is, orphan asylums, homes for dependent children, and correctional institutions), and were not intended to include schools for the education of the blind. This section of the Constitution simply provides that the legislature may authorize, but not require, localities to provide for the support and secular education of the inmates of orphan asylums, homes for dependent children, or correctional institutions, but that payments shall not be made to them unless the inmates are received and retained under the rules of the board of charities. The restriction applies only to those institutions specifically named in the section, for the benefit of which localities were permitted to raise money. It could not possibly apply to the relator, since by the express words of the first part of this section the legislature was completely emancipated from all restraints when providing for the support and education of the blind. We are concerned in this case with but one question, and that is whether a financial officer like the defendant may withhold money in his hands from the relator, when it has been appropriated by the legislature unconditionally, until it complies with the regulations of the state board of charities; in other words whether the restrictions upon payments by localities to charitable institutions has any application to the relator. It seems very clear to me that it has not. It was manifestly intended for another class of institutions, since all restrictions upon legislative provisions for the education of the blind were removed, and the whole subject left with the legislature. It seems to me impossible, therefore, by any fair process of reasoning or argument, to classify this institution among those designated in the Constitution as charitable, correctional, or reformatory, or to include the pupils placed and retained therein among the beneficiaries of charity, or to apply the restrictions of the Constitution to such a case.

This discussion has assumed a scope and extent that might seem at first view to be wholly unnecessary. The only purpose has been to elucidate a question of some public importance, closely related to legislation and administration, and with respect to which there is not only a wide divergence in the views of counsel, but apparently some conflict of opinion among ourselves. If the discussion has contributed anything tending to reconcile opposing views, or to point out the correct solution of the question, it is to be hoped that the fault of prolixity may be overlooked. The order should be reversed, with costs.

Henry W. SAGE, Appt.,

v.

Mayor, etc., of the City of NEW YORK,
Respt.

(154 N. Y. 61.)

1. Meadows, pastures, and marshes below high-water mark did not pass as appurtenant to the grant by Governor Nichols October 11, 1867, to the village of New Harlem of lands bounded on one side by the Harlem river, together with all the soils, creeks, quarries, woods, meadows, pastures, marshes, waters, and other profits, commodities, emoluments, and hereditaments belonging to the lands "within the said bounds and limits set forth."
2. The title to lands described in a deed as bounded by a navigable river where the tide ebbs and flows ends at high-water mark.
3. The privileges or easements of riparian proprietors upon tide water include the right of access to the navigable part of the water in front as against all but the government as trustee for the people at large.
4. A riparian owner's right of ingress and egress to his water front does not include a right to compensation for an interference therewith caused by the public improvement of the water front for the benefit of navigation.
5. Absolute power to improve a water front for the benefit of navigation exists in the state or its municipal grantee as a trustee for the public free from any interference by a riparian owner whose sole right as against such authority is the statutory right of pre-emption in case of a sale.
6. A public grant of lands bounded by tide water is impliedly subject to those paramount uses to which the government as trustee for the public may be called upon to apply the water front for the promotion of commerce and the general welfare.
7. The Constitution of 1777 being adopted before the Constitution of the United States had been adopted is a result of all the legislative power that the people of the state could exert untrammelled by any higher law.
8. Grants of land made by the King of Great Britain or by persons acting under his authority, made before October 14, 1775, are ratified and confirmed by the Constitution of 1777.
9. Lands made by filling up a water front and constructing piers in a municipal improvement of the water front for the benefit of navigation do not constitute an accretion to the land of a riparian proprietor but remain the property of the city for the benefit of the public as dry land just the same as when it was land under water.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, NOTE.—As to rights of riparian owners with respect to wharves and navigable water fronts, see also Miller v. Mendenhall (Minn.) 8 L. R. A. 89, and note; Hastings v. Grimshaw (Mass.) 12 L. R. First Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for New York County in favor of defendants in an action brought to restrain defendants from using certain property alleged to belong to the plaintiff, without making compensation for it. Affirmed.

Statement by Vann, J.:

The plaintiff, as the owner of a parcel of land lying between Ninety-Fourth and Ninety-Fifth streets, on the Harlem river, which is a navigable stream, where the tide regularly ebbs and flows, traces his title back to a grant made by Gov. Nichols on the 11th of October, 1667, whereby he conveyed to the inhabitants and freeholders of the village of New Harlem certain lands bounded on one side by the "Harlem river, or any part of the said river on which this island [of Manhattan] doth abut, . . . together with all the soils, creeks, quarries, woods, meadows, pastures, marshes, waters, lakes, fishing, hawking, hunting, and fowling, and all other profits, commodities, emoluments, and other hereditaments belonging to the said lands and premises within the said bounds and limits set forth belonging or in any wise appertaining." Said grant was confirmed by Gov. Dongan on the 7th of March, 1686; and under this title, by an unbroken series of conveyances, the plaintiff on the 1st of October, 1861, became seised and possessed of all the premises in question, so far as they consist of uplands, or lands which, in a state of nature, were above water. By virtue of this title he also claims all the rights and easements which ordinarily belong to a riparian owner of lands bounded by a navigable river in which the tide ebbs and flows. He further claims to have acquired from the same source title to the tideway, and for some distance into the stream beyond. The city of New York claims title to the land formerly under water, which used to lie between high and low water mark in front of the uplands belonging to the plaintiff, by virtue of a grant made by Gov. Dongan on the 26th of April, 1686, whereby he conveyed to the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city of New York "the waste, vacant, unpatented, and unappropriated lands lying and being within the said city of New York and on Manhattan island aforesaid, extending and reaching to the low-water mark in, by, and through all parts of the said city of New York and Manhattan island aforesaid, together with all rivers, rivulets, coves, creeks, ponds, water, and watercourses in the said city and island, or either of them," except such portion as had been previously conveyed. Said grant provided that the grantees might, "at any time or times hereafter when it to them shall seem fit and convenient, take in, fill, and make up and lay out, all and singular, the lands and grounds in and about the said city and island Manhattan, and the same to build upon or make use of in any other manner or way as to them shall seem fit, as far into the rivers thereof, or that encompass the same, as low-water mark aforesaid." This grant was confirmed by Gov. Montgomerie on the 15th of January, 1780, as well as by an act of the colonial legislature passed on the 14th of October, 1782 (Laws 1782, chap. 584), which, in turn, was confirmed by the first Constitution of the state (§ 35). By chapter 50 of the Laws of 1775 the division of the township of Harlem from the city of New York specifically left the tideway in the latter. The city of New York further claims title to the lands under water in front of, and outside of, the tideway, and extending into the river for a considerable distance, by virtue of certain grants from the state. By chapter 285 of the Laws of 1852 the city was authorized to lay out an exterior street along the Harlem river, and the title of the people was thereby conveyed to the city "in and to lands under water from low-water mark to and including the said exterior street," subject to a pre-emptive right to purchase by the adjacent owner in case of a sale by the city. Pursuant to chapter 768 of the Laws of 1857, a bulkhead line, or line of solid filling and pier line, was established in the Harlem river, outside the line of low-water mark; and subsequently, under the provisions of chapter 574 of the Laws of 1871, the state, through the commissioners of the land office, conveyed to the city lands under water in said river out to a line parallel with, and 300 feet outside of, the bulkhead line so established. The city claims that, pursuant to said grants and statutes, it has become lawfully seised, and that it now owns in fee all the lands under water in front of the plaintiff's upland as far out into the river as the exterior line above mentioned. In 1887 a plan for the permanent improvement of the water front of the Harlem river between Ninety-Fourth and Ninety-Fifth streets and the adjacent neighborhood was determined upon and adopted by the commissioners of docks, and approved by the commissioners of the sinking fund, pursuant to chapter 517 of the Laws of 1884. The defendants, conforming to said plan, are now building a sea wall along the waters of the Harlem river beyond the line of low-water mark between Ninety-Fourth and Ninety-Fifth streets, and are filling in behind said wall, and expending thereon large sums of money. They intend to continue and complete the wall in conformity to said plan.

The premises claimed by the plaintiff consist in part of lands made entirely out of the Harlem river, and in part of lands still under water, all of which at the date of the Nichols patent, in 1667, was either between high and low water mark, or else was land under water out in that stream beyond the tideway. The filling in of this land was done pursuant to said legislation for the improvement of the water front of the city of New York, and is in accordance with the plan adopted by the dock department. The outer portion of said improvement consists of bulkheads, docks, and piers, traversed by a marginal street, 125 feet wide, running parallel with the river, and situate below the old low-water mark. Between said marginal street and plaintiff's uplands there is a piece of filled-in land, comprising part of the block lying between Ninety-Fourth and Ninety-Fifth streets, which is not appropriated by said plan and improvement to any public use. No proceedings have been taken to acquire any property or rights of the plaintiff, nor has compensation been made to him, or provided for his benefit. The main issue, according to the pleadings and the facts agreed upon by the parties, relates to the title to these constructed premises, being the bulkhead, docks, and piers, the lands covered by the marginal street, and those unappropriated to public use, all of which the plaintiff claims under the Nichols charter, while the defendants claim the same under the Dongan and Montgomerie charters, and the various acts of the colonial and state legislatures relating to the subject, as confirmed by the Constitution of 1777. According to the deeds constituting the chain of plaintiff's title to the upland, the grants ran to high-water mark until 1852, when a conveyance running to low water mark was given; and in 1861, when the plaintiff took title, his conveyance purported to cover the lands under water as far out as the bulkhead-line established by the harbor commissioners. No claim is made that the plaintiff, as owner of the upland, has applied to the sinking fund commissioners for any grant of the land in controversy. Upon these facts, which were stipulated, the plaintiff asked at the trial—the demand in the complaint being somewhat broader—that the defendants should be restrained from using said docks and bulkheads and the lands covered by the marginal street until compensation should be made to him therefor, and that he be adjudged to have title in fee simple absolute to the intermediate piece of land lying between the marginal street and his upland not appropriated by the plans of the defendant or the statutes of the state to any public use. The special term dismissed the complaint, holding that the title of the plaintiff under the ancient grants ran only to high-water mark; that his riparian rights as owner of the uplands were subordinate to the right of the public authorities to build thereon and make improvements below low-water mark, essential to navigation and commerce, without compensation; and that the acts of the defendant were not unlawful. The judgment entered upon the decision of the trial court was affirmed by the appellate division, one of the learned justices dissenting, and the plaintiff now comes here.

Mr. William C. DeWitt, for appellant:

The title of the plaintiffs vested in them all the rights and easements upon the river incident to riparian ownership under the most favorable circumstances.

The Nichols grant to Harlem preceded the Dongan grant or charter to the city of New York about twenty years.

The title of the state to the bed of the rivers and arms of the sea is subject to the riparian rights in favor of the owner of the uplands.

The plaintiffs have riparian rights appurtenant to their property, which are appropriated and destroyed by the use to which the city proposes to put the property acquired between the bulkhead line and high water mark.

Since the decision of the court of appeals in the case of Rumsey v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 133 N. Y. 79, 15 L. R. A. 618, it must be held that the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city of New York in the construction of streets, wharves, docks, and piers upon the tideway granted to them by the Dongan and Montgomerie charters are bound in law to compensate riparian owners for all damages thereby inflicted upon their estates.

The construction of the marginal street, constituting the second class of land erected out of the water, cannot, by any sound construction, be included in the water grants contained in the Dongan or Montgomerie charters, which must be in law, as they are in terms, confined to commercial uses; and the act of the legislature authorizing the construction of this street is subject to the constitutional provisions requiring compensation to be made where private property is taken or where damages are inflicted upon private rights.

The intermediate piece of land unappropriated to any public use, lying between the interior line of the marginal street and the upland banks of the riparian owner with which it is actually intermingled, is to be treated as alluvian or reliction or accession, and has become in law and equity the property of the plaintiffs. The defendants having mapped, taxed, and assessed the unappropriated lands as the property of the plaintiffs and not the property of the city, and especially having by judicial procedure caused said lands to be assessed for moneys to be devoted to the purchase of lands for parks and streets, to be owned by them in fee simple, and having collected such taxes and assessments from the plaintiffs, and, furthermore, having sold to the plaintiffs the said land, by a good and sufficient deed of conveyance in the form of a lease for one thousand years given in writing for an adequate consideration, the title to said lands must be adjudged in the plaintiffs, as against the defendants, and the defendants are estopped from claiming the same.

Messrs. Francis M. Scott and Theodore Connolly, for respondents:

The land in the tideway is owned in fee absolute by the defendants.

The grant in the Dongan charter was ratified and confirmed by the Montgomerie charter and the general act of 1732, chap. 584, validated the latter's patent and grants theretofore given to the city of New York.

The city possessed an absolute, unqualified title to the tideway.

The land in question belonging to the city is subject to no easement.

It is not understood to be denied that Parliament could have done what the plaintiff says the Crown could not do, and that is, to make a gift of the tideway free from all obligations and easements in favor of anyone.

We have in this case ratifications and confirmations which are equivalent to a parliamentary grant. First, we have the confirmatory act of 1732 by the colonial legislature (Laws 1732, chap. 584), confirming all the prior royal grants to the city, and the Constitutions of the state of New York, both having the full effect of a parliamentary grant.

The city's title to all the filled-in land between the bulkhead as it was established under the act of 1852, and the present line of filling, has been the settled law since 1861, but if any property rights of the plaintiff have been destroyed, their only remedy is at common-law for trespass.

The taxes and tax sales by the city's officers do not estop the city from claiming title.

The fact that the city has taxed this property for various public improvements such as are stated in the stipulation and statement of facts will not avail the plaintiff to make title.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The lands granted by Gov. Nichols to the inhabitants of the village of New Harlem were bounded on the east by the Harlem river, which was made by specific mention the limit of the conveyance in that direction. After the lands intended to be conveyed had been thus definitely bounded in the deed, a clause followed, which, in the profuse language of ancient documents, described the appurtenances so fully as to give rise to the claim now made, that the boundaries of the grant itself were enlarged thereby. As the western shore of the river below high-water mark consisted largely of "meadows, pastures, and marshes," it is argued that by including those words, with many others, in the description of the appurtenances, it was intended to include the meadows, pastures, and marshes adjoining the bank of the river, as a part of the grant. Whatever force the argument might otherwise have, it completely fails in this instance, because the long description of appurtenances is ended and limited by the words, "within the said bounds and limits set forth;" thus making it clear that there was no intention to push the bounds of the grant out into the river, or to extend them beyond its western bank. When lands are described in a deed as bounded by a navigable river where the tide ebbs and flows, the title ends at high-water mark, as the law stood at the date of the Nichols charter, and as it stands to day. New York v. Hart, 95 N. Y. 443; Wheeler v. Spinola, 54 N. Y. 877, 885; Roberts v. Baumgarten, 110 N. Y. 380; Barney v. Kenkuk, 94 U. S. 324, 336, 24 L. ed. 224, 227; Hale, De Jure Maris, 96; Moore, Foreshore & S. 782; 2 Bl. Com. 347; Comyns, Dig. tit. Grant, G, 7, 12; Devlin, Deeds, § 1028; Gerard, Titles to Real Estate, 851; Gould, Waters, § 175; 3 Kent, Com. 427, 432; 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 820. The grantees in that instrument therefore took title to the uplands lying upon the river, but not to the tideway, or to any land below high-water mark. In other words, they became simply riparian proprietors upon tide water, with such title, rights, and privileges only as belong at common law to the owners of upland washed by waters where the tide ebbs and flows. While the title of such owners did not extend beyond the dry land, they were entitled, as against all but the Crown as trustee for the people at large, to certain valuable privileges or easements, including the right of access to the navigable part of the river in front for the purpose of loading and unloading boats, drawing nets, and the like. Rumsey v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 138 N. Y. 79, 15 L. R. A. 618; Saunders v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 144 N. Y. 75, 87, 26 L. R. A. 878; Angell, Tide Waters, 22, 64. These riparian rights were property belonging to the riparian owner, who could not be deprived of them without his consent, or by due process of law, although he could only use them subject to the rights of the public. The 88 L. R. A.

title to the tideway and to the land beyond continued in the English Crown, as a public trust, after the Nichols charter, the same as before, for nearly twenty years, and until the year 1686, when Gov. Dongan granted to the city of New York all the land between high and low water mark; and his grant was subsequently confirmed by Gov. Montgomerie, by the colonial legislature, and by the first Constitution. The title to the remaining lands now in controversy, still further out in the river, continued in the Crown, as a prerogative right, until, by the Revolution, and the treaty of peace between the colonies and England, it passed to the state of New York, which subsequently, by various legislative acts and proceedings had thereunder, granted it to the city of New York. Martin v. Waddell, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 867, 10 L. ed. 997. As all of these grants were made after the date of the Nichols charter, according to the general rule they could have no effect upon the riparian rights of the grantees named therein, or of their successors in title, as that would violate vested rights, by taking away property from one and giving it to another without due process of law. Whatever the common law may have been prior to Magna Charta, after the date of that venerable instrument even the King of England could not grant to one subject that which he had already lawfully granted to another. While the English Parliament, being restrained by no Constitution that it cannot override if it so wills, can take the property of an individual for public use without making compensation, it is not claimed that any of the grants under consideration were made pursuant to an act of Parliament. As the colonial governors and legislatures derived their powers from the Crown, they could not interfere with private property any more than the Crown itself. Martin v. Waddell, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 867, 10 L. ed. 997; Johnson v. McIntosh, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 595, 5 L. ed. 694. But while the general rule prevents any disturbance of riparian rights by public authority, past or present, without making compensation, when the interest of the whole people requires an improvement of the water front for the benefit of navigation and commerce it seems to have been the rule for the state, or the city of New York by permission of the state, to make such improvements upon the tide-water front for that purpose, without compensating the riparian proprietor, other than by giving him the pre-emptive right of purchasing in case of a sale. The foundation of the rule does not seem to have been clearly pointed out, although a review of the authorities demonstrates its existence.

In Lansing v. Smith, 4 Wend. 9, it was held by the court of errors that the owner of lands adjacent to the shore of the Hudson river at Albany, who had erected a wharf upon the same after a grant of land under water from the commissioners of the land office, could not maintain an action on the case against those to whom subsequently the legislature gave the privilege of erecting a pier in the river for the purpose of constructing a basin to protect boats, although such pier entirely encompassed the wharf on the side of the water so as to leave no communication between it and the river, except through a sloop lock at one extremity of the basin, and although the privileges of the owner of the wharf were materially impaired by the construction of the pier. The court declared his loss to be damnum absque injuria, and that the grant of the right to erect a wharf implies a reservation to the legislature of the right to regulate the use of it and of the adjacent waters. It was further held that the grant of the right to erect the pier, although subsequent to the former grant, did not violate that provision of the Constitution of the United States which provides that no state shall pass a law impairing the obligation of a contract, nor that provision of the Constitution of this state declaring that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, and that the first grant did not preclude the legislature from making a great public improvement for the benefit of commerce without compensating the adjoining owner. In Furman v. New York the facts are imperfectly stated, and the decision very meager, as reported in 10 N. Y. 567, but both are very full as reported in 5 Sandf. 16. In that case the legislature authorized the city of New York to lay out streets and wharves 70 feet wide in front of the East and Hudson rivers, and provided that they should be built according to a plan adopted by the city, by and at the expense of the owners of the land adjoining, in proportion to the breadth of their several lots, and that, upon filling up and leveling the lands under water in front of their uplands to the extent provided, they should become the owners of the made ground in fee simple, and entitled to the crannage and wharfage. After compliance by the owner, and a conveyance to him from the city of the new land thus made by wharfing out, the city, under authority from the legislature, tendered to him a grant of the land under water for a certain distance, still further out into the stream in front of his premises, with notice that, if he refused to accept it at a certain valuation, the said land would be granted to any person willing to take it. The statute under which this action was taken provided that after such a grant the grantee should build streets and wharves covering the land under water embraced in the grant. A bill was filed by the owner of the upland and of the made lands under the first grant to restrain the city from making the proposed second grant, but it was dismissed on the merits at the special term, and the judgment was affirmed at the general term and by the court of appeals. Upon the argument of the appeal the point was distinctly made that the plaintiff, as a riparian owner, had the right of ingress and egress to his water front, that the proposed action of the city would be an invasion of the rights of private property, and that he could not be deprived of that property without adequate compensation. In People v. New York & S. I. Ferry Co. 68 N. Y. 71, it was held that public grants to individuals, under which rights are claimed in impairment of public interests, are to be construed strictly against the grantee, who, although he can exclude all individuals from the permanent occupation of lands under tide water held by him under such grant, cannot exclude the state, which still has the right to regulate the use of the premises in the interest of the public, and for the protection of commerce and navigation. The court said: "Gore was the owner of the upland adjoining the lands under water embraced in the grant. The ownership of the adjacent upland, however, gave him no title to or interest in the lands under water in front of his premises. The titles to lands under tide-waters, within the realm of England, were, by the common law, deemed to be vested in the King, as a public trust, to subserve and protect the public right to use them as common highways for commerce, trade, and intercourse. The King, by virtue of his proprietary interest, could grant the soil, so that it should become private property, but his grant was subject to the paramount right of public use of navigable waters, which he could neither destroy nor abridge. In every such grant there was an implied reservation of the public right." In Toule v. Remsen, 70 N. Y. 303, it appeared that the city of New York, prior to 1807, had title to the tideway, and in that year the state granted it land under water in front of the tideway, with a proviso giving the preemptive right to the owners of adjacent lands in all grants made by the city of lands under water. In 1837 the city granted to one who claimed to be the owner of the upland the water lots in front, consisting partly of the tideway and partly of land below low-water mark, reserving certain rents, payable annually, and with a condition that, if it should appear at any time that the grantee was not seised of an estate in fee simple of the adjoining land above high-water mark, the grant should be void. The grantee did not in fact own the upland, and when this was established by litigation the commissioners of the sinking fund canceled said grant and in 1859 gave the plaintiff a conveyance of the same lots upon payment of the back rent. In an action of ejectment brought by the second grantee against the first, who had in the meantime constructed bulkheads and streets, the complaint was dismissed; and the judgment of dismissal was affirmed by this court, which held that the city, by accepting title to lands beyond the tideway, with said proviso, did not consent to qualify its title to the tideway so that it could thereafter only grant land therein to the persons to whom it could grant the adjoining lands under water. It was further held that under the Dongan and Montgomerie charters the city had an absolute fee to the tideway, and could grant it to anyone that it chose, regardless of the wishes of the owner of the upland. In New York v. Hart, 95 N. Y. 443, the question to be decided was whether the owners of the uplands situated on the Harlem river, in the former village of Harlem, had an equitable claim to priority of purchase of lands under water in front of their premises in case the city sold the same; but incidentally the title to the tideway, and the effect of the Nichols, Dongan, and Montgomerie charters was involved. The court held that the Nichols charter conveyed only to highwater mark, and that by the Dongan charter the city of New York acquired title to the tideway on the whole circuit of Manhattan island, and held it as an absolute fee. By an interesting historical argument the court showed that Harlem was established as a village within the general limits of the city itself, for the promotion of agriculture and the recreation and amusement of the city of New Amsterdam, and drew the inference from the surrounding circumstances that the Nichols grant should receive a limited construction. In the language of Judge Finch, who prepared the opinion: "The city was to be the seaport, and for this purpose its water front was to girdle the island, while the village was meant for a rustic hamlet, whose inhabitants should own cattle rather than ships. Without pursuing the subject in its details it is enough to say that we have discovered no adequate reason for straying from the general rule in construing the Harlem patents, and are satisfied that the river line was at high-water mark, and so the city owned the tideway. Its title to so much of the lands in dispute as constituted the portion of the tideway adjacent to and in front of the upland owned by the defendants was thus established. That title in its origin was absolute. The city could sell the strip to whom it pleased, and it was unburdened with any pre-emptive privilege amounting to a legal right in anyone." After referring to the pre-emptive right given by statute to owners under grants theretofore made by the city of lands beyond the tideway, and to the equitable rights thereunder, the learned judge continued: "But those owning the upland in front of whom lay the absolute ownership of the city in the tideway, and who were already or might be cut off from the water by their ownership, had no such equity. A pre-emptive right in the extension without one in the tideway would do them no good by reason of that interposed strip, and would simply make the latter valueless to the city or its other grantee by in turn cutting off from both the water front." The court, with some hesitation, sustained the equity of pre-emption claimed, solely upon the ground that the city had granted both the filled-in land outside of the tideway, and a part of the tideway itself, to the claimant. This, however, was the utmost concession of rights to the riparian owner, as is evident from the last sentence of the opinion: "If thus some little shred or faint shadow of riparian right on navigable waters is preserved in this state through the sense of justice of the state and its municipal grantee, while on the longer coasts of other states the right is firmly pushed to low-water mark, and shielded by the law, we do not think the little thus gained is unwise or inequitable, or an occasion of regret." Reference is made to the important case of Whitney v. New York, which, although decided in this court in 1855, is not reported in the regular series, but may be found in 6 Abb. N. C. 329, note. See also People v. Tibbets, 19 N. Y. 523; People, Loomis, v. Canal Appraisers, 88 N. Y. 461; Kerr v. West Shore R. Co., 127 N. Y. 269, 277; Canal Appraisers v. People, Tibbets, 17 Wend. 571; and Van Zandt v. New York, 8 Bosw. 375.

These cases establish the absolute power of the city to improve the water front for the benefit of navigation, free from any interference by the riparian owner, whose sole right, as against the state or its municipal grantee as the trustees for the public, is the pre-emptive right to purchase, in case of a sale, when conferred by statute. While such are the strict powers of the corporation, in practice it has used them with that forbearance and moderation that are naturally expected of government, whether state or local, acting for the benefit of all the inhabitants. There is no evidence in this case that the corporation intended to use any part of the lands in question for its private advantage, or for any purpose except to aid the commerce of a great city; and it was admitted by the learned counsel for the corporation, in his argument of this appeal, that the defendants could not lawfully use these lands, except for commercial purposes.

The elementary writers follow the authorities cited. Thus, Mr. Gerard, in his valuable work on Titles to Real Estate, says, referring to the state of New York: "It has been established in this state by judicial decision, that the legislature of the state has an inherent right to control and regulate the navigable waters within the state. . . . The individual right of the riparian owner was considered . . . as subject to the right of the state to abridge or destroy it at pleasure, by a construction or filling in beyond his outer line, and that, too, without compensation made." Page 853, 4th ed. See also Gould, Waters, §§ 188, 143; Angell, Tide Waters, 80; Moore, Foreshore & S. 538; Hale, De Portibus Maris, 85; Hale, De Jure Maris, 22.

The cases in this state that are relied upon by the plaintiff do not vary the rule established by the line of authorities already referred to. The Rumsey Case, 183 N. Y. 79, 15 L. R. A. 618, while it substantially overthrows the early case of Gould v. Hudson River R. Co. 6 N. Y. 522, does not pass upon the rights of a riparian proprietor as against the state itself, or one of its political divisions, in improving the water front of a great port for important public purposes. It simply decided that an owner of land on a public river can recover damages from a railroad company for building an embankment across his water front, and depriving him of access to the navigable part of the stream. The court, however, was careful to limit its decision to the case then in hand, which was against a private corporation with private interests to serve, and to declare that the "principle cannot, of course, be extended so as to interfere with the right of the state to improve the navigation of the river or with the power of Congress to regulate commerce under the provisions of the Federal Constitution." The Saunders Case, 144 N. Y. 75, 26 L. R. A. 378, was also against a domestic corporation organized to make money for its stockholders by conducting the business of a common carrier of passengers and freight. It did not involve the right of the state to promote navigation by furnishing greater facilities for commerce. Langdon v. New York, 93 N. Y. 129, and Williams v. New York, 105 N. Y. 419, are not analogous, as they rest upon grants from the state of lands under water, with covenants for the enjoyment of wharfage, acted upon at great expense by the grantee. The fact that no claim for compensation in those cases was made upon any other ground is significant. In Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984, much was said that favors the theory of the plaintiff, but all that was decided is that a wharf built by a riparian owner on the bank of a navigable river in the state of Wisconsin under a statutory permit cannot be declared a nuisance without a judicial trial. The later case of Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 224, held that the public authorities may build wharves and make other improvements necessary to navigation below high-water mark upon navigable waters in the state of Iowa without the consent of the adjacent proprietor, and without making him compensation. In other states some of the authorities are in accord, while others are opposed to the rule adopted in this state. Stevens v. Patterson & N. R. Co. 34 N. J. L. 532, 3 Am. Rep. 269; Payne v. English, 79 Cal. 540; Hess v. Muir, 65 Md. 601; Eisenbach v. Hatfield, 2 Wash. 236, 12 L. R. A. 682; Ladies Seaman's Friend Soc. v. Hoistead, 58 Conn. 144; Miller v. Mendenhall, 48 Minn. 95, 8 L. R. A. 89; Parker v. West Coast Pkg. Co. 17 Or. 510, 5 L. R. A. 61. The want of harmony is probably owing to the difference in the rule as to the ownership of the tideway, which is held in some jurisdictions to belong to the state, and in others to the riparian proprietors. This also accounts for the want of harmony in the Federal courts, as they follow the courts of the state where the case arose, unless some question arises under an act of Congress. St. Louis v. Myers, 113 U. S. 566, 28 L. ed. 1181; Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 224, 228; Wilson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Co. 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 245, 7 L. ed. 412.

The only limitation that is placed by the courts of the United States upon the power of the several states over lands covered by tide water within their respective limits is not for the protection of riparian owners, but to protect the public in the use of such waters, and Congress in its paramount right to control navigation. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 387, 36 L. ed. 1018. While the case last cited is relied upon by the appellant, it is really of little aid to him, as it simply announced the law of Illinois, but not that of New York. The case of Duke Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Bd. of Works, L. R. 5 H. L. 418, also much relied upon by the appellant, is not in point, because it turned upon the construction of the statute, rather than upon the common law. In that case a lessee from the Crown of land on the river Thames, including some land under water, claimed damages under an act of Parliament which authorized the construction of an embankment along the river bank in front of his property for the purpose, not of navigation, but of making a new street. 25 & 26 Vict. chap. 93. The act required compensation to be made for such damage, if any, as should "be sustained by him by loss of river frontage, or otherwise by reason of such embankment and roadway, or other the exercise of any of the powers of this act." As no claim was made except under the act, which expressly recognized the loss of river frontage as the subject of damages, the case is not regarded as an important authority upon the question now before us, notwithstanding the somewhat sweeping language used in the decision.

While we think it is a logical deduction from the decisions in this state that, as against the general public, through their official representatives, riparian owners have no right to prevent important public improvements upon tide water for the benefit of commerce, the principle upon which the rule rests, although sometimes foreshadowed, has not been clearly set forth. Although, as against individuals or the organized public, riparian owners have special rights to the tideway that are recognized and protected by law, as against the general public, as organized and represented by government, they have no rights that do not yield to commercial necessities, except the right of pre-emption, when conferred by statute, and the right to wharfage, when protected by a grant and covenant on the part of the estate, as in the Langdon and Williams Cases. I think that the rule rests upon the principle of implied reservation, and that in every grant of lands bounded by navigable waters where the tide ebbs and flows, made by the Crown or the state as trustee for the public, there is reserved by implication the right to so improve the water front as to aid navigation for the benefit of the general public, without compensation to the riparian owner. The implication springs from the title to the tideway, the nature of the subject of the grant, and its relation to navigable tide water, which has been aptly called "the highway of the world." The common law recognizes navigation as an interest of paramount importance to the public. Thus, when the King used to grant an exclusive right of fishing in navigable tide water, as once he lawfully might, if, in the course of time, the nets or weirs interfered with navigation, they became a nuisance, and could be abated as such. The grant was silent upon the subject, yet the courts held that whatever impeded the superior right of navigation was impliedly excepted from the effect of the grant. So, as it seems to me, when any public authority conveys lands bounded by tide water, it is impliedly subject to those paramount uses to which government, as trustee for the public, may be called upon to apply the water front for the promotion of commerce and the general welfare. The purpose for which the supreme authority holds the title to lands under tide water is inconsistent with the power to grant any easement or right to those lands that will prevent it, when the necessity of commerce demand, from "wharfing out" to deep water, so that vessels can load and unload, and the interests of navigation be promoted. It is a reasonable inference from the nature of the grant in question made by Gov. Nichols, the circumstances surrounding him when it was made, the pursuits of the grantees, the situation of the port of New York, with its growing commerce, that it was well understood by both parties that the gratuitous conveyance was not putting a curb on the commerce of the chief city of the continent for all time. Twenty years later, when his successor granted the tideway to the city of New York, with the right to build thereon, there seems to have been neither complaint nor question from the inhabitants of Harlem. Nearly two centuries had passed before any claim to the tideway was made in hostility to that grant, so far as we are advised. The plaintiff now seeks to establish an easement over the tideway against the city; and in order to do so he must also establish it against the English Crown as well as the state of New York, and show that the sovereign, as parens patriæ, alienated a right that was essential to the most important public functions. We think that no such limitation upon the prerogative of the sovereign was intended, and that the conveyance of the uplands in question to a subject should, from public considerations of the highest importance, be held to have been made with the implied reservation of the right to freely improve the navigation of the great seaport, within the general limits of which said uplands were situated. The permanent control of navigable waters, if alienable at all, should only be so by an instrument showing a clear and undoubted intention to that end; and in the absence of express language the strict construction required by law in favor of the sovereign, as trustee, limits the effect of the grant by reserving or excepting therefrom the right to fill in the land out to deep water, and build wharves thereon, in aid of navigation, and as an indispensable incident to commerce. People v. New York & S. I. Ferry Co. 68 N. Y. 71. This conclusion makes the riparian rights subordinate to those of the public for commercial purposes, and leaves unfettered the commerce of the city of New York. The inconvenience to the riparian owner may sometimes be serious, but private convenience must often suffer in order to develop the highest utility of a great waterway. It may be safely assumed that no public authority will make an extreme or oppressive use of its rights, or unnecessarily inflict injury upon a citizen.

Aside from the authorities cited, and the inferences drawn therefrom, we see no answer to the claim of the defendants that the Dongan and Montgomerie grants were confirmed by the first Constitution adopted in this state. In 1732 the colonial legislature enacted "that all and singular, letters patent, grants, charters, and gifts, sealed under the great seal of the colony of New York, heretofore made and granted unto the mayor," etc., "of the city of New York, be, and are hereby declared to be, and shall be, good, valid, perfect, authentic, and effectual in the law against the King's majesty, his heirs and successors, and all and every person and persons whomsoever, according to the tenor and effect of the said letters patent, grants, charters, and gifts." Laws 1732, chap. 584. In cannot, in reason, be doubted that this specific act, confined to grants made to the city of New York, was intended, among other things, to confirm the Dongan and Montgomerie charters, the latter of which was less than two years old when the statute was passed. The effect of that act, standing alone, upon a grant made in violation of Magna Charta, it is unnecessary to now consider: for it was confirmed by the Constitution of 1777, which was the result of all the legislative power that the people of the state of New York, untrammelled by any higher law, could exert. The Constitution of the United States had not then been adopted, and the laws of England were no longer in force within the state, except as they were continued and confirmed by the Constitution of the state. There was no restriction, therefore, upon the power of the people to accomplish whatever could be effected through a fundamental act of legislation. The simple but weighty words of its 1st section were literally true, when it declared "that no authority shall on any pretense whatever, be exercised over the people or members of this state, but such as shall be derived from and granted by them." By the 85th section of that Constitution such acts of the legislature of the colony of New York as were in force on the 19th of April, 1777, which was the day before the Constitution was adopted, were continued in force, and made the law of this state. The natural effect of this supreme enactment was to give the force of law to every unrepealed act standing upon the statute books of the colony. But the Constitution did not stop there, for by the next section it indirectly confirmed all grants of land made by the King, or by persons acting under his authority, prior to the 14th day of October, 1775, by providing "that all grants of land within this state made by the King of Great Britain, or by persons acting under his authority, after the 14th day of October, 1775, shall be null and void; but that nothing in this Constitution contained shall be construed to affect any grants of land within this state made by the authority of the said King or his predecessors, or to annul any charters to bodies politic, by him or them, or any of them, made prior to that day." When the two successive sections, from which quotations have been made, are read in connection with the act of 1732, and in the light of the notoriety of the Dongan and Montgomerie charters, we think it was the intention of those who adopted our first Constitution, which did not require compensation for private property taken for public use, to ratify and confirm those grants, made for commercial purposes of the highest importance, and so essential to the prosperity of the city of New York.

If we have reasoned accurately thus far, the claim of title by the plaintiff, through alluvion or accretion, cannot be sustained. The doctrine of accretion rests upon an increase by imperceptible degrees through natural causes, such as the ordinary action of water. It does not apply to land reclaimed by man through filling in land once under water, and making it dry. Mulry v. Norton, 100 N. Y. 424, 432, 58 Am. Rep. 206; Halsey v. McCormick, 18 N. Y. 147; Angell, Tide Waters, 71; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 467. The city was not a wrongdoer in filling up the water front and constructing piers, as its action was justified by its ancient charters, as well as by legislation to which there is no constitutional objection. The land thus made, without trespassing upon the rights of anyone, did not become the property of the plaintiff through accretion, but remained the property of the city for the benefit of the public as dry land, just the same as when it was land under water. It is claimed that Stears v. Brooklyn, 101 N. Y. 51, is in conflict with these views. In that case, however, the city of Brooklyn had wrongfully built a pier in front of plaintiff's premises; and it was held that the pier, by accretion, became added to the plaintiff's land, in so far as it was in front thereof. Steers owned to the water line, and the city of Brooklyn, which had no ownership in the shore waters, as they had never been conveyed to it, had no right to build a pier in front of his premises. It was therefore a trespasser, in thus building the pier and shutting him off from the water privileges which before he had enjoyed as an easement to his bulkhead, and which he had a right to use as against the city of Brooklyn and all the world except the state, or its lawful grantee, acting for the public. An increase owing to the action of a wrongdoer is an exception to the doctrine that to gain title by accretion the growth must be by imperceptible degrees, and through natural causes. The Steers Case stands upon that exception, and has no application to the case now before us. Here the increase was neither imperceptible nor unlawful, and hence the plaintiff took nothing therefrom, and, as we think, the defendants can be deprived of nothing thereby.

We have examined with great care all of the exceptions relied upon by the appellant, but we find none calling for a reversal, and the judgment should therefore be affirmed.

BRUSH ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANY,
Appl.

(122 N. Y. 512.)

When four of the five judges composing a court are declared by the Constitution to be a quorum, their agreement in a decision, the other being absent, makes the decision unanimous, within the meaning of a statute requiring leave to appeal from unanimous decisions.

(March 2, 1897.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, which affirmed a judgment of the Supreme Court for Monroe County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles Roe for appellant.

Mr. George F. Yeoman for respondents.

Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a motion made by the plaintiff to dismiss the appeal. The action is to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, resulting from injuries caused by the alleged negligence of defendant. The jury rendered a verdict for $5,000 in favor of plaintiff. A motion for a new trial on the minutes was denied. From the judgment upon the verdict, and the order denying a new trial, an appeal was taken to the appellate division of the fourth department, which resulted in an affirmance. The order of affirmance reads: "Opinion by Follett, J. Adams, J., not sitting. All concurred, except Adams, J., not sitting." 12 App. Div. 126. A motion was subsequently made before the appellate division for a reargument or for permission to appeal to this court, which was denied, all the members of the court concurring; Adams, J., not sitting. 14 App. Div. 19. Notwithstanding this decision, and without application to a judge of this court for leave, the defendant took this appeal. The sole question presented is whether, under the circumstances as stated, there was a unanimous decision of the appellate division. It is argued by the defendant and appellant that article 6, § 2, of the Constitution provides that the state shall be divided into four judicial departments; that there shall be an appellate division of the supreme court, consisting of seven justices in the first department, and five justices in each of the other departments; that in each department four justices shall constitute a quorum, and the concurrence of three shall be necessary to a decision; that no more than five justices shall sit in any case. This being so, it follows, says the appellant, that in the fourth department the appellate division consists of five justices, and that a quorum of four hearing a case, and affirming it on the vote of all, it cannot be regarded as a unanimous decision, under the provisions of § 191 of the Code of Civil Procedure, subsec. 2. We are of opinion that a quorum of four justices, holding an appellant division, are, in contemplation of law, the appellate division, and that their unanimous vote of affirmance is a compliance with the provisions of the Constitution and Code. When the Constitution provides that four justices shall constitute a quorum, it is, in effect, conferring upon four the powers with which five were invested. A quorum is the number of the members of a body competent to transact business. A judicial or legislative body having a quorum present proceeds ordinarily as if every member was sitting in his place, and exercises all the powers with which it is invested. Any other rule would greatly embarrass the transaction of business in case of illness or voluntary or enforced absence among the members. Any other construction of the statute would be unreasonable, impracticable, and result in great public inconvenience.

It follows that this appeal is unauthorized, and it should be dismissed, with costs.

All concur.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

H. H. PECK et al., Receivers of the Southern Malleable Iron Company, Appts.,

v.

J. M. ELLIOTT, Jr.

(47 U. S. App. 606, 79 Fed. Rep. 10, 24 C. C. A. 425.)

1. A proceeding by receivers of a corporation to enforce the liability of a stockholder is ancillary to the receivership suit, and the jurisdiction thereof depends upon the jurisdiction in the original case.
2. The legal character of the liability of a stockholder does not prevent its enforcement by receivers in a proceeding which is wholly ancillary to the original receivership suit in equity.
3. The rule against an implied power of a corporation to increase the amount of its capital when that is definitely fixed by the charter or statutory articles of incorporation has no application where the power to determine upon the capital to be engaged is made one of the matters for internal regulation by by-law.

4. An increase of the capital of a corporation by an amendment of a by-law is valid when by the constitution of the corporation it is given power to fix the amount of capital by by-law.
5. The power to increase the capital of a corporation by by-law, which is given by the act of March 23, 1875, is not repealed by the act of March 27, 1883, making a different provision for an increase of stock, even if that applies to a corporation under a former act.
6. It will be presumed that the law requiring payment of a tax on the increase of the capital stock of a corporation has been complied with, when the stock has been increased and there is no evidence that the tax has not been paid.
7. The failure of a corporation to pay a tax required on the increase of its capital stock cannot be set up by a subscriber to such

NOTE.—Power to increase capital stock of corporations.

I. In general.

II. Power of directors.

III. Constitutional and statutory provisions.

I. In general.

It has been fully established that corporations cannot increase the amount of their capital stock beyond the amount, if any, which has been fixed by law, except when expressly authorized by law to make such increase. In other words, there is no implied power.

The cases are unanimous in holding that a corporation has no power to increase or diminish its capital stock unless expressly authorized to do so. No such power can be claimed by implication. Rose-Meehan Brake Shoe Foundry Co. v. Southern Malleable Iron Co. 72 Fed. Rep. 957; Granger's Life & Health Ins. Co. v. Kamper, 73 Ala. 325; Einstein v. Rochester Gas & E. Co. 146 N. Y. 44.

The officers, directors, and stockholders of an incorporated company cannot, even by a unanimous agreement made under an honest misapprehension of their powers, increase the capital of the company. People, Jenkins, v. Parker Vein Coal Co. 10 How. Pr. 543, Affirming 10 How. Pr. 186.

A corporation cannot increase its capital stock at will in any manner or to any extent unless it is authorized to increase by its charter, and then only in the manner prescribed. Lathrop v. Kneeland, 46 Barb. 432.

Such unlawful issue of stock is good cause for canceling the charter, and therefore the stock thus illegally issued cannot be regarded as valid. People, Jenkins, v. Parker Vein Coal Co. 10 How. Pr. 543, Affirming 10 How. Pr. 186.

A holder of unauthorized stock issued in excess of the limit fixed by the charter of the company is not entitled to any of the rights or subject to any of the liabilities of the holder of valid stock. Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 26 L. ed. 971.

A subscription to stock is void, and creates no liability when the stock has been issued without authority in an attempt to increase the capital. Rose-Meehan Brake Shoe Foundry Co. v. Southern Malleable Iron Co. 72 Fed. Rep. 957; Grangers Life & Health Ins. Co. v. Kamper, 73 Ala. 325; Clark v. Turner, 73 Ga. 1.

When a corporation has issued valid certificates of stock to the full extent of all the shares which by 88 L. R. A.

law and the constitution of the company it may issue, its powers are exhausted, and it cannot be compelled to issue others. Smith v. North American Min. Co. 1 Nev. 423; Mechanics' Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 18 N. Y. 598.

Subscriptions for shares of stock taken after the corporation has issued the full amount of its authorized capital are void. Cartwright v. Dickinson, 38 Tenn. 476, 7 L. R. A. 706.

All stock issued in excess of the limit fixed by the charter of the corporation is unauthorized and void. Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 26 L. ed. 971.

So, a subscriber to increased stock which is ultra vires the corporation cannot be required to pay assessments on it even when the company is insolvent. Kampman v. Tarver, 87 Tex. 491. In this case a suit by a stockholder to obtain the cancellation of illegal shares issued on an attempted increase of stock is sustained.

The attempt of a mutual insurance company to raise a guaranty capital represented by bonds and mortgages which should be liable for losses after other available means have been exhausted was held illegal. In Trenton Mut. L. & F. Ins. Co. v. McKelway, 12 N. J. Eq. 138, because the charter provided only for a mutual company which should pay losses out of the premiums contributed by the members, and a percentage on the amount of their insurance.

The court cannot pass on the necessity of an increase of stock which has been voted by a corporation in pursuance of statutory authority when the legislature has not authorized it to do so. Jones v. Concord & M. R. Co. 67 N. H. —, 30 Atl. 614.

Although a corporation which has issued the full amount of stock authorized by its charter cannot lawfully issue any additional shares, yet when it has taken some of its original stock in settlement of obligations, a resolution to increase its stock and take subscriptions for a part of that amount may be sustained as a release of old stock rather than a creation of new stock. City Bank v. Bruce, 17 N. Y. 507.

The increase of stock was held lawful in Handley v. Stutz, 139 U. S. 417, 35 L. ed. 227, where the articles of incorporation authorized such increase, and it was made by vote of the stockholders and there was no statutory inhibition against it. The questions involved in this case related more to the disposal of the stock without proper consideration than to its issue.

stock as a defense against his liability when he has become president of the corporation by virtue of that stock alone.

8. A resolution of the members of a corporation for the increase of its capital stock is a sufficient by-law for that purpose.

9. A transfer of a patent right to a corporation in partial payment of a subscription to stock as a mere device for evading a condition that the stock must be taken at par, followed by a retransfer to the subscriber at a nominal consideration, is insufficient to relieve him from liability to pay for the stock at its par value.

(March 2, 1897.)

A PPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Tennessee in favor of defendant in a proceeding to enforce payment of an unpaid stock subscription. Reversed.

Before Taft and Lurton, Circuit Judges, and Sage, District Judge.

A peculiar kind of stock provided for by Massachusetts statutes, known as special stock, is limited in amount to two fifths of the actual capital subject to redemption at par after a fixed time. The questions that arise concerning this are not specially applicable to the subject of the increase of regular stock.

So far as the issue of increased stock is considered with respect merely to the validity of its disposition and the sufficiency of the consideration received for it the questions belong rather to the subject of bonus stock or stock issued in fraud of creditors.

II. Power of directors.

The absence of an implied power on the part of corporations to increase their stock is accompanied by an absence also of any implied power on the part of directors to make such increase, even if the corporation has power to make it.

The main case of PECK V. ELLIOTT is the most striking case on the subject. It does not deny the rule above stated, but holds that the directors can increase the capital by amending a by-law when they had the power to fix the amount by by-law in the first place.

That the directors have no implied power to increase the capital stock is decided by all the cases that have considered the subject. Eldman v. Bowman, 58 Ill. 444, 11 Am. Rep. 90; Chicago City R. Co. v. Allerton, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 233, 21 L. ed. 902; Payson v. Stoever, 2 Dill. 428; Finley Shoe & Leather Co. v. Kurtz, 34 Mich. 89.

Directors do not have the power to order an increase of stock and open books for its subscription without the assent of the shareholders where the charter confers on the corporation the power to increase the stock but is silent as to the mode in which it shall be done. Eldman v. Bowman, 58 Ill. 444, 11 Am. Rep. 90.

The power of directors to increase the capital stock of a corporation, without the consent of the stockholders, beyond the amount named in its charter, is denied, although the charter provides that the stock "may be increased from time to time, at the pleasure of said corporation." "To change this without the consent of the associates would be to commit them to an enterprise which they never embraced, and would be manifestly unjust," and it would "make them members of an association in which they never consented to become such. It would change the relative influence, con-

Statement by Lurton, Circuit Judge:

The Southern Malleable Iron Company is a manufacturing company, incorporated in August, 1890, under the general law of Tennessee. In November, 1893, H. H. Peck and Charles D. McGuffey were appointed receivers under a bill filed in the United States circuit court for the southern division of the eastern district of Tennessee, by the Northern Bank of Kentucky, a judgment creditor, with a levy on certain assets. The object of the bill was to preserve the property as an operative unit plant, collect in its debts, complete certain valuable contracts, and sell the property as a whole, including its goodwill, for the satisfaction of all its debts according to priority of lien. The appellants under this bill were appointed receivers, and placed in possession of all its assets of every kind. During the course of the proceedings usual to such a creditors' bill, the receivers filed a petition, alleging the total inadequacy of the assets to pay the debts, and setting out that the appellee, J. M. Elliott, a director and president of the corporation, was a subscriber to the capital and profit of each member. If the directors alone could do it, they could always perpetuate their own power." Chicago City R. Co. v. Allerton, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 233, 21 L. ed. 902.

But the assent and acquiescence of all the stockholders cures an irregularity in the adoption of a resolution to increase the stock of a corporation by the board of directors, instead of by the stockholders themselves. Bailey v. Champlain Min. & P. Co. 77 Wis. 453.

An unauthorized overissue of shares was held, in Sewell's Case, L. R. 3 Ch. 181, to be confirmed by subsequent resolutions of the company, and parties assenting thereto were held bound by the allotment to them of their part of the overissued shares.

Express authority by statute which authorized the issue of bonds, providing that "directors may confer on any holders of such bonds the right to convert the principal due or owing thereon into stock," is held to give the directors power to issue such stock in exchange for bonds, although they could not increase the stock directly. Belmont v. Erie R. Co. 52 Barb. 663; Ramsay v. Erie R. Co. 38 How. Pr. 193.

III. Constitutional and statutory provisions.

By constitutional provision in Colorado all fictitious increase of stock or indebtedness is void, and the stock of a corporation cannot be increased except in pursuance of general law, nor without the consent of the persons holding a majority of the stock given at a meeting held on thirty days' notice.

The Constitutions of Alabama, Arkansas, California, Idaho, Montana, Missouri, Pennsylvania, Washington, and some other states, are substantially the same as that of Colorado on this subject. Statutory provisions are found in different states on the same matter.

A constitutional provision declaring that all fictitious increase of stock shall be void, and that no stock shall be issued except for money, labor done, or money or property actually received, inhibits an increase of stock to represent an increased value of the property of a corporation in which the original capital was invested,—at least when there is no accumulated money surplus, or visible, tangible property in excess of the authorized stock which it is proposed to make the basis of the additional stock. Fitzpatrick v. Despatch Pub. Co. 33 Ala. 604.

But stock issued and disposed of for a valid con-stock of said company to the extent of 120½ shares of $100 each, and was indebted on that account in a balance due thereon of $6,997.82, and that the insolvency of the corporation rendered it necessary that this stock liability should be enforced. Leave of court was asked to file this petition in the principal cause, and that J. M. Elliott be made a defendant thereto by proper process, and for a decree against him to the extent of his unpaid stock liability. An order was accordingly made by the Honorable David M. Key, district judge, holding the circuit court, allowing the petition to be filed, and ordering that process should issue as prayed. It may not be out of place to say that, after the filing of the original bill, other bills were filed by creditors, including one for a foreclosure of a mortgage on the property of the company made to secure an issue of bonds. Subsequently all these bills were consolidated, and ordered to proceed under the name and style of "Ross-Meehan Brake Shoes Foundry Co. v. Southern Malleable Iron Co. et al." Elliott was duly made a defendant to the proceeding begun by the receivers, and filed his answer, denying the jurisdiction of the court; denying the jurisdiction to proceed against him by petition or bill in equity; and denying his liability as a stockholder. Proof was taken, and, upon a final hearing, the petition of the receivers was dismissed. 73 Fed. Rep. 957. From this decree, an appeal has been prosecuted, and errors assigned by the receivers.

Messrs. H. D. Peck and Wheeler & McDermott, for appellants:

All by-laws made by corporations are subject to repeal and amendment as changes of time and circumstances may require.

Beach, Corp. § 323; Newling v. Francis, 3 T. R. 193; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 960; East Tennessee & V. R. Co. v. Gammon, 5 Sneed, 567.

When, therefore, the legislature confers a power to be exercised by by-law, it is to be presumed that it intended the ordinary incidents to the exercise of a power in that way, to wit, that the by-law might be repealed or amended by the same power which made it.

1 Thomp. Corp. § 960.

The act of 1883 permits the board of directors to increase the capital stock of a corporation, by amendment to the charter under their consideration, although at less than par, is not fictitious within Tex. Const. art. 12, § 6, prohibiting fictitious increase of stock. Mathias v. Pridham, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 58.

An increase of stock to be sold for less than the nominal par value in order to supply a fund actually required for the use of the company is not a fictitious increase within the meaning of the Constitution. Stein v. Howard, 65 Cal. 616.

Section 11, art. 12, of the California Constitution, providing that the issue of stock except for money paid, labor done, or property actually received, and that all fictitious increase shall be void, with the further provision that the stock shall not be increased except in pursuance of general law nor without the consent of persons holding the larger amount in value of the stock at a meeting called on sixty days' notice, is not self-executing, and does not, without legislative action, abrogate Cal. Civ. Code, § 366, providing for an increase of stock by a meeting or by the written assent of the holders of three fourths of the stock. Ewing v. Oroville Min. Co., 56 Cal. 649.

A constitutional provision restricting the increase of the stock and indebtedness of a corporation is held, in Gloninger v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co., 139 Pa. 13, to be inapplicable to corporations previously chartered with unrestricted power to make such increase, unless they have waived the right and become subject to such restriction by accepting the benefits of later legislation. The question involved in this case was in respect to the issue of bonds.

The same was held in Ahl v. Rhoads, 84 Pa. 319, where the question was concerning a mortgage. There are also other similar decisions respecting the effect of a Constitution on other provisions of prior charters.

The limitation of the power to increase the stock of a corporation, imposed by art. 576, chap. 3, tit. 20, 1 Sayles's Tex. Civ. Stat. which authorizes an increase "not exceeding double the amount of its authorized capital, by a vote of the stockholders in conformity with the by-laws," is not removed by the provisions of art. 573, which allows them to amend their articles generally. Tarver v. Stevenson, 32 U. S. App. 97, 66 Fed. Rep. 633, 13 C. C. A. 681.

The limitation of the increase of stock to double the amount of its authorized capital, to be made 38 L. R. A.

by a vote of the stockholders in conformity with the by-laws, under Tex. Rev. Stat. art. 576, controls the more general provisions of arts. 571 and 573. Kampman v. Tarver, 87 Tex. 491.

Limitation of the right of a railroad corporation without authority of the general court to increase its capital stock beyond a fixed maximum is made by Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 61. Com. v. Boston & A. R. Co., 142 Mass. 146.

A charter fixing the capital stock of a corporation at $1,000,000, and providing that it may be increased to not exceeding $5,000,000 at the discretion of the stockholders, may be amended by statute so as to authorize the board of directors to increase the capital stock at their discretion, and such amendment does not release a prior subscription to the stock. Payson v. Withers, 5 Biss. 239; Payson v. Stoevoet, 2 Dill. 437.

The grant of corporate power to increase capital in a charter of a corporation is not invalid because it is in conflict with previous general laws, but it may operate to repeal them so far as they are in conflict with it. Jones v. Concord & M. R. Co., 67 N. H. —, 30 Atl. 614.

It is one of the implied conditions upon which a stockholder enters into his contract that the power of the legislature may be exercised to vary the manner in which the capital stock shall be increased. Payson v. Withers, 5 Biss. 239.

An amendment of the charter is held to be the only mode of increasing the capital stock of a corporation under the Tennessee general incorporation law, as amended by the act of 1883, chap. 163, § 19. Ross-Meehan Brake Shoes Foundry Co. v. Southern Malleable Iron Co., 73 Fed. Rep. 957.

An attempt to increase the capital stock of a corporation before the amount of its original capital has been actually paid in is held void in Page v. Austin, 10 Can. Sup. Ct. 140, 167, on the ground that the statute expressly provides that it may be done only when the capital stock has been paid in.

The question of the power of corporations to increase their stock, which is discussed in this note, has not been extended to include questions of the power to reduce their capital stock which involve different effects, or the matter of compliance with the conditions and requisites of making a valid increase of stock, or the estoppel of stockholders against contesting such increase which they have acquiesced in.

hands duly certified, acknowledged, and recorded. This is not the same as increasing the stock by the corporation itself, to wit, the stockholders when duly assembled in corporate meeting.

Chicago City R. Co. v. Allerton, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 285, 21 L. ed. 903.

The act of 1875 did not confer upon the directors the power, either to originally fix, or subsequently increase, the stock of such corporation; that power could only be exercised by the stockholders when duly assembled.

The legislature desiring to broaden the power of the corporation in this respect has added to the power existing under the act of 1875, the additional power of increasing the stock by a vote of the board of directors only, and without resorting to the stockholders.

The circumstances of this case are such as to estop Mr. Elliott from setting up the defense of illegality in the issue of stock.

The original bill, shows the obtaining of a judgment, and the issuance and levy of an execution, but no sale or further step taken. This is not enough to give equity jurisdiction. The law requires that the legal remedies should be exhausted.

Lurton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The jurisdiction of the court to entertain this petition of the receivers against the appellee depends upon its jurisdiction in the original case, to which this proceeding was wholly ancillary. This petition is auxiliary to the original suit. It is a petition by the receivers asking the aid of the court to enable them to collect an asset of the corporation. It was filed by direction of the court under an order made in the principal cause. The jurisdiction of the court in the principal cause is not questioned, and cannot be in this collateral suit. Compton v. Wabash R. Co. 31 U. S. App. 486-529, 15 C. C. A. 397, 68 Fed. Rep. 263; Mellen v. Mo line Malleable Iron Works, 131 U. S. 352-367, 33 L. ed. 178-183; Lumley v. Wabash R. Co. 22 C. C. A. 60, 43 U. S. App. 476, 76 Fed. Rep. 66. The fact that the circuit court had possession of all the assets of the Southern Malleable Iron Company, for the purpose of winding up its affairs as an insolvent corporation, is the fact which made it admissible to bring a debtor of that corporation into the court, to the end that his debt might be ascertained and payment coerced. For the purpose of collecting choses in action, the circuit court might direct its receivers to institute independent suits in that court or in the courts of the state, or cause such debtors to be made defendants in the principal cause, and determine for itself any question which might be involved by the defenses to the claim. Such a proceeding would not involve any question of citizenship, or amount in controversy, or mode of trial. The complete jurisdiction of the court over the res, the property and assets of this corporation, involved its right to bring before it persons having possession of any of those assets, or having claims thereon, or who were indebted to it, and either itself hear and determine all controversies, or refer them to a master or to a jury, as it saw fit. A court of equity is not deprived of jurisdiction simply because a purely legal question becomes collaterally involved. It might, in its discretion, submit such controversy upon issues made to a jury, or dispose of them without doing so. That the liability of appellee was one of a legal character did not operate to defeat the jurisdiction, and bring its proceedings against him to a stand. These questions seem conclusively settled by White v. Kwing, 159 U. S. 36, 40 L. ed. 67, a case which arose upon a like proceeding in the same court, and in which certain questions were certified by this court under the court of appeals statute.

We come, then, to the merits of the case. The defense to this stock liability is that the stock subscribed for by the appellee was increase stock, and that there was no power in the corporation to increase its capital. In Tennessee, prior to 1870, all charters were granted by special legislation. Such charters, as in other states, usually defined definitely the amount of the capital stock of the company, or fixed a maximum beyond which it should not go. By article 11, § 8, of the Tennessee Constitution of 1870 it is provided as follows: "No corporation shall be created, or its powers increased or diminished, by special laws, but the general assembly shall provide by general laws for the organization of all corporations hereafter created."

The "general law" under which the Southern Malleable Iron Company was organized was approved March 23, 1875, and is chapter 142 of the Acts of Tennessee for 1875. That act prescribes a form of application to be followed whenever the corporation is one for the purposes of profit, and that the general powers of such corporations shall be those prescribed by § 5 of the act. The act contains no requirement that the application for incorporation shall anywhere state the amount of the capital stock proposed to be invested in the business. On the contrary, the only provision of the act of 1875 touching the matter of capital stock is found in § 5, where it is said: "The corporation may, by by-laws, make regulations concerning the subscription for, or transfer of stock; fix upon the amount of capital to be invested in the enterprise; the division of the same into shares; the time required for payment thereof by subscribers for stock; the amount to be called for at any one time."

Judge Clark, who heard this case in the court below, was of opinion that this power should be construed as authorizing the corporation "to fix only the original or initiatory stock of the company," and that this corporation, having, by a by-law, settled upon "the amount of capital to be invested in the enterprise," was without power to subsequently increase this capital by an amendment of the by law. He was further of opinion that the fact that Elliott, by virtue of this new stock, became a member of the corporation, a director, and its president, did not estop him from denying the validity of the new stock, although creditors of the corporation were dependent upon its collection for the satisfaction of claims presumably contracted upon the faith of the increased capital. This latter conclusion was grounded upon the proposition that, where the corporation is totally without power to increase its stock, the void act of increase cannot be adopted or ratified or the subscriber estopped in favor of creditors. Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 148, 26 L. ed. 968. That changes in the amount of the capital stock do involve changes in organization, and in the relative relation of the original stockholders towards the corporation and each other, is very evident. That such changes cannot occur without the consent of the shareholders affected is also elementary. How such consent is to be given depends upon the organic law of the corporation. In the absence of some other binding provision in the Constitution, that consent would have to be unanimous. But if the stockholder becomes such under a charter or statutory provision which subjects him, by the action of the directors or of a majority of the members of the corporation, to the liability of such change of relation growing out of an increase of stock, he cannot complain. He has so contracted. Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 280; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 78; Payson v. Withers, 5 Biss. 276; Payson v. Stoecker, 2 Dill. 427; East Tennessee & V. R. Co. v. Gammon, 5 Sneed, 587; Rend v. Memphis Gayoso Gas Co. 9 Heisk. 545-558. In the case last cited, where a large increase in the capital stock had been authorized, after the defendant in error had become a subscriber, Judge Nicholson, referring to the effect upon the relative rights of original subscribers, said: "One of . . . [the terms of his subscription] was that after the organization the board of directors would have the power . . . [under the charter] to increase the capital stock from time to time, . . . not exceeding one million of dollars. But [said the judge] such increase of the capital stock could work no change in the rights or liabilities of the original subscribers, for the reason that the corporation continues to be the same entity, and for the further reason that it was part of the contract of the original subscribers that the directors should have the power to increase the capital stock."

Where the capital is fixed in the charter, whether the charter be by special act of legislation, or under a general organization statute, the limit so settled by the charter itself cannot be exceeded unless authority to make an increase be plainly conferred in the charter or by statute. Chicago City R. Co. v. Allerton, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 236, 21 L. ed. 908; 2 Thomp. Corp. §§ 2076-2079; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 454; Beach, Priv. Corp. § 468. The reason is plain. Where the amount of the capital stock is definitely fixed by the charter itself, a departure therefrom would be to alter the charter itself. The general rule that the powers of a corporation are those definitely granted and those necessarily implied from the character of the business it is authorized to carry on has application to any change of the authorized capital, and no authority to alter the capital thus defined will be implied. This is the limit of the rule against the power to increase by implication, as laid down in the authorities cited above.

Mr. Morawetz in his very carefully prepared text states the principle thus: "A corporation has no implied authority to alter the amount of its capital stock, where the charter has definitely fixed the capital at a certain sum." Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 484.

So Mr. Beach says: "It is well settled that a corporation has no implied authority, either by resolution of the shareholders or by law, to alter the amount of its capital stock where the charter has definitely fixed it at a certain sum." Beach, Priv. Corp. § 468.

The cases cited in support of the text of both of these authors are all cases where the amount of the capital was definitely fixed in the constitution of the company. The case before us is that of an incorporation under a general law which does not impose any limitation whatever upon the capital which incorporators may venture in their business. Neither does it require that the corporators shall in the constituting instrument state what their capital is or is to be. No provision is made for any registration or other mode of publishing the amount of the capital of any company organized under this statute. The marked distinction between this and all other such acts to which attention has been called lies in the fact that, under this law, the amount of the capital of any company formed thereunder constitutes no part of the organic law, but is distinctly made a matter for corporate regulation, and relegated to the field covered by that branch of corporate law constituting the by-laws of the company. A by-law may regulate the exercise of a corporate power, but it cannot enlarge or alter the powers conferred by the charter or by statute. A by-law in its nature is subject to amendment, alteration, and repeal. It cannot destroy or impair a right, and must therefore be a reasonable exercise of the internal management of the corporation. Rights may vest in members or others under a by law which cannot be devested by subsequent alteration. A by-law is a subordinate law. It must not conflict with law, constitutional, statutory, or common, and must not conflict with the Constitution of the corporation as found in its charter. Subject to these qualifications, a by-law is distinguishable from the charter of the corporation in the fact that it is subject to alteration. These principles are primary, and need no support.

If a corporation is given power to determine upon its capital stock as a matter of internal regulation, it is difficult to see why one determination is the exhaustion of the power. Any matter which is the proper subject of regulation by by-law may be so regulated from time to time as the corporate interests demand. The right to alter such a regulation when once made may involve vested rights, and for that reason be inadmissible without consent of all affected. But the right to alter or amend a regulation which is the proper subject of corporate legislation through by-law must depend upon questions wholly foreign to those involved by the assumption of powers not expressly granted. Hence it is that the rule invoked against an implied power of increase where the amount of the capital is definitely fixed by the charter or the statutory articles of incorporation has no application where the power to determine upon the capital to be engaged is made one of the matters for internal regulation by by-law.

But it is said that in Tennessee there was a well-settled, definite, public policy, which forbids the granting of an unlimited power of increasing the capital of such artificial creations. This public policy is supposed to be indicated by what is said in reference to old legislative charters, wherein it is said was always found a definite amount of capital. Whether this is so or not may be matter of dispute. But, assuming it to be so, we find by the 19th section of this act of 1875 a very marked departure from any former policy in respect to the increase of the capital of such old legislative charters. That section provides "that any corporation heretofore chartered by an act of the general assembly which may desire to change its name, increase its capital stock, or obtain any powers granted by this act, shall have the right to do so, by the board of directors of said corporation copying such amendment and making an application," etc. Then follows a form of application and a direction that, when the same has been acknowledged, probated, and filed with the secretary of state in the manner provided for articles of original incorporation, the desired amendment shall become ipso facto a part of such old charter. The whole matter is set in motion by the directors, and no one may deny or question the granting of the powers thus applied for. By the subsequent act of 1888, being chapter 163 of the Acts of 1888, this same easy mode of increasing capital stock is extended to corporations theretofore created under the general act of January 30, 1871, which gave to chancery courts the power to organize corporations. Now, whether § 19 of the act of 1875 and the act of 1888 be construed as working an increase of capital stock by the mere application of the directors, or as merely conferring a power of increase to be subsequently exercised by the members of the corporation to be affected, we shall not stop to consider. In one event the directors alone would be able to increase the stock of any such company to any extent they saw fit. Upon the other construction the applying corporation, acting alone through its directors, would obtain an unlimited right of increasing its capital stock, whenever the members chose to exercise it. It is thus very evident that, when this act was passed, there was no definite legislative policy prohibiting the granting of a right to increase the capital of such companies, to be exercised at the will of the corporation concerned. The liberality of the legislature in this respect towards these old legislative irrevocable charters would not lead us to expect any less liberality towards the new brood of corporations anticipated under the legislation then in hand, especially as the same act reserved the right to repeal, alter, or amend the law under which they were to organize.

Neither does the power to increase imply or involve the power of decrease. Very different questions of public policy are involved by a power of diminishing capital invested in such companies. The rights of creditors would be affected by a decrease. Their rights are not injuriously involved by an increase. To decrease the capital of such a company would be, in most cases, to withdraw capital pledged to the fortunes of the adventure. These reasons have led the courts with great unanimity to hold that the power of increasing the capital does not involve or imply the power to decrease. Sutherland v. Olcott, 95 N. Y. 94; Moses v. Ocoee Bank, 1 Lea, 898-406; Droitwich Patent Salt Co. v. Curzon, L. R. 3 Exch. 35-42; Seignouret v. Home Ins. Co. 24 Fed. Rep. 382; Spelling, Priv. Corp. § 770; Smith v. Goldworthy, 4 Q. B. 430; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 281; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 434. That an increase in the capital stock goes to the very foundation of the organization, and changes the relation between original subscribers and the corporation, must be admitted. It furnishes a consideration which might move the legislative authority to withhold or regulate the power. But in the last analysis this is a matter which affects members alone. If they become such, subject to such changes, they cannot complain. No question of public policy is involved by this consideration. Under this act, the power of increase is vested in the whole corporation to be exercised by the shareholders. Under such a power, the directors alone cannot authorize an increase. Chicago City R. Co. v. Allerton, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 233, 21 L. ed. 903; Eidman v. Bowman, 58 Ill. 444, 11 Am. Rep. 90; Brice, Ultra Vires, 3d Eng. ed. 280.

These considerations lead us to the conclusion that where, by its constitution a corporation is given power to fix upon the amount of capital stock to be engaged in its business by by-laws, an increase of capital by an amendment of the by-laws is valid, and a subscriber bound. The case is like that of a corporation whose capital, by charter provisions, is limited by a maximum named therein. In such a case an increase is valid, provided it does not exceed the charter limit. Brice, Ultra Vires, 3d Eng. ed. 280; Gray v. Portland Bank, 3 Mass. 364, 8 Am. Dec. 156; Somerset & K. R. Co. v. Ushing, 45 Me. 524-532; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 281. This question has not been decided by the supreme court of Tennessee. The question was mooted in Cartwright v. Dickinson, 88 Tenn. 476-487, 7 L. R. A. 706, but expressly reserved.

The case of Grangers' Life & Health Ins. Co. v. Kamper, 73 Ala. 325, has been much relied upon by appellee. It is not in point. The Alabama law required that the constating instrument should state the amount of capital proposed to be employed. This became a definite sum stated in the charter. The fact that the application also stated that the sum named was subject to increase was a nullity. It was an unauthorized power injected into the application. The Tennessee statute contains, as we have already stated, no requirement that the application shall fix the amount of the capital.

This brings us to the Tennessee act of March 27 1838, being chapter 163 of the Acts of 1838.

That act is as follows: "That any persons organized as a corporation under a charter granted by a chancery court of this state, or under the Acts of 1875, chapter 142, approved March 23, 1875, who may desire to, to change the name of such corporation, increase its capital stock, or obtain any power granted by the act entitled 'An Act to Provide for the Organization of Corporations,' approved March 23, 1875, shall have the right to do so under and in the manner provided by § 19 of said act, which provides for the amendment of charters granted by the legislature, and with the like effect as therein provided; provided, that this act shall in no way apply to or affect corporations where suits have already been brought to declare their charters void, and shall have no effect on any kind of litigation or suits now pending against such corporation, for any purpose."

This it is urged is a repeal by implication of the provision in the act of 1875 which we construe as permitting an increase of stock through corporate action of stockholders. This act deals with two distinct classes of corporations,—those organized under the act of January 30, 1871, authorizing chancery courts to organize corporations with the powers conferred by the act, and those organized under the act of 1875. The language of the act is general, but it is manifest that some of the subjects with which it deals relate to but one of the two classes of corporations, while others are common to both. Thus, it is provided that persons organized under either of the two general laws referred to, "who may desire to," may have three distinct privileges. First, they may change the name of the corporation. Second, they may increase the capital stock of the corporation, or obtain the power to increase the capital stock, as these words may be construed. Third, they may obtain the powers granted by the act of 1875. The words of the act in furtherance of the intention must be taken distributively, reddendo singula singulis. They should be applied to the subject-matter to which they relate, as indicated by the context. Sutherland, Stat. Const. § 282. "Persons organized as a corporation under" the act of 1875 cannot possibly wish to obtain the powers with which they are already vested. This provision must therefore be referred to corporations not organized under the act of 1875. This principle of construction, being clearly applicable to this act, may be properly applied to so much of the act as refers to the subject of an increase of capital stock. If this act be construed as one by which the power to increase capital stock is to be obtained by such an amendment, to be exercised by the members of the corporation, then the power already existed, and these words should be referred to the other class of corporations where the power did not exist. The power to change the corporate name did not exist under either class of articles of association. This part of the act may therefore be regarded as applicable to both classes of corporations.

The act of 1883 contains no repealing clause, and the argument for repeal of the power of increase by by-law, which we find in § 5 of the act of 1875, has no basis, if the rule of construction we have applied be sound. 88 L. R. A.

But if the maxim, Reddendo singula singulis, has no proper application, and all the provisions of the act be held as intended to apply to corporations organized under the act of 1875, then there is no room for an implied repeal of that power, if the act of 1883 be construed as conferring on the directors the power to increase the capital by simply making the application prescribed. Such a power of increase by action of the directors would not be necessarily inconsistent with the power of increasing by action of the shareholders through by-law. The whole subject would not be covered by the new act. Repeals by implication are not favored, and will not be presumed if the two acts can stand together. Repugnancy in principle merely is not enough to work a repeal, unless it is clear that the new legislation is intended to cover the whole field. Sutherland, Stat. Const. § 137; Cate v. State, 3 Sneed, 120; Durham v. State, 89 Tenn. 728 et seq. On the other hand, if the act be construed as a method by which corporations not having the power of increasing capital may obtain the power, then the inclusion of corporations organized under the act of 1875, among those intended as beneficiaries, would not repeal a power already existing, there being no difference in limitation or method between the existing power and that to be obtained by applying for the amendment. So far as that act may be regarded as a legislative opinion that the power did not exist under the act of 1875, such opinion, though entitled to some consideration, would not be of any considerable weight, and is offset by a contrary opinion evidenced by the repeal of the act by the act of April 7, 1893 (Tenn. Acts 1893, p. 299, chap. 146), and the substitution of no other mode of increasing capital. This express repeal would leave no mode by which such companies might lawfully increase their capital stock, unless the power existed under the act of 1875,—a condition of things which we cannot assume the legislature to deliberately intend in view of the legislative history of this subject.

Another objection to a decree against the appellee remains to be considered. The 8th section of the revenue act of September 18, 1891, provided, among other things, that every corporation increasing its capital should pay a certain privilege tax upon the increase; "and no such corporation, joint stock company, or association shall have or exercise any corporate powers until the said tax shall have been paid. And the secretary of state shall not file or record any charter, certificate of incorporation, or articles of association, or certify or give any certificate to any corporation, joint-stock company, or association until the foregoing tax has been paid; and no such company, incorporated by any special act of the legislature, shall go into operation, or exercise any corporate powers or privileges, until said tax has been paid." There are several answers to this:

First. It does not appear that this tax has not been paid. The court will not presume that this tax law has been violated, but will, on the contrary, presume that the law has been complied with. Young v. South Tredegar Iron Co. 85 Tenn. 189.

Second. This defense is not open to the appellee. If the corporation had the power to increase its stock, the failure to pay this tax is a mere irregularity, against which the appellee, by his acceptance of the stock and his taking the office of president by virtue alone of his stock, has estopped himself. The case in this aspect falls under the cases of Handley v. Stutz, 139 U. S. 417, 85 L. ed. 237, and Veeder v. Mudgett, 95 N. Y. 295. That this increase was made by a resolution of the stockholders clearly appears. A by-law is nothing more nor less than a resolution of the members of the incorporation. This resolution was unanimously passed. Elliott claimed a credit for $3,012.50, for a patent right assigned to the company in part payment on his stock. This arrangement was made as a means of letting Elliott have the stock at less than par, its capital having been impaired by losses, so that its actual value was less than 75 per cent of its par value. The difficulty to be met was not that increase stock might not in good faith be sold at less than par, but in the fact that the by-law authorizing the increase required the new stock to be sold at par. Elliott made the transfer of this patent right on July 6, 1892, and on January 31, 1893, the directors passed a resolution in the following words: "Resolved, that for and in consideration of the sum of $1.00, the right transferred to this company by J. M. Elliott, Jr., for the manufacture of his vertical hook coupler, be, and is hereby, transferred back to him. All rights by this transfer are released and conveyed back to him, the same as though said transfer made on the 6th day of July, 1892, had not been made."

The arrangement by which this patent right was to be taken at the price fixed was for the purpose of evading the condition prescribed by the shareholders, namely, that the increase stock should be sold at par. This seems to have been known to Elliot. The resolution by which he reacquired the patent, at the nominal sum of $1, must be construed either as a rescission of the agreement for the purchase of his patent, or as but a part of the original illegal scheme by which the limitation upon the power of the directors to sell the new stock at less than par was to be evaded. In either event, the appellee is not entitled to the credit, it not appearing that the patent was of any value to the corporation while it held the title. The subsequent agreement of the receivers to allow this credit was a mere proposed compromise settlement, and never carried out, the appellee refusing to pay the balance due upon obtaining such credit or to give his notes therefor.

The decrees must be reversed and remanded, with direction to enter a decree against appellee for $6,997.32, with interest from the filing of the petition of the receivers. The appellee will pay the costs of this court and cost under the petition in the court below.

Rehearing denied.

CONSOLIDATED COAL COMPANY of

Joshua S. PEERS et al.

(106 Ill. 361.)

1. It is not proper to strike a plea from the files because it is insufficient in substance or form, but the remedy in such case is by demurrer.
2. A presumption against the pleader as to the contents of an instrument will arise when he bases a claim upon it without setting it forth in hæc verba or making averments which definitely show its contents.
3. A privity of estate between a lessor and an assignee of the term renders the assignee liable for breaches of any express covenants of the lease running with the land or term if they occur while such privity continues to exist.
4. A question of res judicata cannot be raised on appeal when it is not presented by the record.
5. A provision that an assignee of a lease takes it "subject to the agreements in the lease" does not impose a personal contractual obligation on the assignee.

6. The exclusion of "the agreements of the lessee" from a covenant against encumbrances in an assignment of a lease does not impose a personal liability upon the assignee to perform such agreements, but leaves them in statu quo.
